REPORT.

THE SELECT COMMITTEE appointed to inquire into the Working of the Acts of Parliament for Licensing and Regulating Theatres and Places of Public Entertainment in Great Britain, and to Report any Alterations which may appear desirable;——HAVE considered the Matters to them referred, and have come to the following RESOLUTIONS, which they have agreed to Report to the House:

I. As far as relates to the Metropolis,

Resolved—THAT it is the opinion of this Committee,

1. That the present system of double jurisdiction under which theatres are licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, and music halls, and other places of public entertainment, by the magistrates, is inconvenient and unsatisfactory.

2. That the power of licensing of "any house, room, garden, or other place kept for public dancing, music, or other public entertainment of the like kind," hitherto vested in the magistrates by Act 25 Geo. II. c. 36, sec. 2 & 3, be transferred to the same authority, which may be empowered to grant licenses to theatres, so that the entire regulation of theatres, music halls, and other places of public entertainment, be placed under one authority.

3. That such power of licensing could not be efficiently exercised by a subordinate authority, and that it is therefore desirable that it should be placed in the hands of an officer of high position and dignity.

4. That it is desirable that the Department of the Lord Chamberlain be so organised as to be able to deal with all such places of public entertainment within the metropolis.

5. That it is desirable that any Act of Parliament dealing with the licensing of theatres, music halls, and other places of entertainment, should render compulsory the inspection and survey of such places, as regards the stability of structure, due security against fire, ventilation, and facility of ingress and egress; and that the authority to whom the licensing may be entrusted, be required to frame regulations from time to time for ensuring the safety and accommodation of the public, which regulations should receive the sanction of the Secretary of State, and be laid upon the Table of the House of Commons.

6. That, apart from the question whether an identical form of license should or should not be given to theatres and music halls, it is not desirable to continue the existing restrictions which prevent music halls from giving theatrical entertainments.

7. That there be different forms of licenses; one where intoxicating drinks, refreshments, and tobacco may be consumed in the auditorium of the building, the second where intoxicating drinks, refreshments, and tobacco may not be so consumed.

8. That the control which the Lord Chamberlain now exercises over the performances in theatres, should be extended to other places of entertainment for which licenses may be required.

9. That the censorship of plays has worked satisfactorily, and that it is not desirable that it should be discontinued. On the contrary, that it should be extended as far as practicable to the performances in music halls and other places of public entertainment.

10. That it is desirable that when application is made for a license for a theatre, music hall, or other similar place of entertainment, the applicants should be required to furnish such security as shall be satisfactory to the licensing authority, not exceeding l., and satisfactory evidence as to their respectability as to the fitness of the building for the purposes for which it is intended, and as to the convenience of the site; and that in the event of such evidence being satisfactory, the license should be granted without reference to any question of competition with other establishments.

11. That the decisions of the Lord Chamberlain should be subject to an appeal to the Home Secretary, as far as the original granting of licenses is concerned.

12. That the provisions for enforcing the proper working of the Act of 25 George II. c, 36, relative to the licensing of music halls, are insufficient and unsatisfactory, as there is no legal authority under which the police can take direct proceedings against unlicensed houses, in which music and dancing are going on, although they are empowered to deal summarily with cases of unlicensed theatrical entertainments.

13. That it is desirable to repeal the 7th section of the Act of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 39, which empowers the Excise to grant beer and spirit licenses to all buildings licensed by the Lord Chamberlain or the Justices.

II. As far as relates to the Country,

14. That it is desirable that the licensing of a new theatre should be by the Lord Chamberlain instead of, as heretofore, by the Magistrates; but that the powers now exercised by the Magistrates, both as regards the renewal of licenses and as regards regulations, should continue in force.

15. That it is desirable that the proprietors of music halls, and other similar places of public entertainment, should be required to apply to the Magistrates for a license, under the same or similar provisions to those which may be enacted relative to similar places of entertainment in the Metropolis.

16. That the 12th Section of the Act of 6 & 7 Victoria, cap. 68, relative to the censorship of plays intended to be produced or acted for hire in any theatre in Great Britain, continue in force, and that such censorship be extended, as far as practicable, to music halls, and other places of public entertainment throughout Great Britain.

Draft Resolutions to be proposed by the Chairman, read as follows:

I. As far as relates to the Metropolis,

"That it is the opinion of this Committee:—

"1. That the present system of double jurisdiction under which theatres are licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, and music halls by the magistrates, is inconvenient and unsatisfactory.

"2. That the licensing of music and dancing saloons by the magistrates be abolished, and that the powers hitherto vested in them by Act 25 Geo. II., as far as relates to music halls, be transferred to the same authority which may grant licenses to theatres, so that the entire regulation of theatres, music halls, and other similar places of entertainment, be placed under one authority.

"3. That such powers could not be efficiently exercised by a subordinate authority, and that it is therefore desirable that they should be placed in the hands of an officer of high position and dignity.

"4. That it is desirable that the Department of the Lord Chamberlain be so organised as to be able to deal with all the music halls, saloons, and similar places of entertainment within the metropolis, and that the additional expense might be covered by the charge of an adequate fee on all licenses.

"5. That apart from the question whether an identical form of license should or should not be given to theatres and music halls, it is not desirable to continue the restrictions which prevent music halls from giving theatrical entertainments.

"6. That it is desirable that any Act of Parliament dealing with the licensing of theatres, music halls, and other places of entertainment, should render the inspection and survey of such places, as regards the stability of structure and facility of ingress and egress, compulsory; and that the authority to whom the licensing may be entrusted, be required to frame regulations from time to time for ensuring the safety of the public, which regulations shall receive the sanction of the Secretary of State, and be laid upon the Table of the House of Commons.

"7. That the control which the Lord Chamberlain now exercises over the performances in theatres, should be extended to other places of entertainment for which licenses may be required.

"8. That the censorship of plays has worked satisfactorily, and that it is not desirable that it should be discontinued. On the contrary, that it should be extended, as far as practicable, to the performances in music halls.

"9. That it is desirable that when application is made for a license for a theatre, music hall, or other similar place of entertainment, the applicants should be required to furnish satisfactory evidence as to their respectability, as to the fitness of the building for the purposes for which it is intended, and as to the convenience of the site; and that in the event of such evidence being considered satisfactory on these points, the license should be granted without reference to any question of competition with other establishments.

"10. That the provisions for enforcing the proper working of the Act of 25 Geo. II., c. 36, relative to the licensing of music halls, are insufficient and unsatisfactory, as there is no legal authority under which the police can take direct proceedings against unlicensed houses, in which music and dancing are going on, although they are empowered to deal summarily with cases of unlicensed theatrical entertainments.

"11. That it is desirable to repeal the 7th section of the Act of 5 & 6 Will. IV., c. 39, which empowers the Excise to grant beer and spirit licenses to all buildings licensed by the Lord Chamberlain or the Justices.

"II. As far as relates to the Country,

"12. That it is desirable that the manager of a new theatre should make his first application for a license to the Lord Chamberlain (or to such person as may be constituted the central authority for licenses in London), instead of, as heretofore, to the magistrates; but that the powers now exercised by the magistrates as regards the framing of regulations, and their due enforcement, should continue in force.

"13. That it is desirable that the proprietors of music halls, saloons, and other similar places of entertainment, should be required to apply to the magistrates for a license, under the same or similar provisions to those which may be enacted relative to similar places of entertainment in the metropolis."

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE GEORGE JOACHIM GOSCHEN, IN THE CHAIR.

The Honourable SPENCER CECIL BRABAZON PONSONBY, called in; and Examined.

The Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby. 19 March 1866.

1. Mr. Locke.] WAS this document entitled "Memorandum on Theatres," drawn up at the Lord Chamberlain's Office?—Yes, and I propose to put it in.—(The Witness handed in the same. Vide Appendix.)

2. Now, with regard to the licensing of plays in the first instance; originally was it the case that the Lord Chamberlain had no power to license plays?—No, I think he had the power; the Lord Chamberlain acted under the prerogative of the Sovereign.

3. But under the prerogative of the Sovereign, whether he had the power or whether he had not, I believe it was not exercised previously to the 10 Geo. 2, was it?—Yes; he had, before that, complete control over the managers.

4. But to what extent was the prerogative then used, if used at all?—I should say even more strongly than it is at present; he interfered in the copyright of plays, and all other things connected with the stage.

5. Are you aware that the first material interference with managers was so late as the time of Gay's "Beggar's Opera," and that an Act of Parliament was passed, namely, 10 Geo. 2, distinctly giving the licensing power to the Lord Chamberlain?—Yes, the Act was passed, but the licensing power existed long before.

6. Are you aware that that was done from political motives, in consequence of Foote representing the Ministers on the stage, and among them Sir Robert Walpole?—I have heard that story.

7. Previous to that, it was the custom of theatrical managers and actors to represent on the stage anything that they pleased, unless they made themselves amenable to the general law of the country; was that not so?—I think that the Master of the Revels, or some subordinate officer of the Lord Chamberlain had then complete control, and was probably present at all the representations, and therefore saw that there was nothing improper in the performances.

8. I think the Beggar's Opera was brought out at Covent Garden in 1727?—I don't know the date.

9. Now, what is the date of 10 Geo. 2?—The 10 Geo. 2, is 1737.

10. Are you aware that when the Beggar's Opera was introduced, representations were made to Gay upon that subject?—We have no very distinct records of what took place at that period. I have not, however, looked particularly to that point with regard to the Beggar's Opera.

11. Did Gay afterwards introduce a piece called "Polly"?—I can't say without referring.

12. That play was not allowed to be acted, but was suppressed; and then, in consequence of that, in order to define the Lord Chamberlain's powers, in the year 1737, the writings of Gay and others were made the pretext for passing an Act known as the 10 Geo. 2, c. 28, was not that so?—I have heard so.

13. But previously to the passing of that Act of Parliament, the managers and actors had exercised their own discretion pretty much as to what they chose to act upon the stage, whatever might be the power of the Lord Chamberlain under the prerogative of the Crown?—Yes, I believe that was so. But there were only a few few theatres, and the actors were the servants of the Crown.

14. Therefore, since that time, the 10 Geo. 2, until the passing of the 6 & 7 Vict., was the Act of Parliament which regulated theatres?—Yes.

15. Have you a note of the date of Sir Edward Bulwer's Committee?—That was a Committee on Dramatic Literature, which sat in 1832.

16. Was that Committee of Sir Edward Bulwer's appointed in consequence of the complaints of the smaller theatres, that they had not free trade in acting; that the right of acting the legitimate drama was confined to the two patent theatres, and the theatre in the Haymarket?—Yes.

17. On that ground the Committee was appointed?—Yes, no doubt that was so.

18. Now, I believe that the present Act was the result of that Committee?—The Act of 6 & 7 Vict. was not passed until 1843, which is 11 years afterwards.

19. Was there any other Committee appointed subsequently to that?—No, I think not, not before the passing of that Act. After the Committee of 1832, legislation seemed to have been dropped, and a Bill was introduced into Parliament but was not proceeded with.

20. By whom was that Bill introduced into Parliament?—I believe it was by Sir Edward Bulwer; I think that was founded upon the Report of the Committee of 1832.

21. When was that Bill introduced?—It was in March 1833; but there is no name on the back of the Bill, and I have not been able to ascertain it.

22. You think that that was the result of Sir Edward Bulwer's Committee?—Yes; I have reason to believe so.

23. Then things remained in abeyance for some time, but were the complaints of the managers of the minor theatres still continued?—There was still constant litigation between the managers of the minor theatres and the managers of the patent theatres.

24. Somewhat similar litigation to that which now exists between certain managers of theatres and the proprietors of music halls?—I should say so.

25. The managers of minor theatres claimed the same privileges as the patent theatres, did they?—They did not claim the same privileges, but they tried to get them.

26. That is to say, to be enabled to act every kind of dramatic performance, just as the patent theatres did?—Yes.

27. And they were resisted by the patent theatres?—Yes.

28. With regard to the music halls, they are now trying to obtain the privilege of acting plays, or, at all events, operas, and performing ballets, which the managers of the theatres say they are restricted from doing by this Act, 6 & 7 Vict.?—Yes, the 6 & 7 Vict.

29. After the 6 & 7 Vict. was passed, the magistrates, as well as the Lord Chamberlain, had the power of licensing theatres; what precisely is the Lord Chamberlain's district for licensing theatres?—His district as defined by the Act of 6 & 7 Vict., is all the Parliamentary Boroughs; but the magistrates have not the power of licensing theatres within that district.

30. But has the Lord Chamberlain the sole power of licensing theatres within the metropolitan boroughs?—Yes, the sole power.

31. At Greenwich?—Greenwich is not a metropolitan borough.

32. With regard to Chelsea, that is not a metropolitan borough, is it?—No.

33. The magistrates license the theatres there?—Yes.

34. How is it at Richmond?—Richmond was formerly a Royal residence, and the theatre there was licensed by the Lord Chamberlain under that same section of the Act.

35. Just as the theatre at Brighton was, I suppose?—It was so formerly, but it is no longer the case.

36. When was it discontinued?—When it ceased to be a Royal residence. With regard to the Brighton Theatre, for some time, more from usage than anything else, the Lord Chamberlain went on licensing it; but last year the magistrates called attention to the fact that Brighton had ceased to be a Royal residence, and the Lord Chamberlain discontinued the license. The opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown was taken upon that point, and they considered that it was only as a Royal residence that it was mentioned in the Act of Parliament. It was discontinued only last year; in fact it was licensed for last year.

37. In what way is this licensing now exercised; is there any difficulty whatever in it. Do you ever find that there is any objection to the plays which are sent to be licensed?—The objections are very few; you will see at the end of this memorandum a schedule of plays that have been refused licenses.

38. Do you consider that there is any necessity for the power of licensing plays to be continued in the hands of the Lord Chamberlain?—I have no doubt there would be many more plays of an improper character if that power were discontinued.

39. You think that that acts as a check?—Yes.

40. But you say that that power is never exercised with severity?—Never.

41. Nor is it necessary, I suppose, that any severity should be used?—No, I think not.

42. You state in your memorandum that there are 25 theatres in London; are you aware of the number of music halls that there are?—No, I have no means of knowing the exact number.

43. Have you any statement of the sums of money expended in building music halls?—No; the Lord Chamberlain has no sort of connection with the music halls, therefore I can give no evidence upon that point.

44. But can you state with reference to the theatres, the money that they have cost in building?—No, I am not able to state that.

45. Nor has the Lord Chamberlain any knowledge of the music halls?—None.

46. How many persons will all the theatres in London hold, should you say?—I have made no calculation of that.

47. Will you be kind enough to look at the last page of the paper, which I now hand you (a paper being handed to the Witness); can you state whether that is correct; take Her Majesty's Theatre, will it hold 2,200 persons?—I should say that that was about one-half of what Her Majesty's Theatre would contain.

48. Would

48. Would it contain 4,400 people?—I believe about 4,000. I have heard so, but I have made no calculation.

49. Now take Drury Lane; how many persons do you think it will hold?—I have made no calculation; I can only say what I have been told, but these figures, from what I know, appear to be very much under the mark.

50. Take the Haymarket Theatre?—1,503 is the figure given here.

51. Would the Haymarket Theatre hold more than that?—I cannot say, but I believe it holds more than that.

52. You have stated in this paper, with regard to the music halls, that they are established for the purpose of eating and drinking, that that is their principal object?—Yes.

53. And the theatres for the exhibition of the drama?—Yes.

54. Is that the sole purpose for which all those theatres are established; are you aware that in many of those theatres there is a beer-engine in the pit, and likewise barrels of gin, brandy, and all sorts of spirits, and that the privilege of selling those things in the theatres is a very great source of profit to the managers?—I cannot say that I am aware of that. I know that the Excise license is granted under the Act of Parliament.

55. As a matter of course?—Yes, as a matter of course by the Excise.

56. Whenever a theatre is licensed, the license carries a wine and spirit license as a matter of course?—Exactly.

57. To that extent the theatres are as much public-houses as the music-halls, are they not?—Yes.

58. It only depends, then, on the way in which the place is conducted?—Yes; for, by the Lord Chamberlain's regulations, the theatres are not allowed to sell spirits within the audience part of the theatre.

59. Are you quite sure of that?—Yes.

60. Do you mean they are told that they have not that power?—Under the rules of the Lord Chamberlain, spirits and refreshments are not allowed to be sold within the audience part of the theatre, excepting by the people who walk up and down the pit with baskets.

61. But you are aware that some of them have a beer-engine at the back of the pit, which I presume is the audience part of the theatre; and likewise other refreshments, spirits, and so forth?—May I ask which theatre you are alluding to?

62. I understood that that was so at Astley's, and at theatres at the east end of the town?—There are fixed places for refreshments at all the theatres.

63. You say that they must not be in the audience part of the theatre?—Just so.

64. But how do you know that they are not? I think they are not; they may be quite at the back of the pit.

65. I did not mean that they were in the centre of the pit?—Not so as to interfere with the audience.

66. No; but anybody may step to the back of the pit and drink a glass of beer or spirits?—Yes.

67. The pit and the refreshment bar are in the same area?—Yes; but the refreshment rooms do not interfere with the audience part.

68. But still they are in the audience part; they are not in the saloon in another part of the theatre, as they used to be formerly, though they have them there too; they are actually in the audience part?—The back of the pit is scarcely so, I think.

69. Is not that so with regard to all the small minor theatres?—There may not be space for saloons in all of them.

70. Then they put them in the pit?—Yes; but quite out of the audience part.

71. You mean not among the benches; but that the place is at the back of the pit; and then, besides that, people walk about between the seats with cans of beer, or brandy or gin, or whatever they like, to refresh the people as they are sitting there; is not, therefore, the difference between the theatres and the music-halls this: that in one case a man sits down at a table, and has refreshments put on it; and in the other case, that he goes and stands, as he would in a gin-shop, at the back of the pit; or has it brought to him in a can as he is sitting looking at the performance; is not that the result?—I should scarcely say so.

72. You said just now, that refreshments were carried round by women in the pit, "apples, oranges, ginger-beer?"—Yes.

73. But now, instead of apples, oranges, or ginger-beer, it is wine, spirits, or beer; is it not?—They might do it, but it would be an evasion.

74. How would it be an evasion?—By the rules of the Lord Chamberlain they are not allowed to do so.

75. They have the Excise license for selling those things in a theatre, and women take them round; or else persons go up to the counter at the back of the pit, or wherever it may be?—Yes, and the old basket goes round at some of the theatres.

76. And the new tap is there too?—The new tap is removed from the audience.

77. What, then, is the great distinction between music-halls and theatres?—In one the dramatic element is the chief object, and in the other the drinking is the chief object.

78. But they alike combine both, do they not?—To a certain extent.

79. Now have applications been made to the Lord Chamberlain, by proprietors of music-halls for licenses to perform plays?—Yes.

80. By whom were such applications made?—I have no list here.

81. Was one made by Mr. Strange of the Alhambra?—Yes.

82. Have they made an application from the Oxford Music Hall?—I cannot say from recollection, but I think not.

83. But an application has been made by Mr. Strange?—Yes, by Mr. Strange.

84. To what extent did that application go; what were the performances that he was anxious to have at the Alhambra?—I think they were not dramatic performances.

85. What were they?—Ballets, and things of that kind.

86. Do you think, then, that a ballet is not a stage performance?—I should say myself that a ballet is a performance of the stage.

87. But did he not ask leave to perform ballets?—Yes.

88. Then he did ask to perform stage plays according to you, though you said just now that the performances he was anxious to have were not theatrical performances?—He asked for the license I have mentioned.

89. Why was it refused?—Because I explained to him the Lord Chamberlain's regulations, and he was not prepared to abide by them.

The Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby.

19 March 1866.

90. What are they?—That no smoking or drinking should take place in the audience part of the theatre.

91. That a person was not to sit down at a table and take his refreshment, but he was allowed to go to the back of the pit, or to some other part of the theatre for his refreshments?—Yes.

92. The Lord Chamberlain's regulations forbid smoking altogether?—Yes; he acts on the recommendations of the Committee of 1832 and the Committee of 1853 and 1854, which recommended that theatrical representations should be divided as far as possible from drinking and its accompaniments.

93. Have you given any attention at all to what takes place in those music-halls?—Not much.

94. They have not come under your notice?—I have visited them occasionally, not officially.

95. But, speaking unofficially, from what you have seen, have you noticed any impropriety there?—Speaking generally I should say not; but they differ very much.

96. Take the Alhambra, the Oxford, and Canterbury Hall; have you ever been to Canterbury Hall?—Yes.

97. Is not that a very well-conducted place?—Very well indeed.

98. Is there any impropriety there?—I am not aware of any.

99. Then the distinction between Canterbury Hall and a theatre seems to be this: that in the one case a man takes his refreshment while he is looking at the stage with a table before him, and in the other case he has got to walk to the back of the pit to get it; but they both take it; there is no difference then, except with regard to smoking, is there?—I think the distinction between Canterbury Hall and a theatre is, that in Canterbury Hall the principal object is the sale of spirits and various things, whereas in the theatres it is only an accessory.

100. But whatever is the object, the sale of spirits takes place in each of those places?—It does to some extent, I believe.

101. Have you ever seen any impropriety in, say, the Alhambra, the Oxford, or Weston's Music Hall?—I went the other day to the Alhambra, as I thought I might be asked the question, and certainly the society was not of the best description.

102. But did that society behave properly?—There was no very great impropriety of behaviour.

103. You thought that something might happen afterwards, perhaps; but was there any impropriety in the Alhambra; in the place itself?—The female part of the audience appeared to be composed principally of women of the town, and that description of person.

104. Women of the town likewise go to theatres, do they not?—They do, no doubt, as a part of the audience, so long as they behave themselves properly.

105. In fact, women of the town go everywhere, do they not?—I believe so.

106. Excepting to church, and probably they go there sometimes. However, of course you cannot expect, in a large city, in places of amusement, that the people will all be saints; but taking the audience generally who frequent those places, the bulk of them are respectable people, is not that so?—It differs very much in different parts of the town; at the Canterbury I saw nothing improper; I visited one at the east end of London, called the Cambridge Music Hall, and the audience was principally artizans.

107. With their wives?—Yes, with their wives; but at the Alhambra it was very different.

108. Now, with regard to what you saw at the Cambridge Music Hall, do you not think that that is a very beneficial thing?—I saw nothing to complain of.

109. If the artizan had not been there with his wife, would he not, in all probability, have been sitting in a public-house, or might he not, at all events?—To my mind he was sitting in a public-house.

110. But his wife was with him?—Yes; I think that place was extremely well conducted.

111. Is it not a beneficial thing that a man and his wife should amuse themselves together; the wife going along with him at all events restrains him from committing any excess?—Certainly.

112. Probably they would not have liked to go to a theatre, to sit in one spot all the time and have the trouble of getting refreshments between the acts; and if they prefer sitting at a table throughout the whole of the evening, is there any objection to their doing that, that you can see?—None that I can see.

113. There being no objection whatever to their doing that, and seeing the performances at present exhibited, would it not, in your opinion, be still better if the performances were still better; would it not be a great advantage to them if the performances were improved, that is to say, instead of being restricted, as many of those places are, to tumbling, and singing comic songs, and so on, that they should be able to enact a burletta, as they would in France, or a vaudeville, or what answers to a vaudeville here, or any of those light performances which they have at some of the theatres; do you see any objection to that?—I can see none, except that at present it is contrary to the Act of Parliament.

114. Do you think it would be an advantage if the Act were altered so that there should be greater freedom, and that the music-halls should have the power of giving better performances subject, if you please, to a license by the Lord Chamberlain?—I think there should be some license.

115. Seeing that they have become quite established in the metropolis, you conceive that it would be impossible to put an end to them, and the requirements of the public being so great in that way, that it is necessary they should remain?—I think so certainly.

116. That being granted, would it not be very beneficial if the style of the performance at the music-halls was improved, and more extended, so that they could play a little opera, or ballet, or act light pieces, subject to the Lord Chamberlain ascertaining that those were proper pieces to be exhibited; do you think that that would be an advantage?—I am scarcely prepared to say; it requires a little consideration.

117. But you think as they are established now that you could not put an end to them?—No, I think not, certainly; if kept under proper restrictions, they are very good things.

118. Do you not think it would be an advantage to improve the performances?—Yes, no doubt it would be so.

119. And

119. And that they should be placed under the Lord Chamberlain?—I do not know how that would be.

120. That would give the Lord Chamberlain a good many more plays to look at?—No doubt they must be subject to regulations, not only with regard to the class of performances but with reference to the buildings.

121. We will presume that the building is on the established principle, that is to say, subject to proper requirements and regulations, and that either the Lord Chamberlain, or the magistrates, should have the power of insisting that the buildings should be made so as to be commodious and safe?—Yes, that should be so of course.

122. That being so, and the music-halls being presumed to be on the established principle with regard to the buildings, then supposing, to go a step farther, that their performances should be improved, and that they should be allowed to enact stage plays, whether large stage plays or not, and whether Shakspeare or not (though I presume if they acted Shakspeare, and it suited the audience, it would be more elevating than the present performances), would it not in your opinion be an advantage that the privilege in question should be granted to these places?—I wish to give no opinion on that; but as it stands at present, the opinion of two Committees of the House of Commons who have sat on that question has been that the drama and drinking should be separated as far as possible, and on that principle the Lord Chamberlain has acted.

123. But that is years ago; have you no opinion of your own that you can offer to this Committee?—That was in 1854.

124. Yes, 12 years ago, but we march very rapidly in these times (we change our opinions probably in a week), and it appears, at all events, that the public entertain an entirely different opinion to that Committee, which they show by patronizing those places?—They patronize those places no doubt.

125. But in your opinion do you think it would be an advantage to allow a better style of performances at those places?—My own opinion is, that I agree with the recommendation of the Committee of the House of Commons which sat in 1854.

126. To separate drinking and the drama?—Yes, to separate drinking and the drama.

127. Then, if that were so, you would not allow the managers of theatres to take advantage of that Inland Revenue Act?—I think that section of the Act should be repealed; there should always be some means of refreshment at theatres, of course.

128. You mean that persons frequenting theatres should be confined to refreshments in the way of ices, ginger beer, and so on?—No, I do not say that.

129. Mr. O'Beirne.] What is your practice with regard to the rules for theatres; do you give those rules to the managers and require them to give bond for their observance?—You will see in the Memorandum a copy of the bond which the managers enter into, but the Act of 6 & 7 Vict. is very vague with regard to the power of the Lord Chamberlain to frame rules.

130. But the Lord Chamberlain does frame rules?—Yes, because he has the power to withdraw the licenses at the end of the year; he makes them conditional.

131. Mr. Locke.] How would you manage the refreshment system at theatres?—At all events I think they should apply for their Excise licenses, under some engagement, to the magistrates. That should be quite separate, I think.

132. You think that section 7 of the 5 & 6 W. 4, c. 39, which refers to this subject, should be repealed?—Yes, certainly the Act of Will. 4.

133. Then you would confine the magistrates to the licensing for spirits, and the Lord Chamberlain to licensing the theatres?—The Lord Chamberlain for the theatres, and, if they wanted a spirit license, they might apply in another form. After the passing of the Act of Will. 4 the publicans memorialised the Treasury, that the operation of that Act was very prejudicial to them, and upon that the Treasury issued a Treasury order to the Excise to suspend that Act. That Act was suspended for many years, but when the music-halls began their present very attractive performances, the theatres thought that they were placed at a very great disadvantage. The managers memorialised the Treasury, and the Treasury took the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown on the point, and they reported that to suspend the Act of Parliament by a Treasury order was not legal, and the Treasury order was consequently, in turn, suspended.

134. That was in 1858, during Lord Derby's government; Sir FitzRoy Kelly, and Sir Hugh Cairns gave that opinion?—I think so.

135. Since that it has never been disputed, has it?—No.

136. It was held that the word "may" meant "must," as is usually the case, and since then that license has been given as a matter of course?—Yes.

137. Then the theatres take upon themselves the privileges of public-houses?—They take the privilege which they have under the Act of selling refreshments.

138. The Lord Chamberlain as far as possible, without interfering vexatiously, permits them to sell spirits and refreshments, but not to make it the primary object of their houses; is that the way in which you would put it?—Yes.

139. Now with regard to the music halls; the music-halls are licensed by 25 Geo. 2, c. 30?—Yes.

140. That was an Act which was passed in 1751, which enabled magistrates to license houses for music, dancing, and public entertainments after five o'clock in the afternoon. Section 4 of the Act excepts the patent theatres, Crown licenses, and the Lord Chamberlain's licenses from the penalties of the Act?—Just so.

141. It is under that Act of Parliament that all those music-halls are licensed?—I believe so.

142. But now a spirit licensing Act exists besides?—Yes.

143. Which is quite distinct?—Yes, quite distinct.

144. The licenses under that Act are granted in the spring, and the licenses under this Act are granted in October, I believe?—I do not know, but I dare say it is so.

145. Have not the magistrates, therefore, a double check on these music-halls, as the law at present exists, supposing there were any improper conduct going on there; namely, they have the power of refusing the spirit license, and they have likewise the power of refusing the music and dancing license, and consequently putting an end to those establishments; do you not think that that is quite sufficient for the purpose of inducing ducing the persons who own those places to carry them on properly?—I can give no opinion on that subject, as I have no knowledge of the rules of the magistrates.

146. But, however, there is that power; can the Lord Chamberlain exercise his powers at once, and shut up a theatre if he pleases?—If anything improper took place, I think he would assume that power at all events.

147. But whether the Lord Chamberlain has that power or not, you are not sure?—The Act is a very doubtful Act altogether, but I think under the rules which he makes, he would do so. I think that the Act, 6 & 7 Vict., is a very imperfect Act; the power of framing rules is omitted altogether.

148. At all events your opinion is that that Act might be properly repealed and fresh legislation take place on the subject?—I think so, but the Lord Chamberlain has had no difficulty under that Act whatever. He has had to deal with the managers of theatres, and they have always been most anxious to do whatever he has suggested should be done.

149. Sir Arthur Buller.] The licenses are for fixed periods, I presume?—Usually, but that is not binding in any way.

150. You think that the Lord Chamberlain could revoke his license?—It never has been done, I think, of late years.

151. Mr. Locke.] Did any case ever occur in which the Lord Chamberlain revoked his license?—I cannot say from recollection that there has.

152. Nor in which he was desirous of doing so?—Not within my recollection.

153. Mr. Du Cane.] Not since the commencement of the present century?—I am not aware of any.

154. Mr. Locke.] I think the Lord Chamberlain as you state has lately granted some very peculiar licenses, namely, to the Hanover Square Rooms, Willis's Rooms, and several other places of entertainment like that, to enable them to have performances before five o'clock?—Yes.

155. The music and dancing license, which license is granted by a magistrate under the 25 Geo. 2, c. 30, enables the magistrate to license places for public entertainment after five o'clock?—Yes.

156. Hitherto the Hanover Square Rooms and so on have been licensed by the magistrates?—Yes.

157. And never I believe until the last sessions at Middlesex was any objection taken to that proceeding?—I believe not.

158. The morning concerts all took place as usual?—Yes.

159. But in consequence of this interference with the music-halls notice was given at the Middlesex sessions, that though it was not intended to enforce the provisions of the 25 Geo. 2, c. 30, then, they would be enforced at the next licensing sessions. And these provisions made it imperative on the magistrates, where a performance had taken place before five o'clock, to take away the license and never grant it to the person who held it again; that is the law, is it not?—That is the law.

160. Now, how is it that the Lord Chamberlain has attempted to get over the law, he not having licensed those places at all hitherto?—After that notice was given, several of the proprietors of the concert-rooms, where morning concerts had taken place, appealed to the Lord Chamberlain to protect them, in order to enable that class of entertainment called morning concerts to be carried on as before. The Lord Chamberlain submitted the case to the law officers of the Crown, and they gave it as their opinion, that under 25 Geo. 2, c. 30, the Lord Chamberlain reserved his rights to give licenses for music and other entertainments such as he had given before that Act. Upon this the Lord Chamberlain desired me to consult with Mr. Pownall, the Chairman of the Middlesex Magistrates, and with his concurrence, and with the concurrence of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, the Lord Chamberlain determined to issue licenses to the proprietors of the concert rooms to give the same performances previous to five o'clock in the afternoon, as the magistrate's license enables them to give after that hour.

161. Under what power does the Lord Chamberlain do that?—Under the prerogative of the Crown, acknowledged by the Act of 25 Geo. 2.

162. You say that the opinions of the law officers of the Crown have been taken, and that they say 6 & 7 Vict. does not affect that in any way?—Just so.

163. That the powers (in that respect) of the Act in question are still in force?—Yes, 25 Geo. 2.

164. But that is empowering the magistrates; is there any clause in it empowering the Lord Chamberlain?—The 4th section of that Act, which you will find in the appendix, says, "That nothing in this Act contained shall extend or be construed to extend to the Theatres Royal in Drury-lane and Covent Garden, or the theatres commonly called the King's Theatre, in the Haymarket, or any of them, nor to such performances and public entertainments as are or shall be lawfully exercised and carried on under or by virtue of letters patents, or license of the Crown, or the license of the Lord Chamberlain of His Majesty's household, anything herein contained notwithstanding."

165. The opinion of the law officers of the Crown was that that preserved the Lord Chamberlain's right?—Yes, that it preserved his right. The entertainments which are lawfully given and carried on under that section you will find stated on page 8, and you will see that every kind of entertainment has been given under that Act or under the Royal Prerogative.

166. That gives the date?—Yes; there were many other classes of performances; these are only a certain number selected as showing the variety of things licensed by the Lord Chamberlain from time to time.

167. That opinion of the law officers of the Crown is acted on in granting those licenses?—Yes.

168. Has the Lord Chamberlain ever made any restrictions in them?—None, except producing the license of the magistrates; he requires that that should be produced which enables them to give performances after five o'clock, and upon that he grants the license before five o'clock.

169. That is what you may call a license in aid of the magistrates?—Exactly.

170. Mr. Du Cane.] On what special grounds has the Lord Chamberlain refused a license for a play at any time?—You will see, in Appendix K., that the instances given tell their own story. The object has been principally to exclude any scriptural subject, or plays in which highwaymen or immorality are exalted, and any personal, or personally political questions.

171. I see that in 13 years only 19 plays have been refused?—That is all.

172. Then of course that has had a beneficial effect, I mean the prohibition of those improper plays?—I think there are certainly some plays that should not be performed.

173. Do you think that in the absence of that power of prohibition many plays of a similar character would have been written, and would have been produced?—Probably; the managers know very well the class of plays that are prohibited.

174. And they do not encourage that style of dramatic literature?—Perhaps not.

175. You think it would be necessary, provided the music halls were put on the same footing as the theatres with regard to dramatic performances, that either the Lord Chamberlain or the magistrate should have this prohibitory power?—There should be some restriction, certainly.

176. You have stated that you have visited the music-halls, was that with a view to this inquiry?—No; I have visited them from time to time for some years.

177. As a matter of curiosity?—As a matter of curiosity.

178. You said, I think, that at some of those music-halls the audience appeared to be of a very respectable character, and at others not so, and your remarks had reference especially to the Alhambra?—More, I think, the Alhambra and the one in the Strand than any other that I visited.

179. Should you say that at the Alhambra there were any respectable tradesmen present with their wives and daughters?—I cannot say that I saw any.

180. The women who were there were principally, in your opinion, women of the town?—They appeared to be exercising their calling most openly.

181. Those women of the town are not excluded from the theatres, are they?—Not so long as they conduct themselves well; they are treated like the rest of the public.

182. Were there more women of the town at the Alhambra and at the Strand Music Hall than you have witnessed at any theatre?—Oh, certainly there were.

183. You have stated that, in your opinion, it would be advisible to separate the drama and the drinking; you did not assign any grounds for it, but I think your opinion is very valuable, and I should like more particularly to hear your reasons?—I think the drama has been considered always as an art, and it has been fostered with that view from time immemorial; it would be a great pity to degrade it. It has been used for the education of the people, and mixing it up with drinking as a principal attraction would, in my opinion, be a degradation.

184. Mr. Miller.] I see in this paper that the Lord Chamberlain grants licenses to the building, and also for the performing of particular plays, under 6 & 7 Vict.?—Yes.

185. The Appendix K represents the number of plays that he has prohibited?—Yes.

186. Now, I do not quite understand whether he withdrew his license from the theatre, or for the performance of that particular play?—Under 6 & 7 Vict. before a play is performed it is sent to an officer of the Lord Chamberlain's department, called the Examiner of Plays; he looks through that play, and if he sees nothing objectionable in it, he sends, for the Lord Chamberlain's signature, a form of license for that play; if he sees anything which to his mind is objectionable he sends it to me, and it is then brought to the notice of the Lord Chamberlain, who gives his directions on it.

187. Then he refuses his license to that play?—He refuses his license to that play.

188. But he does not withdraw his license from that theatre?—No; that play is merely banished, and there is an end of it.

189. Mr. Locke.] In refusing the license for a play is any reason stated?—I do not know whether it is actually given in writing, but the author or manager who sends it is made perfectly to understand the reason.

190. Mr. Miller.] From your experience in this matter, supposing all those music-halls were put on the same footing as the theatres, do you think it would be possible from night to night to restrain particular performances acted within those music-halls?—I think it would be very difficult; it would require a very large staff.

191. You could grant licenses to those music-halls for general performances, but you could not, as in the case of a theatre, withhold your license from any particular performance that is carried on by them?—They vary their performances so constantly, that it would be difficult for them to send in their manuscripts, and still more difficult and onerous for us to be called upon to examine them.

192. I will ask you generally, could you suggest any security for morality and propriety of conduct within this large number of music-halls, if they were allowed to be licensed for the performance of plays generally; I mean any mode by which the propriety of those places should be preserved?—I can see none other than that of a general license for the building in the first place, and then for any larger pieces that were produced, but it would be very difficult, I think.

193. In the large theatres, when you withhold your license from a particular play, that is considered to be inflicting a severe loss, or a contemplated loss or injury, upon the proprietor of the theatre, is it not?—I think that to a large theatre there has been no play refused; it is more at the minor theatres; the play of La Dame aux Camelias, which was refused for Drury Lane, was a play which had great success in Paris. I forget who was the manager of Drury Lane then, but it was not quite a temple of the classic drama at that time.

194. Mr. Powell.] That is the same play as the opera of La Traviata, is it not?—Yes.

195. Mr. Miller.] As a general rule, how would you describe the audiences which attend the regular theatres, such as Drury Lane and Covent Garden, and those music-halls and dancing-shops?—I think that the pit and gallery audiences at theatres probably attend the music-halls too; they are the same class of people; those who go to the boxes and stalls do not go to music-halls, I should say.

196. Can persons attend the great theatres, supposing prostitutes are present, without being offended by them?—They only go there as part of the audience.

197. But at other places, would people be more liable to be attracted or offended by their presence than in the great theatres?—Not in all of them.

19 March 1866.

198. Do they not walk about?—At one or two of those places they do.

199. And they drink together, I suppose. Now, with regard to the costume of those women who walk about those places, is there anything objectionable in that?—No.

200. Taking the ballet performance at those music-halls, is it of the same character as you see in theatres; or is it of a more offensive character?—No, I think not; it is much the same; and, indeed, I saw a remarkably good performance at the Alhambra.

201. Mr. Clay.] Does the authority of the Lord Chamberlain's office extend to Ireland?—No, not at all.

202. Under whose authority is the licensing of the plays and the police regulations of theatres in Ireland?—I believe that it is under the authority of the Lord Lieutenant, or some officer of his.

203. Are you aware that at the Irish theatres smoking in the audience part of the theatre is very common?—It is a breach of the rule, I think.

204. You think that a rule similar to our own exists in Ireland?—Yes, I believe so; I have no experience except having been to the Theatre Royal in Dublin.

205. But take the provincial theatres, such as Cork, Limerick, and Derry, and so on, are you aware that smoking goes on all over the house?—No, I have never heard that. They are licensed by the justices there just the same as they are here, I believe.

206. When you have been to those music-halls you have heard, I suppose, music there?—Yes.

207. Of what class is that music?—At some of them it is very good indeed. At the Oxford I heard a selection of music from various operas very well performed; and at Canterbury Hall I believe it was the same kind of music.

208. And at the Alhambra, how was it?—I did not stay there 10 minutes.

209. Do you recollect from what operas you heard selections?—No, it is some time ago; three or four years ago.

210. Are you aware generally that the very choicest class of music is given in selections at the principal music-halls?—I see the advertisements of them, that is all the knowledge I have.

211. You have no doubt that that is the fact, have you?—I believe it is the fact.

212. If that is so would you not modify your opinion when you say that the music-halls are instituted for eating and drinking; would you not say also that they were more or less instituted for music?—If you trace the history of them, you would find that they began from a public-house license; there is no doubt that in some of those music-halls the music is remarkably well given owing to the competition among them.

213. Do you think that before the establishment of those music-halls the English working classes and trading classes ever had an opportunity of hearing at so cheap a price such excellent music as that given at those music-halls?—I dare say not; I have no means of knowing.

214. Do you know the price of entrance to the music-halls generally?—No; I paid one shilling when I went to the Alhambra.

215. Can you say that within those music-halls the performances are of the highest order?—I should say by the advertisements that the Oxford music was a very good selection of music, and also the Canterbury Hall; but I have not studied the subject much.

216. The Alhambra you cannot speak to?—I think the performances there are more in the line of ballet.

217. But you are not aware that they have a remarkably good selection of music there?—I can give no opinion.

218. Are you aware that the works from which they take their selections are very much those of Donizetti, and Gounod, and Offenbach?—I do not know.

219. Have you ever been in music-halls of a lower character than those of which we have now been speaking?—I mentioned that I visited one at the east end of London, which was remarkably well conducted.

220. Can you tell me whether at the Strand Music Hall they used to give selections from fine music, or whether the entertainment was chiefly imitation of drunken negroes, with comic songs, and so on?—The night that I was there, two years ago, the entertainment was of that class.

221. There was no selection of a high order of music?—I cannot say from recollection.

222. Do you know whether it is open now?—I think I saw a large placard upon it the last time I went down the Strand.

223. Should you suppose that that music-hall had been a failing concern?—Yes, I have seen an announcement that the Company is winding up.

224. Has such experience as you have had at those music-halls led you to believe that those which have been the most profitable speculations have been those which have given the highest class of music?—I can give no opinion upon that subject; I have no means of knowing.

225. You have said that supposing the licensing was done away with, and all the theatres thrown open, you would find it difficult to suggest a system for their proper regulation; did you refer to the plays that were to be given, or to the internal regulations of the theatres?—No; what I said was that I thought it would be almost impossible to have a general superintendence of every concert-room and music-hall in London at the same time.

226. Would not the ordinary police regulations be sufficient to keep all those places within the limits of respectable conduct?—Probably they would.

227. Do you exercise any supervision over the pieces played at the Italian Opera?—Yes, they are all licensed in the same way.

228. Then you gave a license for the performance of La Traviata?—That was done before I went to the Lord Chamberlain's Office, and under a different Examiner of Plays.

229. But there was a license given for that opera?—The license was granted.

230. Is it not the fact that a license was refused for the English version of the same piece to be played at one of our own theatres?—Yes.

231. Was that when you were at the Lord Chamberlain's Office?—Yes.

232. Can you explain how it was that the same piece which was not deemed hurtful to the morals of the higher classes was deemed dangerous to the audiences of the theatres?—If I had been there the license would have been refused in the first instance; but certainly at the Italian Opera the the same number of persons would not have the same opportunity of hearing it as if it had been licensed as an English play, because the knowledge of Italian is not general.

233. Do you think it a story which should not have been licensed in any shape at any theatre?—That is my opinion.

234. Chairman.] Do you find generally any inconvenience in the present system of double jurisdiction between the magistrates and the Lord Chamberlain's Office?—I think that the difficulties that have arisen between the music-halls and the theatres have principally been from the imperfect nature of the Act of Parliament.

235. What is the chief imperfection which you consider there is in the Act of Parliament?—I think that within the metropolitan district there are five different jurisdictions: there is the Lord Chamberlain licensing theatres under the 6th and 7th Vict., and he has the power of licensing for other entertainments under the Royal prerogative sanctioned by that Act of 25 Geo. 2; then there are the justices of Middlesex licensing for music and dancing under the Act of the 25 Geo. 2; and for theatres beyond the Lord Chamberlain's jurisdiction, under the 6 & 7 Vict., as well as the justices for Kent, for Surrey, and probably for Essex also, all possibly taking different views of the Act of Parliament. Then I think that the authorities of the City of London come in, and I am of opinion that that multiplicity of jurisdiction is a great mistake.

236. Is that on account of the different views which might prevail in the different tribunals?—Yes.

237. So that it might happen that a particular decision would be given by the Lord Chamberlain in one case, whereas in the same case the Middlesex magistrates might give another decision?—Yes.

238. What would you recommend as the best means of getting over that difficulty?—I think that there should be one responsible officer to license for the metropolis, that would be the simplest plan; the justices in some cases may enter into the question of the safety of the building, and in other cases they may not, there is nothing laid down in the Act. A case arose in this way some years ago (I think it was in the year 1857 or 1858), the proprietor of the Alhambra applied to the Lord Chamberlain for a license for the Alhambra; the Lord Chamberlain took the usual course; he sent an inspector, a professional surveyor, to inspect the building. The surveyor reported that one of the galleries was unsafe for so large a number of persons as it was capable of holding, and that there was only one entrance for the whole audience. The Lord Chamberlain refused the license, but, at the same time, the proprietor had applied to the justices, and the justices, I believe, without any examination, granted the license to the building.

239. Do you know whether the justices consider the safety of the building in granting licenses; is that one of the principal points to which they look?—I have no knowledge personally of that beyond what I have heard.

240. The Lord Chamberlain is guided by several considerations in granting licenses, I suppose; what considerations would guide him either to give or refuse a license to a new theatre, or to a music hall?—He has endeavoured, as far as possible, to separate his jurisdiction from that of the justices, in order to avoid a conflict of jurisdiction, therefore he refuses generally to give licenses to music halls, or places licensed by the justices, for music and dancing.

241. But can the justices license those music halls for theatrical entertainments?—No. Another great fault in the Acts is the vague definition of "stage plays" in one Act, and "music and dancing" in the other.

242. I understand that the Lord Chamberlain does not grant licenses to music halls in order to avoid conflict of jurisdiction, but the magistrates cannot grant stage-play licenses?—No.

243. Therefore the present system would shut the music halls out entirely from stage plays?—Yes.

244. Therefore a change of the law would have this effect, not only to remove the conflicting jurisdiction, but to enable the music halls to do what they cannot do now?—That might be the effect if the new Act provided that.

245. Cannot a magistrate grant licenses for stage plays at all within the boundaries of the Lord Chamberlain's jurisdiction?—The justices cannot do it within his jurisdiction.

246. Have they the power beyond that to do it under the Act of 6 & 7 Vict.?—Yes, they do it under the same Act of 6 & 7 Vict.

247. Then, in recommending any change of the law, you would have to consider, first, the question of double jurisdiction, and, in the next place, the question of policy, whether the music halls should represent stage plays at all?—Exactly.

248. At present they can only receive a license from the Lord Chamberlain?—That is so.

249. The Lord Chamberlain would not grant them any license for theatrical entertainments?—He has granted his licenses for theatres, for what may properly be considered a theatre, but not for places where various entertainments are given, such as they give at music halls.

250. Then, supposing there are houses open without any license at all, what steps would the Lord Chamberlain take, or would he take any steps?—There is another fault in the Act, that no person is appointed to carry out its provisions. The Lord Chamberlain has not felt himself called upon to act in such cases, but has left it to anybody who felt himself injured by an unlicensed place; to the police in some cases, and in others to the manager of an adjoining theatre.

251. Would the police interfere, simply from the fact of there being no license, provided everything was carried on respectably?—No, I believe not.

252. Then there is no one to interfere with unlicensed houses, unless private individuals chose to take the matter up?—Practically that is so; the police have the power of interference, but they have rarely interfered.

253. The police have the power of interference, and they would take it up if it was a nuisance to the neighbourhood, or it might be taken up from fear of competition?—Exactly.

254. In your recollection, have the majority of those unlicensed places been pulled up on account of competing with licensed establishments, or on account of injuring the neighbourhood?—Principally, I think, by persons who fancied that they had been injured by the competion.

255. But, in your opinion, should the question of competition enter into the case at all?—That is the great fault of the Act, that there is no one appointed to carry it out, it is left to private individuals.

256. But would the Lord Chamberlain be guided by that view, that there were too many or too few theatres in granting licenses?—Up to this time, there have been hardly any bonâ fide applications for what can be considered theatres; there have been many applications to cover points in the justices licenses, and to enable music halls and places, which are not properly speaking theatres, to give those quasi theatrical entertainments.

257. Have those applications been invariably refused?—Almost all of them have been refused; there have been cases of application for license to give theatrical entertainments for charities and other purposes, but so great was the inconvenience found in the survey which the Lord Chamberlain had to make to be sure that the building was safe, that he thought it better to discontinue those occasional licenses.

258. I suppose that the question of the safety of the building is one of the chief points which would guide the Lord Chamberlain in granting his license?—Yes.

259. You would recommend that both the theatres and the music halls should be put under one authority?—It would simplify matters very much.

260. You think that would get over the difficulty of the definition of a stage play?—Yes, provided the licensing authority had the power of defining what class of entertainment should be given, in fact, that he should define what the building was fit for.

261. Do you think it is possible to divide the entertainments into classes, so as to separate the different kinds of entertainments?—I should think that that might be done, for instance, they might be classed as theatres in one case and music halls in another, where a certain amount of scenery would be exhibited. Another would be concert rooms proper, where concerts might take place; and another would be dancing rooms, and that class of entertainment.

262. Do you think that in a new Act, it would be wiser to put them all in one class, to have one licence leaving them to do whatever they like, or to grant a different license according to the different class of entertainment?—To grant a different class of license according to the different class of entertainments.

263. But do you think that power of granting different licenses could be given to one officer?—I think it would simplify the matter, and make it more easy to carry it into effect if it were so.

264. But at present, are there any funds at the disposal of the Lord Chamberlain's office, for carrying out the provisions of the Act of Parliament?—No, at present there are none, the Lord Chamberlain is paid from the civil list.

265. Do you think that the Lord Chamberlain's office is competent or would be competent, under a change of system, to carry out the system of licensing generally on a broader scale, for the whole of the metropolitan district?—He would require some additions to his staff to carry out so large a function.

266. Are there any analogous duties performed by the Lord Chamberlain at all?—Yes, the supervision of theatres altogether.

267. But beyond that?—No more.

268. What staff is employed altogether, in connection with the theatres in the Lord Chamberlain's office?—All the clerks in the office are employed in the theatrical correspondence as well as that on other subjects; then there is the examiner of plays, who examines the plays and assists at the examination of the buildings at the annual survey. I also, myself, have gone round to all the theatres of late years.

269. In the memorandum that you put in, there is the case of the Rotunda?—Yes, the case on page 16 of the Memorandum, which I have put in.

270. Is that a case which would form a good example of the system on which the Lord Chamberlain treats the licenses?—That was the system at that time.

271. Does that system still continue to be the system always followed?—Yes.

272. Now, if you will refer to that return, you will see that the license was refused, on the application of the neighbourhood?—Yes.

273. Do you frequently have similar instances, of a neighbourhood objecting to the opening of places of that kind?—There have been so few places where applications of the kind have taken place, that I cannot say.

274. But if you had the licensing of music-halls, no doubt you would have more petitions of this kind?—Yes, I suppose so.

275. And if such a system of licensing was adopted, that the whole should be placed under one officer, what considerations in your judgment ought to guide the granting of a license to a music-hall, for stage entertainments?—I have hardly considered that question sufficiently to be able to give an answer.

276. Would you consider the safety of the building?—The safety of the building certainly would be the first consideration, and the public morality to a certain extent.

277. You would consider the character of the entertainment also, I suppose?—Yes, I should consider the character of the entertainment.

278. Would you require that the entertainments of the music-halls should be watched, in the same way as the entertainments of the theatres are watched?—You refer to the Censorship Clause? I hardly know enough of the entertainments given at the music-halls, to be enabled to say.

279. The Lord Chamberlain would not interfere now if there was any entertainment given at the music halls of a questionable character, would he?—He has nothing whatever to say to the music halls.

280. They have no license from him, and if a music hall were performing a stage play it is not his duty to interfere?—It is not his duty to interfere.

281. With regard to the beer licenses, would not it cause some confusion if the whole were put under one officer who had not the power of granting such licenses?—I have already stated, in answer to the Honourable Member for Southwark, that I thought that Act of Will. 4 should be abolished; I think that the Excise licensing should be separate altogether.

282. Mr. Powell.] Separate from what?—Separate from the licensing for entertainments.

283. You have said something about the records; are those records very concise, or do they go into the history of what applications have been made?—It is merely the correspondence from time to time.

284. Has that been preserved from early days?—More or less.

285. Let me refer you to the definition of saloons saloons, as it appears in your memorandum: "Several places called saloons sprang up, which were really public houses, enlivened by theatrical entertainments:" how do they differ (in definition at least) from the Alhambra, except in size?—I must explain to you that they came under the Lord Chamberlain's license by the Act of 6 & 7 Vict.; they were licensed by the justices of the peace formerly for all kinds of general entertainments, and they did give theatrical entertainments. Then, in 1843, when the Act of 6 & 7 Vict. passed, they came under the Lord Chamberlain, and he continued his licenses to all the buildings formerly licensed by the justices; but they were places at which quasi theatrical entertainments took place, and they were constructed like theatres.

286. They would now be wholly taken from your jurisdiction?—No, they have ceased to exist; they have become theatres, and are subject to the same regulations. In former times there were two licenses; one to the theatres and one to the saloons.

287. You now cease to license saloons?—We now cease to license saloons.

288. Whence does the Lord Chamberlain derive his authority to give a license to sell spirits in a theatre?—He has no authority.

289. But before the license was granted by the Excise, in an ordinary theatre, I presume that refreshments were supplied to those that desired them?—They were supplied under the rose, I believe.

290. There was no legal authority?—None.

291. Now, with regard to non-application to your office to license a new theatre; do you think that that arises from an apprehension in any person's mind that you would not grant the license?—I have no reason to think so; every application has been considered on its merits, and decided on its merits.

292. I presume the application would be made before the building was commenced?—It should. The principle on which the Lord Chamberlain grants licenses to new theatres is that the proposed site of the building is first specified; it is then inspected, and if it is considered satisfactory, the Lord Chamberlain grants permission for the plans to be sent in.

293. Take the new Covent Garden and the new Adelphi theatres, and so on; were the plans sent in before the building was commenced?—Covent Garden was a patent theatre, and would have no license from the Lord Chamberlain; they performed under a patent granted in the reign of Charles II.

294. Take the new Adelphi and the new Surrey theatres, and the Strand theatre, and apply the same question to them?—The new Surrey theatre plans were deposited in the Lord Chamberlain's office.

295. I suppose that in all cases the plans would be deposited now in the Lord Chamberlain's office?—Yes.

296. The question of the safety of the building would turn a good deal upon the means of exit?—Yes.

297. You guard the means of exit by having large galleries and ample doorways; do you watch the theatres from time to time to see that those doors are kept open?—No; but there is an annual inspection, and every sort of obstruction is removed.

298. What security have you that the doors opening outwards (which are not absolutely necessary, but are desirable,) are open at every time of the performance?—There is no constant supervision to see that that is the case; but the managers are told to make no alterations without giving notice to the Lord Chamberlain's Office.

299. There is another source of danger, even assuming that your galleries and doors are sufficient, and that is overcrowding; you exercise no superintendence over that, from time to time, do you?—No, I think not; it would be impossible.

300. As to what goes on behind the scenes, you have no superintendence whatever over that, have you?—It would be impossible to superintend it entirely, but it is understood that that is conducted with propriety.

301. Should you take into consideration any reasonable complaints that were made to you when an application was made to renew the license?—Yes, certainly.

302. What funds have you to draw upon, in the exercise of your jurisdiction?—None whatever.

303. Do you observe what is going on in music-halls at all, to see whether anything happens which conflicts with the law?—We have no sort of jurisdiction over music-halls.

304. Take this advertisement, which appears in one of the papers to-day: "The Oxford.—On Tuesday next will be produced, first time in this country, a comic opera, by Adolphe Adam, entitled 'If I were King,' supported by the whole of the operatic company;" is it any part of your duty to see whether that performance is or is not a violation of the statute?—I think I have already stated that the Lord Chamberlain does not consider himself a public prosecutor: but no doubt that would be distinctly a violation of the Act.

305. There is another: "Royal Alhambra Palace.—This splendid building, with all its accessories, to be let for morning performances, on moderate terms;" should you notice that as a violation of the law?—No. The Lord Chamberlain has confined himself entirely to buildings licensed by him.

306. With regard to the refusal of plays; supposing a play were in the main such as you approved, but contained a passage to which you took exception, would you give the play back for revision?—The Examiner usually strikes out those parts, if they are very slight alterations, and returns the play in that state, and his alterations are bound to be carried out by the manager; the play is performed as licensed by him, in fact.

307. Supposing it were to happen that the refreshment stall for the pit was so situated that people were to be continually passing to and fro during the performance, so that it would be really a constant process of drinking; should you consider that a violation of your rule?—Certainly.

308. You would visit such a case with your refusal when the application was made for a new license, would you?—Certainly.

309. With regard to the presence of abandoned women in those music-halls, you have stated that although you consider their presence at the theatre scarcely observable at all, yet that at the music-halls, where they are walking about, they are conspicuous; those are two different things?—Yes, I think so; I only stated that I saw it at the music-halls as one of the public, and not in any official capacity.

The Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby.

19 March 1866.

310. Mr. Locke.] You did not go to those places in your official capacity?—Not in my official capacity.

311. Mr. Powell.] Something was stated by you about mechanics and their wives going to the music-halls; should you think that a mechanic who had any regard for the morality of his daughters would send them to a music-hall?—I stated that at the Cambridge Hall, at the east end, I never saw a more respectable audience, and that there seemed none of that class of females.

312. You draw a distinction in favour of the east end?—No, I state the same thing with regard to the Canterbury Hall; I do not say that there were none of those women, but they were not openly following their calling.

313. Do you think that the difference of respectability is within the control of the manager, or does it depend on the locality and other accidents?—I dare say it does depend on the locality and other accidents in some degree.

314. Should you think, from the nature of the entertainments and the whole atmosphere of the place, there would be more difficulty in preserving morality in a music-hall than in a theatre?—No, I should think not beyond the fact that there is an unlimited amount of drinking going on in the music-halls, and therefore the people may be more liable to drunkenness.

315. Mr. Selwin.] You have stated, that in the year 1846, it was required that the police should be present in all the theatres; was that done with a view of maintaining the Lord Chamberlain's authority over them?—No, it was in consequence of an application from the police, but I believe practically, that at almost all the respectable theatres policemen are engaged by the managers to keep order.

316. Do not the police report to the Lord Chamberlain if any infringement of the rules takes place?—No; they have nothing whatever to say to that.

317. You have no supervision of that sort?—No.

318. Would the police come to your office to report if they saw anything wrong?—I have begged the Commissioner of Police always to report any case of misconduct, and the newspapers are always watched to see if any such cases are brought up to the police courts; with regard to the theatres, there has hardly been a case reported for many years.

319. You have said that the Lord Chamberlain is not exercising any authority over those music-halls; are you aware whether the police are instructed by Sir Richard Mayne to exercise any supervision there?—I cannot say.

320. Now with regard to the number of people which the theatres can contain, there was a great difference; but when the theatres are inspected before they are licensed, do you take no memorandum of the number of people which they would contain?—Yes, with new theatres we should be able to do that; I have no doubt whatever that I could in a very short time get that; I have no doubt an accurate statement exists in the office.

321. Mr. Powell.] Will you put that statement in?—Yes, I will do so.

322. Mr. Selwin.] The numbers would form an element in the question of safety?—Just so.

323. Mr. Lusk.] Of course you are aware that the population of the metropolis has increased very much in the last 25 years?—Yes.

324. It appears, however, that there is no increase in the theatres licensed?—It is very slight; there are one or two more.

325. It stands at the same number since 1843, does it not?—There are two or three more.

326. Can you assign any cause why there has been no increase in the number of theatres?—I suppose it was not considered a profitable speculation.

327. But if the population has increased so enormously, the number of theatres being the same, do you not think that the taste of the people has changed?—No, I think not; I think that they like the drama just as much as ever they did; I cannot account for the facts.

327*. Do you think that the people are inclined to go to music-halls instead of to the theatres?—I think they go to both.

328. But the theatres are the same number that they were in 1843, and the increase in the population would be double, would it not?—Yes.

329. Therefore they cannot go to theatres; do you not think that they must have changed their taste, or that they go to music-halls?—I think, probably, that the supply is limited for the want of material.

330. You speak, in your memorandum, of the legitimate wants of the public?—Yes; I mean that no bonâ fide application has been made for a new theatre; there have been constant applications from music-halls to cover prosecutions occasionally, but no plans of new theatres have been sent in and refused.

331. Assuming that the taste of the public is the same as it was 20 years ago, do you think that all the theatres and all places of entertainment should be under regulation?—I think so.

332. You would not leave them open, the same as the newspapers, to do what they liked, and to depend on the good taste of the public for success?—I think in the great majority of places they would be conducted as they are now; but you would always have a certain amount of places ill-conducted.

333. But do you think that if they were left to their own control, those that conducted themselves with propriety would be the only ones that would succeed?—I cannot speak to that.

334. Do you think it would be better for the magistrates to license the music-halls and saloons, or that you should do it?—For a place like London, I think there should be one officer; I do not say who that one officer should be.

335. Mr. O'Beirne.] When you license a theatre, the license is subject to certain rules?—Yes.

336. Do you send printed rules to the manager?—No; there are no printed rules; they are generally understood.

337. Is there any intimation made to the manager?—They have been in existence so long that they are practically aware of them; but they have from time to time been given.

338. Do you find the managers willing to accede to your suggestions?—Perfectly willing; we never have any difficulty.

339. Do you remember the first music-hall opening in London, I mean within the last 15 years?—The Canterbury Hall was the first.

340. Do you remember the class of people who attended there originally?—It is a good while ago, but I think it was mechanics and their wives.

341. Was the performance musical or dramatic at that time?—Entirely musical; at that time I think there was a platform at the end of the room on which the singers came forward and sang.

342. Is there any similarity between the performances which have been recently a subject of litigation at the Alhambra and elsewhere, and the class of performances originally heard at the Canterbury Hall?—No, they are entirely different; it was a large room, and at the end of it there was a platform on which the singers performed; as it is now, theatres have been built in many of those places—stages with scenery.

343. You have visited some of those music-halls?—Yes, from time to time.

344. Do you find, as one of the public, any difference between the class of people who attended those places when they were strictly music-halls, and the class of people who now attend when there are other performances?—I think it depends to a great extent on the locality.

345. Which locality do you refer to?—At the time I am speaking of there was only one of those music-halls, namely Canterbury Hall, and the people living in the neighbourhood went to that place; you saw long clay pipes and that sort of thing, but now it is a totally different thing.

346. Have you formed any opinion with respect to whether or not that difference may be the result of a change of the performance?—No I could not say that; they have become more general now, for one thing.

347. I did not quite gather from your evidence what was the reason which led to the licensing of the Italian Opera for La Traviata, and which led to the withholding of the license for the French and English version of the same play?—It was under a different licenser.

348. Chairman.] I understand you to say that you think it should not have been licensed at all?—Yes, I think so.

349. Lord Ernest Bruce.] The Lord Chamberlain I believe in the year 1863 prohibited dangerous performances of the Blondin type?—Yes.

350. But is not there a later case where the Lord Chamberlain closed Astley's Theatre on account of a man having been killed by a lion?—I have added all those cases in my memorandum in a corrected form, but I know that in addition to dangerous performances of the Blondin type the exhibition of wild beasts in theatres has been prohibited.

351. Wild beasts are not allowed now?—They are not allowed now.

352. With regard to the alterations which have been made in the performances before Easter, you say you close the theatres on Good Friday?—Yes.

353. They are also closed on Ash Wednesday and Christmas-day?—Yes.

354. Now, supposing that to-morrow, instead of being only fixed as a day of humiliation for a diocese, had been fixed by the Privy Council for the whole country, you would have had the power to close the theatres, would you not?—Yes.

355. And you would do it?—Yes.

356. But that would be only in case of the Legislature having approved of it?—Yes.

357. Therefore, the Legislature not interfering in the matter, the theatres will be open to-morrow?—Yes.

358. Now, with regard to prayers and preaching at places of theatrical entertainment, that has become very unusual, has it not?—No, it is constant. I believe that it takes place every Sunday at several theatres.

359. Is there any money paid at the door?—No.

360. That would be illegal, would it not?—Just so.

361. Chairman.] There is no means now by which a music-hall can obtain a license for theatrical entertainments at all, is there?—Practically that is the case; it would become a theatre at once if that were so under the Theatrical Act.

362. And the point would always turn on the definition of a stage play, I suppose?—Yes.

363. The justices have no power to license a music-hall for stage plays, have they?—No, the justices have not that power.

364. Is there any Act except that of 25 Geo. 2, under which the justices license?—The justices license for music and dancing under that Act; but the theatrical performances are under 6 & 7 Vict., in other parts of the country.

365. But there is no Act of Parliament which guides the justices, except this Act of 25 Geo. 2?—There is no other.

366. And you think that that is an Act which is not very applicable to the present day?—It is a very clumsy Act. It is a combination of several Acts which were unsuited to the times. That was condemned as obsolete 12 years ago, by the Committee of 1853–4, and also, I believe, it was condemned in 1832. It was, in fact, a compound of the vagrant Acts of former days.

367. Then, as far as you can trace the legislation on the subject, do you believe that the operation of those Acts has been to shut out competition, and give the monopoly to certain theatres?—No, I think not.

368. But has that been the result?—No, certainly not, since I have been in the Lord Chamberlain's Department.

369. But has it had this result, that no place which is not a real theatre can give a theatrical entertainment?—That is the law.

370. Private theatricals are illegal, are they not?—They are, if money is taken directly or indirectly.

371. Now, if private theatricals were given for charity, would they be illegal?—Unless there was a license for the place in which they were given they would be illegal if money was taken.

372. Would it be illegal in case of any private person giving a theatrical entertainment in his own house for charity?—If the public were admitted by paying money directly or indirectly, it would be illegal. But the Act is very clumsy. I believe that the singing of the charity children, which takes place at St. Paul's once a year, is illegal, and that every soul concerned might be prosecuted. Concerts which take place in private houses and others are in the same predicament.

373. In this Act of Geo. II., I see we have these words: "or other place kept for public dancing, music, or other public entertainment of the like kind;" has any case ever turned on the interpretation of the words "public entertainment of the like kind"?—The point in litigation between the music-halls and the theatres is the interpretation of the words "dancing, music, or other public entertainment of the like kind." It is whether those words meant that the the audience were to dance or whether they were to look at the dancing?

374. It has been ruled, has it not, that it means to look at the dancing?—I believe it is not quite laid down now satisfactorily. The last decision in the Court of Common Pleas was that the case went on the question of fact, and not of law.

375. Mr. Locke.] That case was with regard to whether a ballet was a stage play?—Yes; it was a mere question of fact, and not of law.

376. Chairman.] If a law were to be passed that the licenses granted should be given by the justices, what points, in your opinion, should the justices consider in granting licenses?—If the licensing power were given to the justices altogether, I think the safety of the public is the principal question, with a general power to look after morality as well.

377. Do you mean the morality of the entertainment or the morality of the people who visit those places?—The morality of the entertainment.

378. A kind of limited censorship?—Yes; a kind of limited censorship as to personalties, immorality, and political questions.

379. Do you think that that censorship should be exercised generally by the justices?—They would have some difficulty because they only sit at stated periods, which would cause great inconvenience to the managers, the justices have no power at the intervening times.

380. You think it would be more convenient to have a single officer for these purposes?—It appears to me so.

381. Mr. Walpole.] With regard to the licensing of stage plays, have you any reason to think that plays are ever performed without being submitted to the Lord Chamberlain's office for the proper license?—Not in London.

382. In the country they are, I suppose?—Of course, the whole country implies a very large circuit.

383. When a play is submitted to the Lord Chamberlain, does the examiner always take care to read and see whether there are any objectionable passages in it?—Yes.

384. Do you find when the examiner of plays has objected to any particular passage, the author willingly submits to his decision?—Most willingly; we never have any difficulty.

385. I find in Appendix K. a certain number of plays which were refused licenses; did any difficulty occur with regard to the theatres which had submitted those plays when they were refused?—No; it is an absolute power.

386. But no remonstrance was offered?—I think, from time to time, there have been remonstrances.

387. Does the Lord Chamberlain then reconsider the point of such a representation should be made to him?—I think some plays have been sent in (but it is very rare) more than once, and he has adhered to his previous decision.

388. But no complaints have been made?—None.

389. Chairman.] Do you think the knowledge that there is such a supervision has checked authors at all in what they have written?—I think so; for instance, the modern French drama is almost entirely immoral; those plays have been transmitted to England, but they are not translated without alteration.

390. Only those 19 plays have been formally excluded; but, practically, you think that a very large number are excluded by the indirect effect of the censorship?—Yes, because the managers know what will be excluded before they send them in.

391. If that censorship were discontinued, do you think that many more immoral plays would be produced?—Yes. I think that you would have plays of the same kind as they have in France.

392. Mr. Locke.] And now you have them in England, with the objectionable parts struck out, and something more stupid put in; is not that so?—That is a matter of opinion.

393. Mr. Du Cane.] Is there any legal definition of a stage play?—Yes; in the 23d section of 6 & 7 Vict.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE GEORGE JOACHIM GOSCHEN, IN THE CHAIR.

HENRY POWNALL, Esq., called in; and Examined.

H. Pownall, Esq.

23 March 1866.

394. Chairman.] You have been Chairman of the Middlesex Bench of Magistrates for 24 years, have you not?—Yes.

395. You have had the kindness to send in to the Committee a memorandum on the system of licensing of the Middlesex justices?—Yes.

396. You have stated in this paper certain resolutions that were come to on the 4th of September 1851?—Yes.

397. The first of those resolutions is this: "That the Court will not in future insert in licenses to be granted under the Act 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, the words 'or other public entertainment of the like kind,' but will in all cases specify the particular entertainment which may be given." Has that resolution been generally acted upon?—Entirely from that period. I would state that previous to that period we only granted licenses for music and dancing. A case was submitted to Lord Campbell, and he decided that we must give the license according to the wording of the Act which was: "For music and dancing, and for entertainments of the like kind." That was as far back as the year 1833. The magistrates were still pressed for an increased number of licenses, but they were most unwilling to grant a dancing license to every publican who applied, and they submitted a case then to Sir Frederick Thesiger and Mr. Justice Crompton, who gave it as their opinion that the magistrates would be perfectly justified in granting a license either for music or for dancing, and since that period the magistrates have acted up to that opinion, and those are the resolutions which the Court came to after they had obtained that opinion. The licenses prior to that period, say for example in the year 1845, were only 67 for music and dancing, but in the next 10 years they had gradually increased, so that in the year 1855 we granted 255 licenses for music only, and 50 for music and dancing. They went on increasing, but not in the same ratio, for the bench were unwilling to extend it too much, but in 1865 there were 291 music licenses and 60 licenses for music and dancing. We continue to act on that resolution at the present time.

398. Are the justices more particular in granting licenses for dancing than they are for music?—A great deal. The magistrates generally go round; in fact, I may say that they always go round, and look at all the houses from which there are new applications. In our list of applications for licenses at the October Sessions which we publish every year, the old applications, unless there is something reported by the police or by the local magistrates, are, as a matter of course, confirmed.

399. They are renewed?—Yes, almost I may say as a matter of course.

400. They are taken on the first day of the October Sessions?—Yes; the new licenses and those which are opposed of the old ones are taken on the second day. Every house, I believe, is visited by the magistrates of the local district. We have them separated into the several parishes and divisions, and we receive a report as you see by the last orders of the Court, of those houses, either from the local magistrates or from the police, and when those cases come before the Court an inquiry is still made with regard to the size of their rooms, but we do not feel that we have much authority to increase the size of their rooms, or to interfere in the least with regard to the public accommodation beyond seeing that the room, if required for music and dancing, is of certain dimensions, and that it will hold, perhaps, 30 or 40 people, according to the size of the house that is applying for the license.

401. With regard to the point that "they will in all licenses specify the particular entertainments that will be given," does that mean simply whether it is music or dancing?—No; there is much ambiguity in the words, "entertainment of the like kind." What is "the like kind," with regard to music and dancing? I apprehend it is from those words that the recent discussion and trial have taken place in the Court of Common Pleas as to what is scenic, or mere ordinary dancing. Some of the places licensed for music and dancing have introduced scenic representations, and have professional dancers, which is thought to be contrary to a license for simple music and dancing.

402. Mr. Powell.] A place licensed for music alone would not have dancing; that would be in places licensed for music and dancing?—For music and dancing.

403. Chairman.] Do you never license for dancing only?—We never license for dancing only; we license, however, for music alone.

404. Can you give the Committee any instances of any particular entertainment which is specified?—There was an exhibition in Leicester-square of poses plastiques that was exhibited for some time under under the music and dancing license. At the Alhambra in Leicester-square there are exhibitions, I understand, under the music and dancing license.

23 March 1866.

405. Mr. Locke.] You mean the ballet?—Yes, the ballet.

406. Chairman.] In your license, would it be entered license for music and dancing only, or for such and such an entertainment besides?—It used to be, but now we omit those words altogether. Our intention with regard to the dancing is, that it should be the dancing of the public that are admitted; but that there should be no scenic representation on a stage, or professional dancers employed; that is our interpretation.

407. But you say in your resolution, "That the Court will specify the particular entertainment"?—We give a separate license for music, and we state that on the license; but if it is for music and dancing, we state for music and dancing.

408. Now, supposing it is for a half scenic entertainment, what words do you put in then?—We should put none at all in.

409. Then that point is left blank in the license?—Yes, previously; but that is filled in when we grant the license, stating either that it is for music, or for music and dancing, and nothing more.

410. You grant no licenses at all for scenic entertainments or ballets, or poses plastiques, or anything of that kind?—No.

411. Everything of that kind practically goes on without a license?—Everything of that kind goes on without a license, except they get it from the Lord Chamberlain's Office.

412. Mr. Miller.] The Lord Chamberlain's area embraces the Parliamentary Borough, does it not?—Yes.

413. But the local magistrates may grant licenses beyond the area of the Lord Chamberlain for scenic entertainments?—That is a separate thing altogether from our music and dancing license.

414. Chairman.] The Act 25 Geo. 2 uses the words "music and dancing or any entertainment of the like kind." I understood that in future it was resolved by the Court that the words "or public entertainment of the like kind" should be omitted, but that the particular entertainment should be specified; the vague words "public entertainments" not to be used, but the particular entertainment that is to be licensed. Do I understand that that is not the case?—Exactly. The words music or music and dancing are inserted in the license, and the words public entertainment of the like kind are omitted.

415. Is it the fact that all licenses granted by the Lord Chamberlain are for theatrical entertainments, but that all semi-theatrical entertainments not licensed by the Lord Chamberlain have no licenses at all for that purpose?—I think none.

416. But they use the rooms that are licensed by the justices for music and dancing?—Yes.

417. So that they have their rooms opened under one license, and they give unlicensed entertainments in those rooms?—Yes, it is so.

418. Does not that seem more or less getting a license under false pretences?—I think it is exceedingly objectionable. The Lord Chamberlain's jurisdiction and the magistrates' jurisdiction with regard to the Act of Geo. 2, come in conflict in such a way that it would be infinitely better if the Act was altogether repealed and remodelled. It is not at all suitable to the age in which we live; it was passed under a very different state of society, when bear-baiting, badger-baiting, bulls lit up with fire-works to be baited, and women fighting on a Sunday morning for a new shift, and things of that kind took place. We are now differently situated; but anything in the nature of scenic representations is confined to the Lord Chamberlain, and simply music and dancing to the magistrates. With an efficient control over them by the police, those music halls and places that are licensed might be made conducive to a very great degree of amusement and entertainment to the public, but in their present state, I think, they are far otherwise. If in the music halls they continue to sell spirituous liquors, and have private rooms in the building, it is quite impossible but that there should be violations of the moral law.

419. Then I understand you to say that you would rather extend the system of licensing than curtail it?—Yes, decidedly, for those simple purposes with certain restrictions and more power to the police to go in and examine those private rooms which now surround the great saloons. I am afraid (though I cannot speak personally) from what I hear, they are a source of great immorality.

420. You think it would be advisable to license all the minor kinds of theatrical entertainments as well as the theatres?—I think so, but I should say that those places would be better licensed by the Lord Chamberlain than by the magistrates; any admonition coming from the Lord Chamberlain's office would be likely to receive much greater attention by the publican himself, and would be looked at with more respect by the community at large.

421. Do you agree with Mr. Ponsonby, who gave evidence last Monday. He was in favour of centralising the granting of licenses for theatrical entertainments in one hand, either in the Lord Chamberlain's or the Home Secretary's, or that of an officer specially appointed for that purpose?—I perfectly agree with him as far as theatrical or scenic representations are concerned. I think that a divided jurisdiction in matters of that kind leads to great confusion as well as laxity of discipline.

422. When you say that you would retain the music and dancing licenses for the magistrates, I suppose you mean that if a new Act were passed, you would mean by "dancing" dancing by the public?—Yes, dancing by the public.

423. If the music and dancing license were so limited, you think that it would avoid the ambiguities which have happened up to this time?—I think so.

424. Would not singing lead, again, to some ambiguity?—It might; but I think it would be very soon understood that an individual singing a comic song would not be at all restricted from using the gestures which he might think necessary to accompany the song. I would not include having scenery behind and dancers coming down from mountains, and all those artificial adjuncts.

425. But if you had four singers who sang a kind of opera without any scenery at all, what would you say?—I should not object to that; the four might sing at the same time; they might sing in trios, or in any way they liked, provided it was nothing but a song, and no scenic representation sentation. The more singers they had, the better, perhaps, the public would be pleased.

426. But you think that the chief thing in theatrical entertainments is the scenery and the adjuncts, and not what is sung; in fact, that the essence of a theatrical entertainment consists rather in the scenery and by-play, and not in the absence of story in what is sung?—I think it is more in the scenic representations which they have. I do not know why a publican, if he has a music license, might not have six people joining in a song, and in a chorus, and what not, as well as Exeter Hall, which has only a music license, and where they have 600 or 700 performers.

427. When you say that Exeter Hall was licensed for music only, you mean theatrical entertainments were excluded?—We should not admit theatrical entertainments; so strictly careful have the trustees of Exeter Hall been not to infringe the Act of Geo. 2, that even when The Messiah has been performed, or any other oratorio, or piece of music, they have prohibited the friends of the performers coming in the morning to hear the rehearsal; they allow the oratorio to be rehearsed in the morning; but under the Act of Geo. 2, if they were to admit strangers to come and hear it, the license would be void, and the building could never be licensed again, nor could the trustees ever be licensed again.

428. But that is only because it is before 5 o'clock in the afternoon?—Just so.

429. But the point is this, is an oratorio a theatrical entertainment or not?—Does not scenic representation sufficiently define the difference?

430. I apprehend not; but take the case of Mr. German Reed; would you call that a theatrical representation?—Yes; that would go under the Lord Chamberlain, and so would the Egyptian Hall, and all those places.

431. But if the same pieces were performed in a drawing-room without scenery, you would say that would not come under the Lord Chamberlain, would not you?—Certainly; it is when they take money at the doors.

432. What I understand you to say is, that the magistrates on the whole would decide whether a piece was a theatrical entertainment by the question of whether there was scenery or not?—I think that would be the principal point.

433. Do you think that that is the right test?—I have thought much of it, but I could arrive at no other conclusion; with regard to the wording of the song, of course, if there was any improper and very outrageous immorality in the song we should know it, and when the person came for his license next year we should refuse to renew it.

434. I understood you to say before, that all entertainments in public-houses which are licensed for music and dancing now are not licensed for the entertainments which they give, but you recommend that they should be compelled to have a license for every other kind of entertainment that they give; would you not think that license necessary if there was no scenery?—I think all places of public amusement should be licensed. Those for theatres, and like entertainments, by the Lord Chamberlain; those for music and dancing simply, by the justices.

435. Would you let a man get off the necessity of asking for a license for an entertainment by leaving out the scenery?—No, certainly not; if you did you would introduce a source of enormous evil in rural villages where there is music and dancing in every little public-house.

436. I did not mean that we should give up the license for music and dancing; but I understood you to say that if there was ballet or poses plastiques, you think it would be a good system that they should be licensed?—Yes, I think it would be a good system that they should be licensed, but not by the magistrates.

437. But would you not require that license quite independently of the fact of their having scenery?—Certainly; we should require them to have that license if they merely have music and dancing, or music only.

438. But you would recommend their having a special license besides from the Lord Chamberlain?—I should not permit the same building to be used under the two licenses; they should be distinct and separate just the same as a theatre is separate from a public-house.

439. Then do you disapprove generally of their having scenic representations in entertainments given in public-houses?—Yes.

440. You think that it would be a good thing to do away with them altogether?—I do.

441. You would recommend their being held in separate buildings?—Yes, in separate buildings, and as far as possible where spirituous liquors are not sold.

442. You disapprove of those dramatic performances in small public-houses?—Certainly.

443. Now with regard to the check that is exercised by the magistrate; the half-yearly check you mention in your memorandum is, I think, that the licenses for music and dancing are granted at one time of the year, and the licenses for spirits are granted at another period of the year?—Yes.

444. Does that constitute a better check than if it were all done once a year?—I think it does. The spirit license is granted in the month of March, and there are always a great number of transfers at that period of the year, and that gives the local magistrates an opportunity of seeing how the new tenant conducts his business before he is able to apply for the music and dancing license, unless the house has had the license, in which case the magistrates have also an opportunity of seeing how he uses his license, and if it is abused by being kept open at improper hours, or having music and dancing when there is only a music license, that information is given to the bench in October, and they in all probability refuse to renew the license; therefore it acts well by giving us six months' trial of the new tenants.

445. But when October comes, or when next April comes, could you, having given a license for music and dancing in October, compel them again to renew the spirit license in April?—If we found that the man's house was improperly conducted we should in all probability suspend his spirit license.

446. Would that put him into a difficult position with regard to carrying on his business?—He could not open his house as a public-house, though he might go on with the music and dancing license; but I think few of them would apply for a music and dancing license if it was not for the sake of selling a larger quantity of spirits.

447. If he has got a music and dancing license, he can get a spirit license independently of the justices?—Yes, and I think it is a great evil; in fact, we have felt it such an evil that when we have found how the music and dancing license has been used for the purpose of getting a spirit license from the Excise, we have refused to renew the music and dancing license at the following October Sessions.

23 March 1866.

448. You are aware that there is a clause in the 5 & 6 Will. 4, cap. 39, empowering the Excise to give spirit licenses to all places licensed by justices of the peace or by the Lord Chamberlain?—Yes, and I ventured to urge that subject upon the bench. I showed them that it would be quite impossible for us to have any control over a house as a public-house if they had not got that license from us; and if a music and dancing license were to secure those publicans' licenses, the magistrates' jurisdiction of granting licenses would be void; and therefore I said that the only course open to us is, whenever we find out such a case, to withhold the music and dancing license in October. We have done it at the Dancing Academy in Dean-street, Soho, and in several instances since.

449. Would you think it advisable to reconsider that point in any fresh legislation on the subject?—All licenses for spirits, I think, should be confined entirely to the magistrates. The magistrates live in all parts of the country, and they hold their petty sessions and visit every public-house before it is licensed. They know the character of the individual and how the house is used. It is quite impossible that the Lord Chamberlain can be acquainted with the circumstances so well as the magistrates are. We have in Middlesex very nearly 6,000 public-houses, and if that rule was acted on to the full extent, perhaps two-thirds of them would become music and dancing places.

450. Would this be your opinion, that all theatrical entertainments (in the widest sense) should be referred to one central jurisdiction; but that all licensing for spirits should be left with the magistrates?—Certainly. I have ventured to put down a few suggestions on the subjects: "not only all theatres and other places for scenic entertainments, but also all places at which any stage dancing is carried on, whether 'ballet d'action or ballet divertissement'" (that is from the report of the case tried in the Court of Common Pleas) "takes place, to be licensed solely by the Lord Chamberlain. The justices should be empowered to grant licenses either for music only, or for music and dancing, but such dancing to be by the public and not by performers." Though it is now acted upon, and we do grant separate licenses in consequence of Lord Chelmsford's opinion, it would be better to have it stated in any Act of Parliament, that there might be no ambiguity in future: "No place to be licensed for dancing except under special circumstances, unless rated at a certain rent," so that the magistrates might have some power of enforcing substantial building and a place that is fit for the public accommodation. No place licensed either for music or for music and dancing to be opened for any such purpose between midnight and 6 o'clock in the morning." It would be better to put it in that form, than to say that they should not open until 5 o'clock in the afternoon, because unquestionably the amusements of the public now take place very much by daylight; for instance, the Crystal Palace gives morning entertainments. I have no doubt that at Exeter Hall we should have very many and frequent Sacred Harmonic performances if they were at liberty to open before 5 o'clock. I think it would be very desirable that "the justices should be empowered to grant temporary special licenses to any place either for music or music and dancing in the same manner as is now provided with regard to the temporary license for the sale of exciseable liquors." If anything occurs that the license cannot be granted at the March sessions or a transfer made, the magistrates now have no power of granting it at some other petty sessions. The number of large buildings that are being erected in London and the neighbourhood for public entertainments requires that; take, for instance, the Strand Music Hall; it is not quite finished in the month of October, perhaps; and the magistrates decline to license an unfinished building, but it would be perfectly finished by the end of November; then the building, which has been a very expensive erection, is compelled to be kept closed until the October following. To meet such a case as that, I think it would be desirable to give power to the magistrates to grant a temporary license until the October sessions. "Places licensed for music, or for music and dancing, to be subject to like visitation and inspection of police as houses licensed for sale of exciseable liquors, and all offences to be dealt with in the like manner, but the penalties should be more heavy." At present, the penalties for violating the music and dancing license are scarcely anything, unless when they come, in October, and the license is altogether withheld, which is too severe a great deal. "Licenses to be granted to holders of places of entertainment, and not for the use of the place without regard to the holder;" that is to say, that an individual shall not get a music and dancing license for a large room, and then let it to somebody else, whose character we know nothing of. "Any license for music, or music and dancing, to be transferred at petty sessions, the same as licenses for the sale of exciseable liquors." Compared with the county funds, it is nothing, but still it is a very considerable expense, which is incurred for printing licenses and employing officers, and there is no charge whatever made by the Act of Geo. 2 There is first the receiving of the notice; then there is seeing that the notices are posted; then the printing and correcting the press, and circulating all the letters to the magistrates, which implies, on an average, three or four to each magistrate; and the printing of the lists, all the expense comes out of the county rate; and those parties who make a large profit by the music and dancing licenses, they having in a great measure a monopoly, pay nothing whatever. As to the Clerk of the Peace, this (handing in a paper—vide Appendix) is a list of the services which he performs gratuitously; I think there should be a fee of 10*s.*, or something like that, on each license.

451. Do you know of any case where the proprietors of a theatrical saloon have been refused a license by the Lord Chamberlain, and where they have come for one for a music and dancing license?—I do not know of any case of that kind; there may have been, but they have taken care not to tell us that the Lord Chamberlain has refused them.

452. On what grounds do you refuse a license?—There are various grounds; but if the Committee will allow me, I will speak with regard to the music license first, because it will be more convenient to do so. We do not think it desirable, where there are three or four public-houses in the same street, that each house should have have a music license. We consider the wants of the neighbourhood; in some parts we grant them a great deal more freely than in others; we should not grant a music license so freely in many of the respectable parts of London as we do down in Wapping and Poplar, where the sailors come.

453. You grant those licenses rather according to what you consider to be the wants of the neighbourhood?—Yes.

454. Do you think it an evil for them to have a place for music and dancing if it is thinly attended?—I think that music and dancing in public-houses is a very dangerous thing, and should be restricted to the mere wants of the neighbourhood as much as possible.

455. Then you license those places in the less respectable neighbourhoods, and you refuse licenses more frequently in respectable ones?—The applicants are not so numerous by any means. In Whitechapel there is a great number of sugar-bakers employed, a large number of Germans, who are exceedingly fond of music, and we do not therefore think it quite right to be so niggardly in our grants of licenses there as we should be in St. James's-street or Pall Mall.

456. I think you have stated that those parties have a monopoly?—Yes.

457. They have that monopoly through the system which the justices exercise?—It is quite true, and so have the publicans; it is just a similar monopoly to what the publicans have; but the publicans for their monopoly are forced to concede certain things for the public benefit, while the music and dancing license does not entail upon the receiver any official responsibility for services to be done.

458. Do you not think that that question might be left entirely to competition?—I think that would be very objectionable, unless you had some inspector whose duty it was to go round and see how it was conducted, to know the character of the party who was applying.

459. Do you not think that it ought to rest entirely on the character of the party, and on his respectability, rather than on the question whether there are a good many in the neighbourhood already?—It would seem so; but when you come to consider the frequency of the transfers of the house itself, I do not think so. There is, perhaps, no trade that shifts about so much as a publican's trade; the number of transfers from one to the other is so very great, that it would be impossible on all occasions to investigate the character of the new comer, and we might be doing him a very great injustice in refusing him a license that had been granted to his predecessor.

460. Do you find when a new music-hall is going to be opened, that there is an opposition by those who have got licenses already?—Yes, constantly. A number of the music-halls and theatres who have already got a license, oppose the granting of fresh licenses. For instance, Weston's Music Hall in Holborn was granted, and there is Canterbury Hall; and when the Oxford Music Hall Company applied for a license there was a very great opposition; all the music-halls, including the Raglan, which is in Theobald's-road, joined, and Serjeant Ballantine was brought down, and great expense was incurred in opposing the license.

461. On what grounds do they habitually put their opposition?—That there is not sufficient business for another house.

462. They openly consider it as a question of monopoly?—Yes, entirely.

463. But surely the system of licensing by the magistrates is rather designed to secure the morality and the decent conduct of the places?—It should be so; and so far as the magistrates know when they grant the license, they have done that; but the license being once granted, they have no power of going over the house and looking into those private rooms. My own opinion would be, that wherever there is music and dancing in those large places, the price of admission should be the profit of the individual who has that place, and not the spirits that are sold, and letting out, for an hour or so, those little rooms that surround the dancing-place.

464. Then private interests are brought to bear very strongly on the decision of the magistrates in granting licenses for music-halls?—Constantly.

465. Would that be in your mind a motive for taking the licensing of theatrical entertainments rather away from the justices?—No; my motive for putting all the theatres in the Lord Chamberlain's Office is, that I do not think that the joint authority at all works well; and I think that theatrical entertainments assume a character of rather more importance than mere music and dancing, and that the Lord Chamberlain's authority would be more attended to by the public and by the applicant himself than that of the magistrates.

466. You would secure more uniformity of system?—A great deal.

467. You would not recommend his power to be transferred to the justices?—No; I should be very sorry, and the Bench generally would, I think, be very sorry, to have the control of theatres and places of that kind.

468. You are neither in favour of the system of licensing being given up, nor in favour of the system of licensing being transferred to the magistrates?—No; I draw a distinct line between the two jurisdictions, and I would leave it then with both.

469. Now with regard to the police; do the police inspect those places by the order of the magistrates; do they co-operate with the magistrates in keeping those music-halls in order, would they report to you if there was any dancing in a place licensed for music only?—No, I think they do not; a few of the police do, but it is not the general custom for them to report; they do not think it within their province, and if they hear music in a public-house that has no license, they do not report it; if they hear music and dancing going on where there is only a music license, they do not report it. More stringent regulations with regard to the police visiting those places when those licenses are granted, I think are necessary.

470. Do you take any means of finding out those things?—Yes; I frequently go round, and when I do hear of it I always make a minute in my own memorandum-book; and when the people come before us in October I mention it.

471. But you do that voluntarily; there is no organization for it?—No, there is none; we have tried to do it in the last year or two by calling on the local magistrates to make a report; we have done that to some extent for the last two years.

472. Is private information often brought to you

23 March 1866.

you with regard to houses having music and dancing without a license?—Constantly.

473. The neighbours who have got a music and dancing license look it up, I suppose?—Yes, and they complain. Those who have been refused at the October Sessions immediately write very angry letters, and say "Why do you let it go on at such-and-such a house?" but we have no means of stopping that.

474. You think that is rather a function that should be performed by the police, I suppose?—Yes.

475. Have you any salary as chairman of the Middlesex Quarter Sessions?—None.

476. Mr. Walpole.] I understand you to say that you would draw a broad line of distinction between scenic representations and licenses for dancing or music?—Yes.

477. One class you would keep under the Lord Chamberlain's authority alone?—Yes.

478. And the other you would keep entirely in the hands of the magistrates?—Yes.

479. The interpretation of the expression "stage plays," in the Act of 6 & 7 Vict., which is supposed to be synonymous with scenic representations, is that it should include "tragedy, comedy, farce, opera, burletta, interlude, melodrama, pantomime, or other entertainment of the stage;" would that include all that you intend to include under the words "scenic representations"?—Yes, I think so.

480. Then would you draw a distinction between dancing with a certain amount of acting combined with it, and scenic representation where dancing, as in a ballet, goes on?—With our music and dancing license I should confine the dancing strictly to the public who are admitted; there should be no stage behind from where performers can pass and re-appear.

481. Then your point would rather be, that you would lay the stress of the interpretation on the word "stage," and where there was acting or dancing going on upon a stage, there you would confine the licensing to the Lord Chamberlain?—Anything that would make it more distinct would be desirable.

482. Now with regard to the other class of licenses, namely, those that the magistrates are to grant, have the magistrates any power, between the time when they grant the license and the time when it expires, of looking after the ordinary conduct of the house?—Simply the ordinary power which a magistrate has of going into a house and seeing how it is conducted.

483. Of directing the police to do it?—Yes; and the magistrates go themselves occasionally.

484. Is not that rather a matter of police regulation than one for giving a license by the magistrates?—I think it is better that the magistrates who grant the spirit license should grant anything in connection with it. If one license is to be granted by the police and another by the magistrates, you divide the jurisdiction and the responsibility for the character of the house.

485. The only two things which you mentioned as being the circumstances that the magistrates should attend to before the license was granted would be, first of all, that those places which are licensed for dancing or music should be rated at a certain rate; and, secondly, that those places should not be open between 12 at night and 6 in the morning?—Yes.

486. Are not both of those strictly police regulations?—They do not consider it so.

487. But in the working of the law would not they necessarily become mere matters of police regulation?—They might, but it is not the law at present; with regard to those licenses it is not the law.

488. But what I should like to know is this: whether you think that the magistrates obtain any power for the more effectual working of the law by granting a license beforehand, subject to the conditions which they choose to impose before they grant it, than they might have if the license was granted as a police license, and the magistrates took care that the regulations were properly observed?—The magistrates can scarcely be asked to look after the police.

489. No; but the police may be required by law to look after those places?—Yes, and so they should be. I would give the police the utmost liberty I could to inspect and to see how those places are conducted, but I would leave the granting of the license in the hands of the magistrates.

490. Do you gain any advantage by keeping the mere fact of licensing in the hands of the magistrates?—Yes, you keep an authority and influence which is desirable not only in the music licensing but in the spirit licensing.

491. The Lord Chamberlain can withdraw his license at any time if there is anything wrong discovered, can he not?—Yes; but we cannot, which is to be regretted.

492. Does not that make it very important that the licensing of stage plays, to use the phrase in the Act of Victoria, should be left with the person who has the power of withdrawing the license if abused?—I think so.

493. That would probably be one of the reasons why you still wish to have that power in the hands of the Lord Chamberlain to the exclusion of anybody else?—Yes.

494. Mr. Locke.] Did I rightly understand you to say that you have never been into one of those music-halls at the time of the performance?—No; I did not say that. My observation was meant to apply to any of those private rooms that adjoin the music-halls; I have never been in them. I have been in most of the music-halls, I think, in order to see myself how they were conducted.

495. Have you been there while the performances were going on?—Yes, while the performances were going on.

496. You went to the Alhambra, I suppose?—I did.

497. Did you go into the private seats?—No.

498. You went into the body of the building?—Yes; I went to the body of the building, as one of the public.

499. What was the performance that evening?—There was singing and walking about; I did not observe anything else.

500. Nothing particular?—No, nothing; I was not there after 10 o'clock.

501. You have never been there at the right time, perhaps?—Perhaps so; it may be a place of very proper amusement up to 10 o'clock, for what I know.

502. You have never gone there after that time?—Never late at night.

503. I may ask whether, in point of fact, you have ever seen the slightest impropriety at the Alhambra?—I would not say that; because one cannot shut one's eyes to the fact that there are a great great many females there whose object you perfectly recognise at once.

504. That is the case almost everywhere, is it not?—Yes.

505. You cannot go into Hyde Park without seeing them?—No; but I must say that I think those places, after a certain hour at night, may become places of very great evil. I think the streets of the metropolis are wonderfully improved from what they were when I was young; 50 years ago they were in a very different state to what they are now in.

506. As a young man, I suppose you can recollect the saloon at the theatres?—Yes.

507. That is entirely altered now, is it not?—I understand it is.

508. But, though now, at the music-halls, there are some females of that character, is there anything improper going on; is the people's conduct improper in any way?—I should think not, in the main body of the place.

509. But you say that there are secret rooms at the side, where you have never entered, and where you have been told that there is something improper going on?—Yes.

510. But are you not aware that the side room at the Alhambra is a supper room, capable of holding 60 or 70 people?—Yes; but there are a number of small rooms occupied by private parties.

511. What they call "cabinets de société" in France?—Yes.

512. Have you been to the Oxford?—Yes.

513. That is a very well-conducted place, is it not?—Yes; but still there are private apartments there, I believe.

514. Those are supper-rooms, I suppose?—Nominally, perhaps.

515. Then there is Weston's Music Hall, there is no objection to that, I believe?—Not beyond that.

516. Have they private rooms too?—I understand that they have private rooms.

517. I was not aware of that: you have never seen any of those rooms?—I have never seen any of those rooms, but I have had letters sent to me by individuals who blame us very much for granting those licenses; and they say that their daughters and sons have been ruined there.

518. Do those persons who have lost their daughters sign their names?—Yes.

519. Mr. Walpole.] Do those complaints come before you as a magistrate?—No, not officially.

520. Mr. Locke.] I suppose you receive a good many letters against granting licenses to public-houses?—Yes.

521. Some magistrates invariably refuse all licenses to public-houses, and always vote against every new license; is not that so?—There may be cases of that kind; but out of 400 magistrates I could not fix on any one who would do so.

522. How many music-halls and concert-halls and entertainment galleries should you say there are in London that have been licensed?—I could not tell you off-hand; I think there were 60 licenses granted last October for music and dancing, and 291 for music only.

523. Are you speaking of what are commonly called music-halls?—No; some of them are public-houses that have large rooms; and such places, for instance, as the Freemasons' Hall, the Albion, and Highbury Barn, and so on.

524. I believe that the earliest of the London music-halls was built in 1851?—I cannot say. Some were licensed long before that period; there were a certain number that were licensed the first year in 1851, but the whole number that was licensed for the first part of this century was very small.

525. The number of licenses granted in 1845 for music and dancing was 67, I believe?—It was in 1845 that we took the opinion of Sir Frederick Thesiger, but it was not until 1851 that we began to act upon it.

526. The number of licenses granted in 1845 was 67; and then, in brackets, I see in your memorandum, "licenses for music only were not granted until 1851"?—Exactly.

527. You are taking a period of 10 years?—Yes.

528. Then, in 1855, the number of licenses granted for music only was 255, and music and dancing 50?—Yes.

529. Then, in 1865, for music only, 291; music and dancing, 60?—Yes.

530. That is only 10 more in 1865 than in 1856?—Just so.

531. Now here you have set out the case and the opinion referred to of Sir Frederick Thesiger and the late Mr. Justice Crompton, given on the 16th of August 1857?—Yes.

532. Now I believe there has been no decision of any court with regard to whether you were acting lawfully or not in separating the licenses?—None.

533. In fact, is it that the opinion was considered so good that nobody has thought it worth while to take it up to the Court of Queen's Bench, or is it that, if they were to attempt to take it up, you would not give them any license at all?—No; certainly nobody has thought it worth while.

534. It would not be worth their while, because you say, "Well, if you do not choose to take the music license alone, you shall not have any." That was the practice at the Surrey Sessions long before this opinion was given, was it not?—Yes, and it is the case now. We acted in that way last October. Many of the new applications were for music and dancing, but when they found that the magistrates did not find the house large enough for public dancing, when they found that they could not get the music and dancing license, they were very well content to receive it for music only.

535. That is on the principle that half a loaf is better than no bread, I suppose?—Perhaps it is, when you are hungry. I should extend the licensing for music very much, as far as my own opinion goes, to the public-houses.

536. Now, under the music and dancing license, it has been questioned, has it not, whether the music and dancing merely applies to the way in which you say you wish it restricted, namely, that all the dancing shall be done by the parties who go into the rooms?—Yes.

537. Was it not questioned whether or not that was the intention of the Act of Parliament, and a decision was given holding that persons might be performers and dance under that license?—Perhaps you will permit me to refer to the paper of suggestions which I propose to put in. There is such a decision: Wigan and Strange is the name of the case.

538. Not only all theatres and other places for scenic representation, but also any places at which any stage dancing, whether "ballet d'action or ballet divertissement" (see Wigan and Strange,

23 March 1866.

Law Reports, Common Pleas); was it held in that case that it was legal to have a performance in fact?—The Court of Common Pleas refused to reverse the opinion that the police magistrate had come to on that subject.

539. They held that it was a matter of fact?—Yes.

540. And consequently that the matter of fact was decided by the magistrates down below, and that there was no question of law for them, and they therefore left the thing pretty much as it was before?—Yes.

541. But that was a decision with regard to whether the ballet performed at the Alhambra was a performance of the stage?—Yes.

542. What I want to know is this, whether there was or not a decision to this effect; that the dancing was not to be confined to the persons who went into the place for amusement, but that other persons might dance for the amusement of the spectators?—I do not recollect such a case.

543. But, however, there has always been, at those music-halls and places licensed for music and dancing, dancing by performers?—Yes.

544. But the question here between the theatre and the music-hall was whether there was an infringement of the 23d Section of the Theatres Act, 6 & 7 Vict.; whether the ballet performed at the Alhambra was a performance of the stage within that section?—I do not recollect the name of the case which decided that the dancing was not to be confined to the persons who went into the place for amusement; but in the Alhambra case, under the words, "and be it enacted, that in this Act the word 'stage play' shall be taken to include every tragedy, comedy, farce, opera, burletta, interlude, melodrama, pantomime, or other entertainment of the stage;" the question was whether it was an entertainment of the stage that Mr. Strange performed, and there was likewise another case at Canterbury Hall, which Mr. Norton decided.

545. Now you say you would enact that the license of the magistrates should only include music and dancing, and the dancing should be done by the people who went into the room?—Yes.

546. Then, in fact, the license would be a license simply for that amusement which is enjoyed, I will not say it is the only entertainment, in Windmill-street?—I do not know; I have never been there.

547. Have you never been to the Argyll Rooms?—I went there when it was first opened.

548. Then in Windmill-street there are no performances of the stage; at least, there used not to be, but the visitors merely go through the dance?—Yes.

549. Would you have the license confined to that?—Yes.

550. That would be, in fact, licensing a ball?—Yes, just the same as the balls are at the principal hotels, the Freemasons', and so on.

551. But considering the immense number of licenses that you have given to music-halls where they have those performances of the stage, do you think it possible at the present time that you could interfere and put an end to those performances throughout London?—There would be no occasion to put an end to anything.

552. You say that they should have no scenic performances?—There are not above half-a-dozen in London that have scenic performances; there is Weston's Music Hall, the Oxford, Canterbury Hall, and one or two others. Those that have music and dancing licenses are principally respectable hotels and respectable public-houses, where they have only an occasional dance, and they want a license to protect them against informers.

553. Take Exeter Hall; if they were to perform a scene out of Shakspeare, would they not be liable to a penalty?—Certainly they would.

554. Whether they played it with a scene or not?—They have only a music license at Exeter Hall; they would not have a license for music and dancing if they could.

555. But suppose they had that license, would they not, if they acted one scene out of Shakspeare be liable under the 6 & 7 Vict.?—Certainly they would.

556. Can you see any objection to a person acting a scene out of Shakspeare?—Not if he has a proper license.

557. But whether he has a proper license or not, do you not think it is very much more desirable that persons should be enabled to go to a place (and even, if they choose, to eat and drink at the time), to witness a reasonable performance, than that they should be restricted to nothing else but a man singing, with his face blacked, and jumping about like a nigger; would not your course restrict it to that, instead of a more reasonable entertainment?—No; they may go to other places where a theatrical entertainment is tolerated.

558. But supposing they like to go to the other place?—They must not indulge that liking.

559. Why not?—Because it is not lawful.

560. But are there not good laws and bad laws, necessary laws and unnecessary laws?—I, at all events, am not at liberty to say so.

561. But when you are going to make a law, you may as well make a reasonable one as an unreasonable one, may you not?—That question might be answered certainly; somebody might say, "There is no reason for licensing at all; let every house be a music-hall, or every house a theatre."

562. Why should not every house be a theatre?—Because that may be turned to improper purposes, and the community be injured by the representation of bad entertainments.

563. If you carry that out, it would amount to this, that nobody should live in a house at all, would it not?—No, it is not necessary to push the thing so far; you may penetrate the poles of the globe without going into the centre. You may do some good and some harm by whatever law you make, but when you extend a principle beyond its legitimate bearing it may produce great public mischief.

564. But what harm is there in acting a scene from Shakspeare, at any time and anywhere?—There is no harm in it; I should be very happy to come to your drawing-room if you had some good reading of Shakspeare; but if I were to go to a reading of Shakspeare in a public-house, I should probably have been there not to hear Shakspeare, but to drink spirits; and in a drunken fit a man may be prepared for much worse, he may even kill somebody.

565. Do you think, then, that brandy-and-water with Shakspeare will make a man more drunk than brandy-and-water without?—I have not said so.

566. You do not hear of much killing at public-houses, do you?—Unfortunately, you do sometimes.

567. People meet at those music-halls where there there is a ballet performed, and that must be an incomprehensible ballet where nobody can make out any story, or else it would be clearly prohibited by that section of the Act; but can you give any reason why a more reasonable performance should not be allowed in those places than is now allowed?—My object would be, to give a more reasonable performance, but in proper places; but I think public-houses are not proper places.

568. You call music-halls public-houses?—Are they not? It is a matter of trade. They do not build those large houses simply for amusing the public, but in order to sell more spirits.

569. Do you suppose that theatrical managers build theatres simply for the amusement of the public. We all of us have some regard for ourselves?—Yes, but I think that your question rather meant the other way.

570. How much do you pay to go into the Alhambra?—I think it is 1*s.*

571. Then do you consider those music-halls in the light of public-houses?—Yes.

572. But there is an admission fee charged to go into those music-halls, is there not?—Yes.

573. Is not it directly contrary to the law of the land that any publican should say when you come into his house to sit and drink you should pay for admission?—A man may go into the tap-room free, but not into that room which is open for the amusement of the public. A mechanic who wants his steak or chop dressed for dinner does not go into the large saloon for public entertainment.

574. You are speaking of public-houses, and not of music-halls?—I am speaking of both.

575. Mr. Miller.] What is the admission to Canterbury Hall?—I forget.

576. If you want a shilling's worth of spirits you have a ticket given you when you go in, and you pay nothing else for it?—No; it could not be so at Canterbury Hall, because I never bought any brandy, but paid at the door.

577. But is it not the fact that if you had wished to have spirits to the value of 1*s.* that you might have had it?—I think that is the way. I think that in some of those music-halls you get a ticket in exchange for a certain sum, and then you give that ticket, which secures you spirits to the value of the ticket.

578. Mr. Locke.] Do you see any particular reason, provided the people remain sober, why they should not sit down comfortably at a table and take refreshments, and at the same time witness a proper performance?—If persons want to be quiet, and do not get drunk, and merely go for amusement, no one can object; but that is merely the surface look of the thing. It is after 11 o'clock at night when spirits are served to greater profusion, and when those private rooms are used, that the mischief occurs.

579. Then if those places were strictly under the surveillance of the police, and they could prevent any of those improprieties after 11 o'clock at night, do you see any objection whatever to them?—I believe it would be impossible to prevent the evil.

580. But I mean, supposing it were possible and the police did it?—If that were possible I should object to nothing. If men and women conduct themselves properly, there is no objection to any amusement; but we know from experience, and you cannot have lived and have seen society for many years, without knowing that the more traps there are open, the more men fall into them.

581. But with all those traps open, people are much more moral than they used to be, are they not?—I do not know with regard to general morals.

582. Then if Sir Richard Mayne should give it as his opinion that he can prevent impropriety after 11 o'clock, it appears to me that you would see no objection to those music-halls?—Certainly not, if they can be kept properly, and immorality suppressed.

583. You have never seen this immorality, have you?—No; but one does not want to taste poison to know that it exists in a chemist's shop.

584. Lord Eustace Cecil.] I think you have said that you were in favour of two separate jurisdictions, namely, that of the Lord Chamberlain and that of the magistrates?—Yes.

585. Have you ever known the powers of the Lord Chamberlain and the powers of the magistrates to clash in any way?—Yes.

586. Have you known that to be the case repeatedly?—I will not say repeatedly, but I think in half a dozen instances we have withheld our music and dancing license, because the party has used that license to go to the Lord Chamberlain to get a theatrical license.

587. Do you think that any undue influence has been ever exercised to get licenses from either the Lord Chamberlain or the magistrates?—The Lord Chamberlain's Office I know nothing at all about; I should hope there was none; but I cannot say that some of the magistrates are not influenced sometimes.

588. You think they are one way or the other?—Some of them may be perhaps, but it is very rarely, and it is always overpowered by the majority present on the Bench.

589. Chairman.] How many magistrates generally attend?—At the October licensing, some part of the day, there may be 60 or 70 magistrates present; they make a point of coming from their several divisions, and then, as the parishes are gone over, the magistrates connected with those divisions leave the Bench.

590. Lord Eustace Cecil.] At all events it is simply a matter of favouritism when it happens; there is no such thing as a pecuniary consideration ever received, is there?—I do not believe there is.

591. In the event of the Lord Chamberlain being confined to licensing stage plays, and the magistrates to music and dancing, do you think that any controlling power is necessary with regard to the regulations which they would make in granting those licenses, or would you leave it to their discretion?—No; I think if there were any rule laid down, it must be laid down in ignorance of the circumstances which occur in every district of this vast metropolis. The same regulations which would apply in Limehouse or Poplar would be quite inadequate to St. James's or St. George's, Hanover-square.

592. Are you in favour of different forms of license, that is to say, would you be in favour of the magistrates granting separate licenses for music only and dancing only, or for stage plays, music and dancing?—I think there would be no objection to the magistrates having power to grant licenses for dancing only, as well as for music only, or for both; but I would not give them them the power of licensing a theatre or a theatrical entertainment.

23 March 1866.

593. But suppose that power was given to the Lord Chamberlain, or the magistrates, to have different classes of licenses, and to license collectively or separately, would you be in favour of that?—They should, I think, be kept as distinct and as separate as possible, so that the jurisdictions might not clash.

594. Mr. Du Cane.] I understood you to say that you would not object to the licensing of semi-theatrical houses if they were put under the control of the Lord Chamberlain?—No; and if they were kept under the surveillance of the police.

595. Would you prohibit such places entirely from the sale of drink?—I would certainly prohibit spirituous liquors. I think they might have wine and beer and coffee, or anything of that kind.

596. Does that remark apply to all existing theatres?—No, because in the theatres they have no place to sit down where a man can get intoxicated; and even if the man were inclined to get intoxicated he could scarcely do it unless the theatres were very differently conducted to what they are now.

597. But he can go out between the acts and get as much as he likes to drink?—He can no doubt do that.

598. Would you allow him to continue to do that?—I would allow the individual to do it, but I would not allow a man either in a music-hall, or a dancing place, or a theatre, to send to the neighbouring public-house and fetch liquor in.

599. You would make those semi-theatrical houses a sort of minor theatre?—Places solely for entertainments.

600. Do you think that there is any want of theatrical performances in many of the neighbourhoods of London, that the existing theatres do not supply?—I can scarcely answer that question; but there is a great complaint made of the penny theatres in Shoreditch and Whitechapel. Constantly I have letters from parents complaining that their children have been led to thieve to get 6*d.* to go to those places; the number of children, I understand (I have not been in them), who frequent those theatres is very great.

601. Have you ever had any complaints brought before you as a magistrate with regard to the conduct of the people at the Alhambra or other large music-halls?—No; the complaints would go to the police courts.

602. I understand you to say that you have had various letters from fathers of families complaining of their children being drawn into bad courses through visiting music-halls?—Yes.

603. Have you ever inquired into the truth of any of those stories?—Yes.

604. Have you found them to be true?—Yes.

605. Have they been true in most cases?—They have been true in three or four cases. I have not inquired into more, but all that I have inquired into have been true.

606. You have not inquired into them as a magistrate?—No; but as an individual I have.

607. I understood you to say that no place should be licensed for dancing unless rated at a certain amount; have you formed any idea with regard to the lowest amount that should be fixed?—That would depend, I think, on the power that was given to license for dancing; some of the public-houses would have accommodation for small parties which they want occasionally, and if the local magistrate had the power of granting an occasional license as the country magistrates have the power now for licensing a theatre for a week or so, that would be useful; but the question would rather be to determine whether there is accommodation for the public for dancing; of course at the Freemasons' Hotel when there is a public ball, you have a good building, but if a small public-house applies, down at Bow or any place of that kind, the public should be secured that there is accommodation, and that the building is safe.

608. In fact you would leave it to the discretion of the magistrate?—I would.

609. I think you have stated that you are rather chary in granting a license for music and dancing in respectable and quiet neighbourhoods, but that you grant it more readily in Wapping, and so on?—Yes.

610. Do you think that in such neighbourhoods as Wapping it acts as a check on immorality, or is it because the law would be evaded, and worse consequences might ensue if you refused the license?—The law would be evaded. When sailors first land they go to public-houses; if they hear music they will begin dancing, and we know the state of society there is such that the sexes will mingle together in the dance in low public-houses.

611. One more question with regard to undue influence being brought to bear on the magistrates. Have you any brewers among your magistrates?—I think there are one or two, but I have not known more than one or two brewers made magistrates since I have been on the Bench, which is now nearly 35 years. I know that the Lord Lieutenant would almost turn me out of his room if I were to ask him to appoint a brewer.

612. He refuses to appoint brewers, does he?—He would not hear of it.

613. Mr. Miller.] I was very much struck with one suggestion of yours, which was, that you would not give a license to the same house for music and dancing and for theatrical representations, but that you would require the houses to be distinct?—Yes.

614. Now is that practicable?—Yes, I should think it is very practicable.

615. In one case the license would be granted by the Lord Chamberlain, and in the other case by the magistrates?—Yes.

616. You propose that those licenses should be distinct in order that there should be no conflict of jurisdiction between the two?—That is one reason; but another reason is, that I think theatres and those sort of places are more likely to become public buildings of great importance than ordinary public-houses and hotels, and that the influence of the Lord Chamberlain would go a great way to keep them in order.

617. At the present time it is said there are no less than 28 music-halls in this metropolis, where theatrical entertainments are given without a license?—They ought not to be allowed to do that.

618. Now if you were to give a license for music and dancing and refuse a license for theatrical representations, do you not think that you would hold out a great premium of attraction upon the lower class of entertainment, and would it not be better to meet the case by granting a license license for theatrical representations?—I think not. I think that if all the public-houses that have now a music and dancing license were made into theatres, it would be productive of great evil.

619. How would you describe the minimum of theatrical representation?—I should say, coming in in any theatrical dress and having a large number of performers, and having scenic representations.

620. Would you call a dialogue between two actors on the stage, with a scene at the back, a theatrical representation?—Yes, I would prevent scenic representation.

621. But would the fact of the scene being there without a performance constitute a theatre? No, I think not. I may add that there is no law to prevent dialogue. You may have two men to hold a discussion in any public-house.

622. Can you tell me whether there has been any return of the amount of crime connected with those music-halls?—No, I am not aware of any return.

623. As a general rule, do you think that at the police stations there are many prisoners brought up who are taken at those music-halls?—The assistant judge (Mr. Bodkin) is here, and he can answer that question better than I could.

624. Lord Ernest Bruce.] What is the whole number of these licenses?—Speaking from memory, I think there are about 5,800 spirit licenses.

625. I mean music and dancing licenses only?—351.

626. Mr. Lush.] How many music licenses alone have you now on your book?—291.

627. Have you many for music and dancing?—60.

628. You never grant any licenses for Middlesex for a theatre, do you?—No.

629. Nor for any performance?—No.

630. You have stated that the Act of George the Second conflicts very much with the present state of society, and our movements in all these matters?—Very much.

631. In what respect do you mean?—No one has now the right to open any place of public amusement for music and dancing before five o'clock in the afternoon. If they were to have a morning concert, for instance, their license is forfeited, and the individual is never capable of holding a license again, or is the building capable of being licensed.

632. Is there any other instance of conflict?—The penalty of 100 l. for every offence is very large, and the information could be laid by a common informer, which if put in practice would be exceedingly onerous on the owners of those houses.

633. You think that that should be done away with?—Certainly.

634. And that those houses should open when they please?—Yes; only that they should close at certain hours.

635. That they should be open at any hour during the day?—Yes.

636. Considering the increase in the number of the population, do you think it is necessary for them to have some amusement?—Certainly. I think that no one has done more to promote public amusement than myself, for I was the instigator of Exeter Hall; and the Sacred Harmonic Society in connection with it has certainly been the means of rousing the public spirit for music throughout the country.

637. The object of the drama as a rule is intellectual entertainment and refreshment?—Yes; intellectual entertainments.

638. Now what is the object of those people who go to the music saloons?—The object of the publican is to sell his spirits; the object of the individual must depend on his character.

639. Is the primary object to sell spirits?—No doubt; it is the trade that he carries on, and we must presume that every man wants his own trade to be prosperous.

640. Of course then he makes the entertainment of the people a subordinate thing?—There is no question about it; no one would keep a place merely for the amusement of others, if he got nothing by it.

641. Do you think that places of entertainment should have a spirit license?—I think they would be far better without it.

642. Assuming that it is necessary that people should have amusement in some way, is it necessary that they should have refreshments with their amusements?—No, I think not. What are our own habits? When we go to a theatre, we dine before we go, and we take our coffee when we return, and so with the labouring classes; they have had their dinner and they return to supper; they can have their amusement in the meantime.

643. You think from your experience that the entertainments for the people and refreshments for the people should be entirely distinct things?—I think it would be better, but I do not think it is quite practicable.

644. Then that being so, would it not be as well to allow people in these respects to conduct their theatrical and other entertainments as they like themselves, under the law of demand and supply?—I think not. Some persons would be very glad to have an opportunity of exhibiting a bull fight, and plenty of people would go to see it, and many other brutalising sports might be revived at a profit to those getting them up.

645. Assuming all such possibilities, and that those who are engaged in any trade or profession do not like to be fettered, is it not better, in the result, to leave them unfettered?—Yes; in a legitimate trade that is necessary for the community, the less people are fettered the better.

646. But you think that there should be some restriction on the acting dramas and on dancing?—Yes; the only restrictions I would suggest would be restrictions from their being acted at improper places.

647. But the country, as distinguished from the metropolis, is left without the protection of the Lord Chamberlain altogether with regard to the theatrical licenses, is it not?—Yes; without the restrictions of this 25 Geo. 2.

648. Do you not think, if any license is to be given, you ought to put it all under the magistrates' control?—No; I have stated that, in my opinion, the theatres and those kind of places should be under the charge of the Lord Chamberlain.

649. If a man, on taking a license for acting plays and the like, gave security for a sum of money, as is done in many other cases, would not that answer all purposes of precaution?—I dare say that, so far as the individual himself went, there might be nothing whatever bad; but it is necessary to guard the girls and boys who go there, and

23 March 1866.

and all that class of the community who attend. In a great measure those laws are framed to fence them round with security, so that they shall not be improperly drawn into temptation.

650. In certain cases, assuming people get a license for a music-hall from the magistrate, they can then go and get a spirit license from the Excise Office?—Yes.

651. Do you approve of that?—Certainly not; and we withhold our license next time when we find that it has been used for such a purpose as that.

652. Mr. Selwin.] You have stated, that after the magistrates have granted a license they have no further means of ascertaining how the music-halls are conducted?—No more than by personal inspection.

653. And that the complaints go to the police courts; they do not come before you?—That is so.

654. When they do make those complaints, they never refer them to the magistrates?—No; but when the licensing time comes round again they are reported to us.

655. Just as in relation to the licensing of public-houses?—Just as in the licensing of public-houses.

656. Do you not think that it would be very desirable that the police should act under the magistrates?—Certainly.

657. With instructions to report all cases of irregularity to the magistrates?—Certainly.

658. Under those circumstances, supposing that the police had those instructions, and they did report to the magistrates, do you still think it would be advisable to retain the theatres under the Lord Chamberlain, and that the magistrates could not, with the assistance of the police, keep a sufficient watch over the theatres as well as music halls?—That is my opinion.

659. I understood you to say that you thought it would be very desirable if the power of withdrawing the license was given to the magistrates, as it is to the Lord Chamberlain, in the interval between the October Sessions and the renewal of the license?—Certainly.

660. You said, I think, that many of those dancing-rooms were licensed for about 30 people?—Yes.

661. Is that always considered a sufficient number, as showing the wants of a neighbourhood?—I cannot say that there is any defined rule.

662. Would you multiply it up to any number of rooms holding 30 people each?—No, not if there were many others in the neighbourhood.

663. In separating the dancing by performers and dancing by the visitors, the dancing in the ballet would come under the Lord Chamberlain?—Yes.

664. It does not do so now, does it?—So it appears by the decisions.

665. It would be very easy to make a distinction between the two things, you think?—I should think so.

666. Mr. Powell.] Besides the larger places of entertainment, to which your attention has been chiefly directed, are there also others of what I may describe as an inferior character, and vulgarly known as "Penny Gaffs"?—Yes.

667. Is there any police superintendence over them?—The police go in, and I believe they report to the visiting magistrates, occasionally, at the licensing time.

668. I allude to places not licensed at all?—No, the police make no report of them.

669. You may see, in some of the minor streets of London, an announcement of some cheap entertainment, some singer of assumed celebrity, or some dancing by some comic performer, the place being licensed neither by the Lord Chamberlain nor the magistrates; would it be any part of the duty of the police to go into those places and see what was going on?—I am not sure; I think not.

670. Do you think that it is desirable they should, in fact, enter, in the course of their usual vocation, into any places to which the public are admitted?—I think that they should have free access, at any time, to any such place.

671. Do you think that they should have the power, either by their own action or by the intervention of a magistrate, to stop performances going on there?—I think that the power should be somewhere, to prevent performances at those places going on where they have no license. Those who have no license might be reported to the principal officer of police, who should have the power to stop them at once.

672. With regard to the places that are licensed, confining myself, for the sake of convenience, to your own jurisdiction, let me ask you, do you think that the police should, as a duty, go into all those places, and report to you?—I do not know what authority we should have; they often do report to the police magistrates because, in the metropolis, the police magistrates take all those charges. Take Whitechapel, for instance; say that there is one of those gaffs open without any license whatever, the police should have the power of entering it, and reporting it to the police magistrate of his district.

673. You think that the police should take that as part of their duty?—Yes.

674. And they having so reported to the police magistrate, exercising more or less the function of a censor, do you not think that the reports ought to be laid before you on the Middlesex Bench, when you reconsider the licenses?—If that relates to unlicensed places, there would be no use in it; but when those places that have no license are reported to the police magistrates, the magistrates ought to have the power of inflicting a fine.

675. But taking the places which have a license, do you think that you ought to have a report of those things by which to be guided, as to whether you should or should not renew the license?—They should report to the police magistrate, because the country magistrates have no jurisdiction within the metropolis; but they should also report to the local Bench of magistrates, in order that the fact may be known when the license comes to be renewed.

676. Would you rather that the police reported to the police court, and the police court again reported to you, or would you rather have a continual series of reports from the police direct?—I should like a series of reports from the police direct; the more information we get the better.

677. Mr. Miller.] Have you not a report of the convictions before the police magistrates before granting the licenses?—Generally.

678. Not as a matter of right, but simply as a matter of convenience?—Yes.

679. Mr. Powell.] Assuming that the police went in in this way, and instantly reported to you, you, do you think there would be any weight in the objection which might be raised, that you would destroy or interfere with the responsibility of the person keeping the house?—No; not with his responsibility.

680. At present, if order is not kept, he is liable to have his license withdrawn?—Yes.

681. Do you think if the police were to go in, and there were no reports made, it might be said, "The police have not complained, and I am no longer responsible"?—Unfortunately, that is often the case; we hear of offences committed in public-houses, and yet there is no report when they come up to have their license renewed; perhaps the magistrates have information of the fact, and they challenge the individual, and he says, "I have had no police complaint," and then it appears before the public as if we were acting harshly by withholding that license, or putting him to the inconvenience of going to the sessions.

682. But you would consider a complete police superintendence a more powerful protection than that mere feeling of responsibility?—Certainly.

683. Now with regard to the size of the room; of course that has some reference to the number of persons supposed to be in it?—We cannot estimate the number of persons there may be, it would depend on a variety of circumstances. Frequently they come, and we ask "What is the size of your room," and they say, "46 feet by 12;" perhaps that appears sufficient at the time, but on further investigation it appears to be no more than a mere passage.

684. Do you at all investigate the character of the approaches, the staircase leading into an upper room, for example, or the doorways?—We do to some extent, but there is no vigilant superintendence with regard to the approaches or the accommodation; we have no officer that we can employ for the purpose, and the county would not like us to go to the expense of a survey of all those places.

685. You make no investigation, then, with regard to the safety of the room?—No, except a visit from the local magistrate, if it is a new license; and if it does not appear very objectionable, then no objection is offered; but if it is very bad, the objection is stated, and the license refused.

686. No doubt in many cases in the West End of London, houses are so built, that though safe for the purposes of ordinary life, no lady would hold a ball in one of the upper rooms; do you examine rooms to see if the floor is such as safely to bear a crowd of excited, and some of them perhaps drunken, dancers?—No.

687. You have no funds?—No, we have no funds.

688. I will read you an answer which was given by Mr. Ponsonby on Monday last in answer to Question 238; "A case arose in this way some years ago (I think it was in the year 1857 or 1858): the proprietor of the Alhambra applied to the Lord Chamberlain for a license for the Alhambra; the Lord Chamberlain took the usual course; he sent an inspector, a professional surveyor, to inspect the building; the surveyor reported that one of the galleries was unsafe to contain such a large number of persons as the Alhambra was capable of holding, and that there was only one entrance for the whole audience. The Lord Chamberlain refused the license, but at the same time they had applied to the justices, and the justices, I believe without any examination, granted the license to the building?"—That is correct.

689. Now I want to ask you another question; your forms of licenses appear to be in blank?—Yes, they are filled up when they become licenses.

690. Of course I understand that the forms are filled up, some with music only and some with music and dancing?—Yes.

691. Then there are those general words, "or other public entertainment of the like kind"?—Yes, those words are now left out.

692. But have you in any case in your licenses defined the words "public entertainment of the like kind"?—No; I was asked the question when the licenses were granted last October, and I was obliged to say that the Bar to my left was the party who must give the explanation, and that it was not the Bench who were to interpret that.

693. You think that dancing by performers and scenic representations should be entirely separated from any drinking?—I think so.

694. Do you think that, taking an ordinary theatre, where at half-past six o'clock in the afternoon you see a crowd standing round the doors, and where the performance is not over before 12 o'clock, it is possible that so many people for so long a time should pass the evening without some refreshment?—I think they can do so. I have done it myself in former years; but they can go out for half an hour between the acts, and there are generally orange-women and persons with baskets who are allowed to go into the pit.

695. You would allow refreshments, but not ardent spirits?—Yes.

696. And beer?—Yes.

697. It is the custom in some of the French theatres to keep the refreshment rooms wholly subordinate, and to have long intervals between the acts, during which the audience may go out and visit the neighbouring coffee-houses, the intervals being made long for that purpose; do you think, having regard to the habits of the English people, it would be desirable that they should leave the theatre, visit the neighbouring public-houses, and then go in again?—They should not be restricted; they might do as they liked.

698. But, supposing the audience were largely composed of persons who felt that during six hours they must have some refreshment, should you think it more desirable that they should be allowed to walk out and get it, rather than that there should be a refreshment room within the building?—Yes, I should think so.

699. Assuming that there was a proper license for the performances, and assuming that there was an entire, complete, and practical absence of the private rooms which you think are a source of so much mischief, how should you then express your objection to eating and drinking going on among the audience during the performance itself in the room where the performance was taking place?—My objection is to their having private rooms, and to having ardent spirits all the time the performance is going on.

700. I am supposing that there is a license and that the performances in themselves are strictly such as we might wish; I am assuming the private rooms entirely excluded without any pretence; how should you express or define any objection that you have to drinking going on among among the audience during the performance?—I should have no objection except to ardent spirits.

23 March 1866.

701. But you would object to ardent spirits?—Yes.

702. Should you object to smoking?—Persons who like the fumes of tobacco might smoke; it does no moral harm.

703. Supposing that spirits are sold at the Alhambra, should you consider that as a reason for withdrawing the license from the Alhambra?—It would depend on whether it has been already granted or not; it would be an objection to granting the license in the first instance.

704. But would it be an objection to renewing the license?—I think it would if it became a public-house.

705. If it were proved the next time they applied for a license that spirits were consumed there under an Excise license, should you gravely consider that?—I think so.

706. And probably you would withdraw the license?—Yes, I think so; we have done it in one or two other cases, and I think we would not deviate from that rule.

707. If it were proved that great immoralities take place in the private rooms, should you consider that?—Yes.

708. And you would withdraw the license?—Yes, unless we had a pledge that all those rooms should be closed up, though according to the letter of the Act I believe we have no legal right to insist upon pledges; they often give us pledges that such and such things shall be done if we renew the license.

709. The same observation would apply to any improprieties between some of the performers and the visitors?—Yes, certainly.

710. Should you say that the Middlesex magistrates have any control whatever over places of public resort with regard to the safety of the public?—No.

711. Now with regard to open competition, I wish to ask you a question; I presume open competition involves seeking after popularity?—Certainly.

712. Do you not think that some men might select modes of gaining popularity which would not conduce to morality?—Unquestionably many would, and do.

713. Therefore you think probably that the greatest lover of open competition must admit that there must be some restraint on the selection of the modes by which popularity might be obtained?—I think so.

714. You stated, as I understood you, that the Bench have regard to the wants of the neighbourhood in granting licenses?—Yes.

715. Do you think it is possible to have regard to the wants of a neighbourhood without more or less admitting monopoly?—I am afraid not.

716. With regard to uniformity of system, and having a common authority for the purpose of licensing buildings for music or the drama, do you think that any evil would arise from having such complete uniformity; take it this way; what a cultivated audience might reject as vulgar, a vulgar audience might fail to appreciate, and reject as dull?—The same amusement would not suit all classes.

717. Then is there this difficulty, that you must either bring down the performances of the higher classes (so far as the license is concerned) to a low level, or else have them of such a character that the less educated people would not appreciate them?—The aim should be to elevate the lower mind to the level of the higher.

718. But suppose the lower mind refuses elevation?—I do not think, practically, that would be found to be the case. We know that for many years it was thought that the clergy did not sufficiently lower their ideas and language to meet the common people, but I have heard common people say, over and over again, we understood what so-and-so said, when another man came who preached very differently. I believe they attend more to a refined speech than to one that has a good deal of buffoonery about it.

719. Is it the fact that performances of classical music are sought after by the humbler classes of the community?—Very much; and if Exeter Hall was opened free when the Sacred Harmonic Society give some of their pieces, it would be overflowed by the working people; but it is an expensive operation, and cannot be done. It is a great misfortune, and there I believe France has the advantage over us; the Government supply amusements to the people, but here the people have to pay for it themselves, and therefore the labouring classes cannot afford it.

720. Do you think the French system practicable in England?—I think it would be practicable. I think occasionally it would do a great deal of good if certain refined things were given to the people gratuitously.

721. Having known London for many years, you have stated that there have been great improvements in the state of the streets at night; do you attribute that (among other causes, no doubt) to the increase of those places of public entertainment?—Yes, I do; though they have their evils, and very great evils, they have their benefits also.

722. In that sense?—Yes, in that sense; that they withdraw those people from the streets and concentrate them.

723. And by proportion they diminish the temptation to those who do not seek them?—Of course.

724. You said that you thought scenic accessories might be taken to constitute a drama; should you pay any regard to the attitude of the performers; a lover kneeling at the feet of his mistress, for example?—I do not think I should interfere with that; I should be very sorry to stop love in any way.

725. You would draw the line stiffly with the scenery?—I would not allow scenery; or any indecency in the attitudes; but I think there are many things that would make a theatrical entertainment without scenic representation; if individuals came in in costume, and if they put themselves in certain attitudes, if they performed in dumb show certain things, all that would partake of a theatrical character, in my opinion.

726. Probably your feelings would coincide with those of others, that the line is very difficult to draw by any words in an Act of Parliament?—There is no question about it.

727. We all know that in a great metropolis there must be much floating vice; do you consider, as a magistrate of long experience, that those music-halls add to that mass of floating vice?—No, I cannot say that, because the vice which takes place there is not floating in the public eye; it is not seen.

728. Then take it generally, that in the community munity there must be a certain amount of vice?—No doubt.

729. Do you think that the music-halls as now conducted increase that vice?—I am hardly able to say, but I fear they do.

730. Or are they merely scenes of it?—I fear that they engender it very much.

731. The tendency would really depend very much on the principle appealed to by the conductors of those halls, whether it be the intellectual principle or whether it be the lower feelings of our nature?—No doubt of it.

732. Do you think that there is an equality of justice between the different music-halls and dancing rooms with regard to the granting or withdrawing of licenses?—I think the present system works very equally.

733. There is a dancing room called Caldwell's, in Dean-street, Soho?—Yes.

734. The license was withdrawn?—Yes, because when they got our license they got the Lord Chamberlain's license on the strength of it, and therefore for one year we suspended our license altogether.

735. What went on under the Lord Chamberlain's license?—Scenic representations, almost theatrical; and the sale of spirits and wine, and so on.

736. You think then it would be inaccurate to say that of two rooms equally well or equally ill-conducted, one had the licence granted and the other had the license refused at the same sessions?—It would depend on where they were situated; if they were situated close together, the bench would not grant the two licenses; if they were in a different part of the town, or several streets apart, I think the bench would grant them both a license if they were equally eligible.

737. But with the present information which the bench enjoy, do you think, as a fact, assuming the best intention, that two rooms equally well conducted have an equal chance of having their licenses renewed?—It depends on where they are situated; if they were in different parts of the town, and the opposition of the inhabitants was the same, and all the concomitants were the same in both cases, I think they would both be likely to be licensed, but they certainly would not be licensed in the same street. The difficulty that the magistrates have, and I have no doubt that much public odium is cast upon them from this fact, is this—individuals take a large piece of ground for building purposes, and erect two or three streets, and they think they are therefore entitled at once to get spirit licenses for each of those streets, and they lay out a large sum of money in building a very grand place, and if we do not license it for music and dancing, they think we are inflicting on them an injury.

738. Mr. Locke.] They having built it for that purpose?—They having built it for that purpose, without any communication with us, and they, perhaps, knowing that there is a similar thriving concern within two or three streets.

739. Mr. Powell.] Do you find any objection, apart from competition, made to renewing the licenses by the inhabitants, simply because they do not want so large a congregation of people too near their homes at midnight?—Half of our time is occupied by hearing complaints on that ground at the sessions. We have complaints from the clergy and churchwardens, and many score of inhabitants against licensing any houses at all in certain neighbourhoods.

740. I presume you have no wish to stop those entertainments altogether?—None whatever, if they can be properly regulated.

741. Is any charge made for a music or dancing license?—None whatever. It would be very desirable in any alteration of the law that we should have an opportunity of charging 10*s.* or 5*s.* for a music license, and as that would apply to small public houses, 10*s.* or 10*s.* 6*d.* for the larger license.

742. Do the applicants usually have professional assistance?—Generally.

743. That involves, of course, a certain expense?—It is very expensive.

744. Mr. Walpole.] I suppose the expense is charged to the county rate?—Yes; the expense of printing the license, and so on.

745. I observe by that paper when you say you think that a house should be rated at a particular amount, you mention 200*l.* a-year. Is that the sum which you deliberately fix upon?—I merely put that in; but I think that would be better left to the discretion of the bench.

746. Is there anything else which you wish to state to the Committee?—There is one point in addition. In those music and dancing licenses it is requisite on every transfer that the notices, which are five or six each, should be proved on oath. The result is that probably the same person serves 30 or 40 notices on different individuals, and for different publicans, and he has to be sworn to each of those separate notices. It would really answer every purpose and save a great deal of time as well as oath taking, if the same individual who had served notices was once sworn that to the question which he is to be asked, he will answer truly, applying that to the whole number of cases instead of only one of them. And there is one more point which I wish to call the attention of the Committee to: by this Act, after the whole of the licenses have been gone through, which now amount to very nearly 400, they must be signed by four magistrates, and then when the licensing is over every separate license must be called over in court, with the names of the four magistrates who signed them. The consequence is that it would occupy the whole day merely to read over those licenses which have been granted. It is generally done to an empty court, unless I secure the same magistrates to sign all the licenses that are granted, and it is very often exceedingly inconvenient for the magistrates to remain two or three days to sign all the licenses. There is no practical use whatever in the licenses being called out after they are once granted. They are granted in open court, before the public, upon notice being given to the police, and put upon the church door, to the clerk of the peace, to the overseers, and to the churchwardens. Every publicity is given. If that clause could be omitted in any future Bill it would save an immense amount of trouble.

747. The object of that notice is that it should be publicly done in open court?—Yes; but the license is granted in a public court, and then you have to read, perhaps, 400 of them, with the names of four of the justices attached to each. I have known as many as 20 magistrates signing. It is just like throwing down a pack of cards, and then having to sort them afterwards.

748. Mr. Locke.] I will call your attention to that petition (handing a Paper to the Witness), which related to the Hanover-square Rooms. Do you recollect that petition being presented?—Yes;

H. Pownall, Esq.

23 March 1866.

Yes; I did, perhaps, what I was not justified in doing on that occasion.

749. Will you read the title to that petition?—"Copy of Petition lodged against the renewal of the licenses of the Hanover-square Rooms and the Egyptian Hall, but withdrawn on the understanding that it is to be presented again in October 1866, against every concert hall that has given a morning performance before five o'clock in the afternoon, in defiance of the Act of 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, unless the said Act shall by that time be amended or repealed."

750. Does that petition appear to you to be accurate?—The case was, that the Egyptian Hall had those entertainments before five o'clock, and the Hanover-square Rooms had also those entertainments, and I have no doubt in the world that the person who was going to lay the information must have received something considerable to prevent his going on with it before the Court.

751. But was it not this, that that petition was presented by persons connected with the music-halls. In consequence of proceedings having been taken against them they brought to the notice of the Middlesex magistrates the present state of the law, namely, that under their license no musical performance could take place before five o'clock, and then they withdrew it, but said they should renew it unless some fresh legislation took place?—This petition was never presented to the court. If it had been presented to the court then we could not have renewed the license to the Hanover-square Rooms or the Egyptian Hall. I stopped the counsel who was going to state to the court why the petition was withdrawn, because the very fact of his stating that would have informed the court of the violation of the law, which would have left us no alternative.

752. Had notice been given that such a petition would be presented?—Yes.

753. Then it appears in your proceedings at the quarter sessions that there was such a petition?—Yes. "No 15. Robert Cocks, Queen's Concert Rooms, No. 4, Hanover-square; opposed;" it therefore would have stood over to the last day, but the petition never came before the court.

754. But it had been lodged in some way, I presume?—It never came before my notice. I do not think I ever saw it. Whether it was lodged in the Clerk of the Peace's Office I cannot tell, but it was never produced in court. If the opposition had been persisted in, then the petition would have been read in court, both for and against; but in order that serious consequences might not arise, I have no doubt that the party who laid the information had a douceur to withdraw it; I dare say he might have been employed by the music halls.

755. However, does not that clearly raise the question as to whether or not your license was sufficient to enable the Hanover-square Rooms to have musical performances before five o'clock in the afternoon?—Certainly.

756. In consequence of that, as we have it in evidence from Mr. Ponsonby, the Lord Chamberlain has given a theatrical license to those persons?—Yes.

757. Where you had before granted a music license?—Yes.

758. He supplemented your music license with a theatrical license?—Yes.

759. And they do all that they like now?—Yes.

760. Whether that is legal or not depends on the Attorney and Solicitor Generals having given an opinion to that effect, or the decision of a court of law, which has never been given?—Just so. There are, of course, great doubts about the legality of it.

761. Lord Ernest Bruce.] Is St. James's Hall licensed for performances after five o'clock?—Certainly.

762. And not before five o'clock?—I believe that it has now the same license from the Lord Chamberlain,

763. No; the Lord Chamberlain has refused it. I went there myself two or three times last year, and I heard very good concerts by the leading artistes of the day. I heard Jenny Lind and Carlotta Patti, and the prices of admission were a guinea and two guineas, the performance taking place between half-past two and half-past four. now for what is Mr. Donald licensed?—He has a license for music and dancing; and if it came before the court in an official way that he had had music and dancing before five o'clock in the afternoon, it is imperative on the magistrates (they have no option) not to renew the license to him; nor can he ever have one again for that house. I hope before you make that complaint before us as magistrates the law will be altered.

764. Do you think it desirable that there should be one law for the rich and one for the poor, in these matters?—The severity of the penalty has prevented information from being laid; there is no doubt of it.

765. Mr. Selwin.] In issuing licenses for music and dancing, you contemplate that the dancing merely includes the visitors?—Yes.

766. But a decision has been come to which says that there is no law to confine it to them, has there not?—That decision leaves it open.

767. But on the renewal of a license, would the knowledge of the holders having violated your license, in your idea be a sufficient ground for refusing it?—No, I think not; as the law is not definite now, we should not take the responsibility of refusing the license.

768. Mr. Lusk.] As a matter of fact, do you know if those 291 music halls, and the 60 music and dancing halls, are well attended?—I have no means of ascertaining that; I believe that the larger ones, such as Weston's Music Hall, Highbury Barn, and the Oxford are very frequently crowded.

769. Do you think as a rule that they are well attended?—Yes, no doubt.

770. Mr. Powell.] Do you feel satisfied in the present state of the law, which is confessedly imperfect, that any gross and manifest improprieties at the music and dancing halls do practically come to the knowledge of the Bench when application is made for the renewal of the license?—I do not believe that they do.

Sir THOMAS HENRY, called in; and Examined.

Sir T. Henry.

771. Mr. Walpole.] YOU are the Chief Magistrate of Bow-street Police Court?—Yes.

772. How long have you held that appointment?—I have been 26 years magistrate, and two years Chief Magistrate.

773. Have you been 26 years at Bow-street?—No, —No, I have been 20 years at Bow-street; I was for six years previously at Whitechapel and Lambeth Police Courts, but for the last 20 years I have been at Bow-street.

774. With regard to dancing and music halls, and places of that description, you have no doubt had considerable experience with regard to the results, and effects produced by the present system of licensing, and the conduct of the public in those halls?—I believe so.

775. Since you have been a magistrate in the metropolis, these licenses have considerably increased in number, have they not?—Yes, they have considerably increased within the last 12 or 14 years.

776. When they were first introduced were many complaints brought before you in consequence of the conduct of the parties who attended such places?—No.

777. Have many cases of complaint come before you in later years?—Very few.

778. Then have you any reason to think that they are on the whole well or ill conducted?—I believe them to be well conducted.

779. Mr. Powell.] Do you speak of the music halls?—Yes.

780. And dancing halls also?—And dancing halls also.

781. Mr. Walpole.] Do you think that that is owing chiefly to the fact that the license might be withheld at the end of the term of the license, or to the fact that the police attend to the conduct of the parties there, or to both causes combined?—I attribute it chiefly to the regard which the proprietor has for his own interest; the supervision of the police is very slight.

782. You think that the power of refusing the license at the end of the year is the principal cause which keeps the conductors of those houses under proper restraint?—I believe that to be the chief cause.

783. Have you any reason to think that additional police regulations might be advantageous for the purpose of keeping them even more orderly than you represent them to be at present?—I think that more supervision is required, but that it should be supervision of a different nature; supervision, I mean, to see that the performances are of a proper kind.

784. Will you have the goodness to explain to the Committee the kind of supervision which you think is required with regard to the performances in those halls?—I think that the licensing authority ought to be vested in one person, and I think that that authority should have a sufficient staff to visit the different places to see that there was no infringement of the law and no impropriety of conduct.

785. Have you at all considered in what one person you would place that supervising authority?—I think that places of public amusement have so much increased that a new officer should be appointed for the purpose.

786. You think that a new office should be created, and that in the person who holds that office the power of granting the license and the power of ascertaining that the conditions of the license are properly observed, should be vested exclusively?—I think so.

787. By your answer would you wish the Committee to understand that you would give him a magisterial authority for seeing whether the conditions of the license were properly observed?—I agree with what Mr. Ponsonby said, that the licensing of theatres and music halls ought to be under the same authority, and I think that authority ought to judge what places were to be licensed, and to see that they were fit for the object which they were intended to carry out, and that he should have persons under him who would visit those places and who would have the power to report to him if any impropriety took place, and then he would have the absolute power to rescind at any period of the year the license which he had granted. Of course that officer should be under the control of the Secretary of State and amenable to Parliament for his conduct, because it would be a very large power to give to anyone. The only reason why I recommend that is, that it would ensure one uniform system, which is not the case now; at present there is a want of uniformity. But in making those observations I wish distinctly to observe that it is not with a view in the slightest degree to disparage anything connected with the mode of licensing under the Lord Chamberlain's department with regard to the theatres, or under the magistrates with respect to the music-halls or public-houses. I believe that their duties have been very well performed, but they have no staff.

788. Mr. Powell.] And no money?—Just so; they have no funds.

789. Mr. Walpole.] Taking first the theatres, strictly speaking, do you see any reason for taking away from the Lord Chamberlain, supposing that he had a proper staff under him, the power of licensing the theatres and the power of licensing plays?—The only reason I see is, that I think all places of public amusement ought to be under the control of one and the same authority, as they are in France. Great benefit is derived from that, because the licensing authority can then regulate what sorts of amusements should be afforded to the public according to the localities in which they are to be granted. They have various kinds of performance in Paris in different parts of the town, greatly to the advantage of the public. The theatre that is suited to the West End of the town would not be suited to Whitechapel; so, on the other hand, he could regulate the sort of amusement to be permitted in music halls.

790. Are the Committee to understand that, in your opinion, the officer to be created and appointed according to your suggestion is to have an arbitrary power of dealing with the holders of those licenses irrespective of submitting a case to any magistrate?—It is no more arbitrary than the power now exercised by the Lord Chamberlain as to theatres, and by the licensing magistrates with regard to the music and dancing halls.

791. The licensing magistrate cannot now withdraw a license in the middle of the year, can he?—No; but he can do so at the end of the year.

792. But you would enable him at any period of the year to do that if his regulations were supposed to be broken?—Yes, if there was a gross case; because a performance might be introduced that ought not to be allowed to continue for one day.

793. Would you delegate to that same officer the authority to license plays as well as to license theatres?—Yes; I think it would be a great advantage. It becomes a very important question, because places of public amusement are increasing so fast that it is scarcely within the management of the licensing authorities, as now constituted.

794. With regard to the licensing of plays, are they so numerous that the same authority could not continue to do it now as did it before?—Even with regard to the licensing of plays, I believe there are many objectionable plays that are not prevented from appearing.

23 March 1866.

795. Then you would intend your new officer to exercise even stricter authority with regard to the licensing of plays than the Lord Chamberlain does at present?—I should not use the word "stricter," perhaps. I think he should have a larger staff; he has now no staff. A play may read very well, and there may not apparently be much objection to it, but when it is presented on the stage it may be objectionable, and the licensing authority should have a staff of inspectors who would visit the theatres from time to time to see that nothing objectionable took place.

796. I thought I understood you to say that there were many plays which you think, for the sake of public morals, might be advantageously stopped by the Lord Chamberlain?—Occasionally that has occurred.

797. Would you put any limit to the authority of this new officer in determining what plays should or should not be allowed to go on?—I think that he should be a person of considerable ability and position, under the control of the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

798. You contemplate the creation of an officer of very high position, and of a very different character from the officer who has now to perform all these duties, and that they should be combined in one person?—Yes; no doubt. They have such an officer in Paris, and the system works well

799. Would you enable him to exercise a very large authority with regard to extemporary observations that might be made by the clown in a pantomine, or any other person, though they were not written down?—He would of course exercise that authority with discretion. He would know very well that in this country any arbitrary interference would not be permitted.

800. Is he to determine those matters by evidence submitted before him, or upon the information which he obtains from different persons, irrespective of any evidence to be taken in open court?—Supposing he received information, he would have the power to send or to go and see himself, and he would have the power to remonstrate with the manager; it might not become necessary to stop the performance or to take away the license; an intimation from the officer would probably have the effect of altering that which was deemed objectionable.

801. But if it happened to be what he thought an immoral play, would you give him the power, irrespective of any evidence to be adduced before him in open court, of dealing with that play, or rather with those who performed it, so as to stop it at once?—Of course, I take it for granted that he would not do it without hearing what the manager had to say, and without having the question, as it were, argued whether or not it deserved that infliction.

802. In other words, you contemplate, if I understand you rightly, that this officer should act at all events occasionally, not to say often, through the intervention of some court which he would hold himself?—Yes.

803. Your suggestion amounts to this: that there should be a high public officer appointed to superintend and to regulate all places of public amusement within the metropolis, with a power of exercising magisterial authority in open court, if any abuse is practised within those places?—Yes, just so.

804. There is another point, with regard to the licensing of places of amusement of another character. Do you see any reason why the enforcing of proper order in the places which are to be open for public amusement should not be made almost entirely a matter of police regulation only, or, to put the same thing differently, do you see any reason why any license should be granted by the magistrates for the purpose of opening any of those places of public amusement, provided that you had enacted by law, proper police regulations which can be enforced in court if any misconduct takes place in those places?—May I ask who is to issue those regulations.

805. The Act of Parliament?—That would supply the regulation that I intended should be used by the new officer. But it would be very difficult to put into an Act of Parliament all the regulations that would be required.

806. With regard to the proper conduct of those places, surely there might be regulations such as you have in your Police Act, that if certain things were done in those places, the license should be either suspended or forfeited, and that the magistrates should have the power of determining that suspension or forfeit?—That could be done.

807. Suppose that could be done by a carefully prepared Act of Parliament, do you then see any particular advantage in the going to the magistrates to grant a license for opening those places?—No; I do not see that there is any necessity for getting a license. My object is to take care that there is the power of supervision.

808. It has been stated by the last witness that the magistrates in granting those licenses have regard to the character of the neighbourhood and to the wants of the neighbourhood, and that they look into those matters; but that they do not look into the question either of the substantiality of the building, or the convenience of the building for carrying on the business within the building when it is erected; if that is so, does the license really give all that security to the public which the public is entitled to require?—No, it does not; I think there ought to be that inspection before the license is granted.

809. You heard the evidence of Mr. Pownall, I suppose?—Yes.

810. You heard him say, perhaps, that one of the primary duties of the Lord Chamberlain is to see that the building is suited for the purpose, and that the means of ingress and egress are proper and sufficient, and that the risk of accidents consequent on the non-performance of such conditions is thereby diminished?—That is a most important matter, no doubt, but that is not the case with music-halls.

811. Then in whatever persons you vest the authority for licensing those music-halls, you would probably think it very advantageous that additional authority should be conferred upon those persons, whoever they may be, to see that the building was properly constructed?—The officer so appointed should have one or two surveyors to inspect every building before it was opened to the public.

812. Unless the magistrates have the power to appoint a surveyor, do you think that the present system is very defective in that respect?—That is what I meant by saying that they had not a sufficient staff.

813. According to your system, you would give the appointment of the surveyor to the new officer whom you intend to appoint?—Yes.

814. With regard to the conduct of people in the theatres themselves, as distinct from the music halls, have you noticed since you have been a magistrate any great difference in the conduct of the persons who frequent those theatres, comparing the time when you first began to exercise the office of magistrate with the present time?—No doubt their conduct has been improving every year among nearly every class, especially all the lower classes.

815. But are not the regulations of the theatres very much altered with regard to the presence of immoral persons there?—There is merely the alteration of not having saloons where women of the town assembled.

816. Is not that a very considerable alteration?—The women that used to go there now go to the Argyll Rooms, the Casino in Holborn, and other places of that kind.

817. Do you mean that the theatres are better conducted, but that the other rooms are not well conducted?—No doubt that is an advantage to the theatres; the change was introduced by Mr. Macready.

818. And Mr. and Mrs. Kean did something in the same direction, did they not?—Yes, no doubt that example set by Mr. Macready was followed up.

819. Mr. Ponsonby stated in his evidence that the Lord Chamberlain has required that the regulations in that respect should be adhered to?—I believe so.

820. Have you any further suggestions to offer to the Committee with regard to what you consider the best mode of putting those places of public amusement under proper control and supervision?—Supervision is what is required, because there is no supervision at present, except a check on the proprietor by his regard for his own interest.

821. If the officer whom you suggest were appointed, would you give to every person as a matter of right, subject to conditions imposed for the proper conduct of his place, the right to claim a license for one of those establishments?—I think there should not be too many; there should be a limit.

822. How could you draw that limit?—The officer who had all that business under his control would soon find out what the requirements of the public were.

823. But unless you have, so to speak, complete free trade, would not some excluded persons be apt to think that they were justly aggrieved?—I think that to open two large places in one street would be inconvenient.

824. Would you give the first comer the preference?—Yes; if one good place is established, I think that another is not wanted in the immediate vicinity of it.

825. Who is to be the judge of that?—At present the licensing magistrates judge of that; it is only the transfer of that power of judging to the new officer; it is done now by a fluctuating body of 50 or 60 magistrates (they are not always the same). If it were performed by one officer, with a good staff under him, he would know what was required.

826. You would leave him to his own discretion, would you?—He should be a high officer; a man of character and ability, whose acts would be respected, and who would be subject of course to the control of the Secretary of State.

827. He would be, in fact, the executor of his own law?—To a great extent he would.

828. Mr. Locke.] That is so at present with regard to the Lord Chamberlain, is it not?—It is so; there is no appeal from the Lord Chamberlain.

829. You have spoken about the law as it is in France; are you aware that that law has very recently been altered, and that they have now what they call la liberté du théâtre?—I am aware of that.

830. Probably you have witnessed performances at the "Variétés"?—Yes.

831. I believe that under the new law in France you can perform any species of play, or burletta, or opera, at any place?—I am not prepared to say that, I rather think not. I do not think that the liberté du théâtre goes so far as that.

832. Do you recollect the representation of something very like an inferior music hall in a piece, where they had a goose brought on to the stage for a man to eat, and where there was below a table set out, and they were eating their refreshments while the play was going on behind; that being a piece introduced at the "Variétés" to ridicule the new law?—Yes, but I do not draw my inference from that.

833. You do not know exactly what the new law is in France?—I do not.

834. The law, as it existed before, licensed particular theatres for particular descriptions of performances?—Yes, it did, and I thought that an advantage.

835. But, do you not think that the wants of the public with regard to the different descriptions of performances are sufficient to regulate that; for instance, we have now one species of performance at the Strand Theatre, another at the Olympic, another at the Adelphi, another description (which now and then is interfered with by Mr. Kean) at the Princess's, and at Covent Garden and Drury-lane a sort of omnium gatherum since they have become what they are. Do you think it necessary that there should be an officer to direct what description of performance should take place at each of the theatres?—It is rather a theatrical question, but my impression is that the system adopted in Paris works better. There is not much difference between the new and the old systems in Paris; practically it is the same. I think that the different classes of performances are better distributed in Paris than here; the people know exactly where to find the particular class of performance that they wish to see.

836. You have not said anything with regard to the class of performances which should be exhibited at the music-halls. Do you see any objection to the music-halls performing light pieces, such as burlettas, vaudevilles, or ballets?—I do not.

837. Do you think it would be an advantage that that privilege should be extended to the music-halls, and that they should not be restricted as they are now to such performances as they are permitted to give, and always be in a state of fear of going beyond a certain line which that section of the 6 & 7 Vict. defines in such a very doubtful and inaccurate way?—I think it would be an advantage to extend it, and to make the line better defined; to give them larger powers than they are now supposed to have.

838. Would you suggest that that should be done

23 March 1866.

done by license, as plays are at the theatre?—Yes; I think so. That is one object I have in view in saying that the licensing authority should have the power to regulate all that.

839. Mr. Powell.] By a license for each performance, do you mean?—No; he could set that forth in a general license.

840. Mr. Walpole.] I understand you to mean that you would extend the power of giving this kind of license to those music-halls as well as to the theatres proper?—Yes.

841. But in both cases you would require a license?—Yes, in both cases.

842. Mr. Locke.] Referring to the Bill which I brought in last Session, you will see Clause 9 says, "The term 'stage play' for the purposes of this Act includes everything; but at the same time it was suggested to the managers of theatres to say what they would like to strike out or leave in. Will you be good enough to look at that clause, in which, I think, we enumerated nearly every species of performance, and will you tell the Committee what performance you think would be properly adapted to the music-halls where refreshments of the description you are aware of are going on all the time, in the way which I suppose you have seen?—Two or three of the last-named performances, burletta, pantomime, and ballet, I think all those might be put in.

843. And operetta?—The word "operetta" is not here.

844. Opera?—That would be rather infringing on the higher classes of entertainment, I think.

845. But have you heard any of the singing at any of those music-halls lately?—I went on Monday night on purpose, because I thought the question would be asked. I went to the Alhambra.

846. Did you hear the performance of the Orphée aux Enfers?—I did not hear the whole of it. I heard some of the singing, it was principally the ballet that I saw. I was late in going in.

847. In addition to that they have a vast number of singers, have they not, who perform the whole of the music from the beginning to the end of that opera?—No doubt.

848. And very good singers?—Yes.

849. Do you think, seeing that they perform a whole opera now, and do it as if it were in a concert room, inasmuch as they have no dresses on, that there would be any inconvenience or impropriety in their being dressed in character, as they are at the theatres?—It is difficult to draw the line exactly how far the music-halls are to go without encroaching on what I might term the privileges of the theatres.

850. But light opera might be included, perhaps?—Yes; I think it would not be objectionable. The taste for performances of that kind is certainly increasing every day, and the Continental habit of going to places where people can have some amusement and some refreshment is, no doubt, increasing in this country very much.

851. Take Berlin: do you recollect the gardens there?—Yes.

852. Are not there theatres there?—Yes.

853. And Vienna again?—Yes.

854. Do you recollect Amsterdam. Are you aware that there is a theatre there where they enact vaudevilles, and where the audience part of the theatre is fitted up just in the same way as at the Alhambra or the Oxford, or any of those places, with tables and seats for taking refreshments and smoking?—It is very common abroad in many places.

855. Is it not your opinion that the very fact of this performance going on, supposing it always were regulated by a license, acts as a preventive to excessive drinking?—So long as you permit persons to drink, and to have tables before them while the performance is going on, I cannot say that drinking is prevented.

856. But do you not think that a person going into the parlour of a public-house where there was no performance to look at, the sole object being drinking, would probably drink a great deal more to elevate his spirits than a person who had something else to do?—Yes, I think that very probable. A music-hall has this advantage, that a man now takes his wife and part of his family with him generally to a music-hall, whereas he used to go alone to the public-house; that I consider a great advantage in the new system. You see that at the Alhambra, and you see it at Canterbury Hall. Certainly the great majority of the people at the Alhambra were respectable tradespeople and mechanics, with their families, looking at the dancing.

857. Mr. Powell.] What time were you there?—Between 10 and 11 o'clock.

858. The last witness lays stress on the hour?—I went to the Alhambra, the Pavilion, and the Argyll Rooms on Monday night purposely, that I might give you "the latest information" about those places.

859. Mr. Locke.] You went to the Alhambra between 10 and 11 o'clock. That is about the time that the last ballet is performed, is it not?—I was looking more at the audience than at the stage.

860. But you were there while the ballet was performed?—The ballet was quite as decent as it is at the Opera.

861. Which ballet was that?—I did not ask the name of it.

862. Was it a ballet of different dances?—There were different dances, but I did not pay great attention to it.

863. I believe there is no story in it?—I did not collect that there was much story in it.

864. I understand you to say that both the licensing of the theatres and the licensing of plays should, according to your view, be placed under some new officer?—I think that would be an advantage, because I believe that under the present system there is no staff and no funds to ensure any supervision.

865. And that officer should have the power of licensing those music-halls, and then they would be licensed quà theatres, only that he would restrict them to particular performances?—Just so; I think that a good officer in that place would have an opportunity of greatly elevating the stage and the music-hall.

866. I suppose you are aware of the 7th Section of the Inland Revenue Act of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 39; which was a clause introduced into a Bill about an entirely different matter; there was also a clause introduced into my Bill of last Session, Clause 8, that "a house, room, garden, or other place licensed under Section 2 of the Act of King George the 2d as applied by this Act shall not by reason only of being so licensed be deemed a theatre or place of public entertainment licensed by justices within the meaning of Section 7 of the the Act of the Session of the 5th and 6th years of the Reign of King William the 4th (c. 39), to exempt certain retailers of spirits to a small amount from the additional duties on licenses and to discontinue the Excise survey on wine and the use of permits for the removal thereof." That clause was to provide that where a license is given by the Lord Chamberlain, as a matter of course the spirit license follows; are you aware of that?—Yes.

867. You would not propose, I presume, that those licenses granted by the Lord Chamberlain should carry the spirit license with them?—No, that is a matter of Excise; that comes from the Inland Revenue.

868. But the Excise have no option, have they?—No; nor do they want any; they merely want to have the revenue; the more spirits there are consumed the better for them.

869. Then how would you license those places; take the case of the theatres; the whole of those theatres and music-halls are places of public entertainment; from whom should you propose that they should have the spirit license?—From the Inland Revenue.

870. As a matter of course?—As a matter of course. I would say that no excisable articles should be consumed in any place of public amusement without an Excise license.

871. Would you say that the Lord Chamberlain's license to those places of public amusement should carry that Excise license?—No, not at all; it would authorise them to ask for it if they intended refreshments to be consumed.

872. But should there be anybody in particular who would grant or refuse that license?—As a matter of course the Excise would grant it if excisable articles were to be consumed.

873. You would grant permission to a person who has built a music-hall to enact plays of a particular kind in it which those licenses would designate?—Yes.

874. Do you think that that license having been granted for those plays, the person to whom the license has been granted would have nothing to do but to go to the Excise and show the license which he had got?—That ought to be a sufficient authority.

875. That answer would apply to the theatres and music-halls as well, I suppose?—To both.

876. With regard to the mode of taking those refreshments; do you propose that there should be any regulations made by the new authority?—I think he ought to have some power of supervision with regard to that matter.

877. Then, in fact, a place being licensed as a theatre, or any place of entertainment, would have, as a matter of course, a wine, spirit, and beer license, but the mode of conducting the refreshment department would be left to the direction of the new officer?—Yes.

878. Do you propose any further powers to be given to the police with regard to entering those places?—I do not think that that is required; at present the police, who are stationed in the theatres, are really the servants for the time being of the proprietor, because they are paid each night by the proprietor of the theatre or music-hall.

879. You think that the proprietor of the music-hall has the police there as a matter of his own interest?—He asks the Commissioner of Police to let him have a certain number of police constables; they are allotted to him, and he pays for them, but they have no supervision over the performances.

880. Nor have they, I suppose, any particular supervision over what goes on there?—Not much.

881. Do you think it is necessary that they should have that supervision?—I think that the proprietor takes very good care of that; he will not permit any drunken person to go in; and if there is any misconduct, he takes good care that the person so misconducting himself shall be turned out. At the Casino in Holborn that is carried so far, that if a woman of the town behaves with the slightest indelicacy she is desired to leave the place, and she is not permitted to enter again.

882. Have you considered what you would do with regard to this Music and Dancing License Act of Geo. 2?—I think that that Act is not suited to the present time at all.

883. You would repeal all those Acts and have one new Act?—Yes, certainly; I would repeal them all and have a new Act.

884. You would have a fresh Act for the better regulation of all places of public amusement?—Yes.

885. Mr. Walpole.] The police are paid for by the managers, are they not?—Yes.

886. But the police are still obliged to perform their duties as policemen in case they saw anything wrong?—Yes; they are acting as constables.

887. Mr. Powell.] Are they forced, in virtue of their office, to make a report to the magistrates at the police courts?—They report to the Police Commissioner; they never report to us.

888. Mr. Walpole.] Sir Richard Mayne was asked in 1853 this question: "Are all places of public resort subject to a license? (a.) They are subject to a license; and they are visited likewise by the police; the police have no legal authority to enter, but there are tickets given to them by the manager to enable them to go in free, and they report monthly what the conduct of the people is; and if any case of misconduct occurs, a report to the Lord Chamberlain is forwarded by me." Is that so?—Yes; I believe that is quite correct.

889. Lord Eustace Cecil.] You said that you were in favour of a new authority being appointed in which the whole of the power connected with these matters should be vested?—Yes; for all places of public amusement.

890. How would you propose to control him; would you leave everything entirely to his discretion?—At present there is no control over the Lord Chamberlain, and there is no control over the Middlesex justices, and therefore it would not be giving any more arbitrary authority by fixing the responsibility on one man than there is in the responsibility which is now very much scattered.

891. You propose, in fact, to allow him perfect carte blanche to do what he pleases?—I have said that he should be a very superior officer, under the control of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, because I consider this is a matter within the range of that department.

892. Do you think that the Secretary of State for the Home Department should be able to quash his decisions?—I should think there would be no objection to give a power of appeal; that would be very proper.

893. That he should be controlled by the Secretary of State?—Yes, that he should be controlled by the Secretary of State, and be amenable to Parliament.

Sir T. Henry.

23 March 1866.

894. Lord Ernest Bruce.] You have been for some years a police magistrate in London?—Yes.

895. And some years chief magistrate at Bow-street?—Yes.

896. From your experience in those capacities, do you think that the increase of those saloons and dancing places has been for the good or for the bad of the community in general; has it been a public good, as drawing men away from the gin palaces and public-houses, or the reverse?—I think on the whole that it has been for the public good.

897. Mr. Du Cane.] I think you stated at the beginning of your examination that you find the music and dancing-halls are generally very well conducted?—Yes; the best proof of that is, that they have very rarely furnished a case for examination in a police court.

898. I think you said that more police supervision was required?—No; I mean supervision of a different kind to see to the performance, not police supervision.

899. Have you ever had any complaints with regard to the character of the performance at these places?—No, but I foresee that the number of places will go on increasing, and there may be more competition, and we cannot always be so certain that they will be free from objection.

900. I understood you to say that you would rather extend than not the present style of performances at music-halls, but I did not exactly understand where you would draw the line; would you let music-halls give dramatic performances, or not?—I said it was very difficult to draw the line; I cannot give a better instance of that than by quoting the decision of the Court of Common Pleas on that very point last year. The Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas differed very much from the other three judges on the question of fact, whether or not the performance at the Alhambra came within the definition of a stage play; he said that as a matter of fact, he thought it did not; Mr. Justice Willes, Mr. Justice Byles, and Mr. Justice Keating were of a different opinion, and they thought it did.

901. That is a question of the construction to be put on the existing law?—Yes.

902. But supposing that to be altered, do you think it advisable that the music-halls should act stage plays?—I think a very light vaudeville, or something of that kind, should be permitted. I would not confine them altogether to music and ballet dancing.

903. You have said that you visited the Alhambra a very few days ago?—Yes.

904. Was that with a view to this inquiry?—Yes.

905. Did you hear Mr. Spencer Ponsonby's evidence on that point?—Yes, and I looked at the audience purposely to see whether I could or not agree in what he stated.

906. Your opinion and his do not coincide?—No, we do not coincide; there are three classes of people there; they have stalls, reserved seats, and the pit or promenade; the prices of entrance are, 4*s.*, 2*s.*, and 1*s.* There are different classes of persons in those different places, and certainly nearly the whole of them appeared to me to be very orderly, well-conducted, respectable people, both men and women. I took a superintendent of police with me who knows the district well, and has done so for several years; he could give you very accurate information about those music-halls if the Committee wish for it. He said "There is not a woman of the town among all that part," including the whole three places, the stalls, reserved seats, and promenade; women of the town do not go to the lower part of the house, but they do go up to the gallery.

907. Did you go up to the gallery?—Yes, and I walked round and saw about how many there were; the police superintendent pointed out to me almost all of them.

908. Were there a great many?—I should say there were about 50 or 60.

909. That is not so many as you would have seen in the saloon of a theatre in earlier days?—Perhaps about the same as there used to be in the saloons of Covent Garden and Drury Lane; but not so many as there are now in the Argyll Rooms.

910. Were they conducting themselves in an orderly manner?—I saw no impropriety.

911. You saw nothing of those private rooms that we have heard of, did you?—No. I was surprised to hear what Mr. Pownall said on that point, because I believe there are no private rooms. I saw a large supper room with several tables in it; but I was taken all over the house. I believe so, at least, and I certainly had no impression that there were any private rooms. That was new to me.

912. Your visit took place subsequently to Mr. Ponsonby's examination?—Yes, I went on purpose.

913. You have no reason to suppose that the probability of your paying them a visit was known, have you?—Not at all. I went to Vine-street Station before 10 o'clock, and I took the superintendent of police with me in order that he might point out the different people and give me information.

914. You had never heard of the existence of those private rooms before you heard this evidence to-day?—No, I never heard of it. I went all over Canterbury Hall with Mr. Norton, and I had no reason to suppose that there are any private rooms there.

915. Mr. Lusk.] As a magistrate, of course, you have a very great deal of experience of crime and its causes; are there many cases that come before you which originate with music-halls and theatres?—I have already stated that there have been very few cases.

916. I suppose that the inference you draw is, on the whole, that these music-halls do good?—I think the requirements of the public tend that way, and I think it would be impossible to suppress or exclude them. I think the object should be to direct them.

917. You assume from that that it is necessary we should have places of entertainment?—I think so.

918. Do you not think that the higher the class of entertainment is the better?—I think so.

919. You know, I suppose, that the theatres complain that those music-halls enter on their domain?—Yes; I am quite aware of that.

920. The object which we ought to have in view being to benefit the community, do you think there is any objection to acting Shakspeare in music-halls?—I think there ought to be a distinction. Theatres are built for the purpose of having stage plays, but music-halls are not.

921. The object which we ought to have in view is to keep up the taste of the people, is it not?

not?—I think there cannot be a fusion; they cannot be exactly on the same footing.

922. What do you mean by privileges of the theatres of which you spoke?—The patent theatres, of course, have certain privileges, and all theatres have the privilege that a dramatic performance cannot be held at any other place, except under the license of the Lord Chamberlain; that is, the privilege to which I referred.

923. Do you think it is desirable for the public good that the theatres should possess those privileges?—That is to say, whether there should be free trade in such matters. I am not prepared to go that length.

924. But you think it is advisable that there should be some distinct line drawn between theatres and music saloons?—I do.

925. And that there should be one officer to exercise a power of moral inspection over them all?—Yes; that is one of the great points.

926. Supposing the officer saw no objection to people acting a higher class of entertainment at music-halls?—I should not differ from him, if, after some experience, he came to that conclusion; I should assume that he was right.

927. If the place was well conducted and everything properly done, would it not, in your opinion, be desirable that there should be a higher class of entertainment?—In some respects it would.

928. Always keeping the good of the community in view?—Yes; but that is not the sole object.

929. I think you have said that the present managers conduct their places very well?—Very well indeed.

930. What reason do you assign for that?—Their regard for their own interests, and the fear of the withdrawal of their license.

931. At all events they do it of their own accord?—Just so.

932. You would not agree, then, to throwing open to all the world the entire range of dramatic and quasi-dramatic entertainment, subject only to the laws of supply and demand?—No; there must be a licensing power somewhere.

933. Assuming a licensing power, you would still think it right to prescribe that particular classes of the people should be compelled to go to certain privileged places if they desired to witness a particular class of entertainment, and you would not give liberty to enact any and every description of play at a place which bore the name of a music-hall?—No, I would not.

934. Supposing your officer had licensed a house, would it make any difference to the community what kind of performances there were there, presuming that all performances, everywhere, were unobjectionable in point of morality and literature?—It would make no difference to the community.

935. Then where do you propose to draw the line between what should constitute a "theatre" and what should not?—I admit it is difficult to draw the line, but practically it could be carried out.

936. You would not give people liberty to enact what they pleased to suit the tastes of their audiences, even under the censorship of this officer; but you would still give exclusive privileges to certain theatres?—I think that the licensing officer should have a power of defining that.

937. Do you think that he should not allow people to enact what they pleased, supposing they were respectable and decorous?—He would do it under certain rules, I presume.

938. Mr. Selwin.] Those rules might be very easily defined by the Act of Parliament, might they not?—Very easily.

939. It would be better that he should be guided by some Act of Parliament in using his discretion, I suppose?—Yes, that would be better.

940. When you speak of those places being well conducted, do you think that the mere fact of cases not appearing before the police court is conclusive evidence that no such cases exist?—I think that it is strong evidence.

941. You said that the police are the paid agents of the managers; there is no inducement, consequently, unless an open breach of the peace takes place, to report any breach of morality, is there?—They are under the control of the Commissioner of Police.

942. But have they orders to report such cases, because, no doubt, the inducement is the other way, namely, to conceal those cases?—No doubt. I think that is a bad arrangement; and I think it ought to be altered.

943. That the police ought to have no payment from the managers?—Yes, that they ought to have no payment from the managers.

944. Do you think they ought to attend under the directions of your officer whom we will call a censor? — The manager might be made to pay an annual sum, but he ought not to pay each police constable.

945. Mr. Powell.] You think that the selection of the policemen ought to rest not with the managers of the halls, but with the heads of police?—It does rest with the Commissioner of Police now, but the men whom he selects to go there are paid by the managers.

946. Directly?—Yes; that is objectionable.

947. Do you think that at the theatres there should be a license for each play by some officer or other?—I think that the play ought to be read, undoubtedly.

948. But I do not understand you to say that every light piece performed at the music-halls ought to be examined page by page?—Probably the pieces would not require it, but if it were found necessary they should be subjected to it.

949. But on the ground of public morality, why is not the same examination required in both classes of entertainment?—The same rule ought to apply to both on that ground.

950. You have expressed your opinion that the music-halls should be allowed to perform light pieces; have you in your mind music-halls as now conducted, with all their accessories, and people in the audience part of the house drinking beer and spirits, and smoking?—No. I think there would have to be an alteration of those music-halls; that they should be built more for the purpose; they are not so built at present.

951. It was clearly reported by the Committee on Public-houses some years ago, that what they described as theatrical entertainments should not be conducted in the same room (using the word in a large sense) as that in which the drinking was going on?—They should not be conducted in a large public-house.

952. But do you think that theatrical representations should be allowed to take place on a stage, while in the auditorium there is drinking of beer and spirits and smoking going on?—I think think that the system of cafés chantants (as it is called in Paris), is very much in accordance with the growing taste of the lower classes, and I think we must, to some extent, yield to that taste.

23 March 1866.

953. You think it is a fact, that we must assume and deal with it as best we may?—I think that summer gardens are very useful places of the kind, because they induce a man to go and take a light supper with his family there, instead of his going to a public-house alone, perhaps.

954. But is there not a great difference between a concert in the Champs Elysées and the scene exhibited a little before midnight at a London music-hall?—They have winter entertainments too in Paris; there is the Alcazar d'hiver, for instance.

955. You drew a distinction between public-houses and music-halls, and said you thought it was better to get people into music-halls than to let them remain in ale-houses?—Yes.

956. But if drinking goes on upon a large scale at a music-hall, what is the difference in favour of the music-hall as against the ale-house?—Not much; but the drinking does not go on upon such a large scale, because I know there is scarcely ever a case of drunkenness from any of the music-halls.

957. In your experience you have not so many cases of drunkenness from the music-halls as from the ale-houses?—I may say none from the music-halls, but certainly very few.

958. Have you no reason to believe that some of the people may have gone to the ale-house after they have left the music-halls?—We have not the means of ascertaining, but they have not been brought direct from the music-halls.

959. Has that wonderful instinct which experience gives ever led you to suspect that it may have been so?—No, my opinion is the other way.

960. Why should not that new office of which you speak, be simply an enlargement of the Lord Chamberlain's Office?—I see no objection to that.

961. Retaining the traditions of the office?—If you gave the Lord Chamberlain a staff and some funds to ensure supervision, the work would be very well done, I dare say.

962. Are you not aware that the Lord Chamberlain remonstrates now with a manager in case of any improper performance?—Yes; but I think that he has not a sufficient staff to see what goes on, and to find out the objectionable cases.

963. Looking at the matter practically, do you think it would be possible to have so large a staff as would dispense with the services of the police?—I think in all places where there is a great crowd, you must necessarily have some police constables.

964. Therefore you would still, even with that large staff, have points of, I do not say conflict, but contact between the two jurisdictions?—No; the staff would supervise the performances, but the police would be merely to keep order in the audience.

965. You think that the duties of the new office should be confined wholly and solely to what takes place on the stage?—Yes.

THE RIGHT HON. GEORGE JOACHIM GOSCHEN, IN THE CHAIR.

Sir RICHARD MAYNE, called; and Examined.

16 April 1866.

966. YOU are the Chief Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police?—I am.

967. Do you consider the present system of licensing music-halls by magistrates satisfactory?—I am not aware of any great objection or failure in the system, looking at it as a system not complete in itself. In the part within the Metropolitan Police district, which I understand best, there are two authorities, the Lord Chamberlain and also the licensing magistrates at Quarter Sessions.

968. But, from a police point of view, you see no objection to the present system?—No, I think not.

969. Would you say that, on the whole, music-halls and dancing places generally are well conducted?—Yes, I think so, looking at the nature of such places. There are a great number in some parts of the town, especially in the eastern parts, where the audiences are a very low class of people, and many of them are very young, but they are well-behaved. There are police, I believe, employed in every house; the usual course is for the manager to apply for the police to attend to prevent any disorder or indecorum, and I think the system works satisfactorily so far.

970. Do the police simply look to the ordinary conduct of those establishments, or would they report them if they were opened without a license?—Yes, certainly; if they were opened without a license from the magistrates, they would report them. There are two sorts of licenses, the license of the magistrate for music and dancing, and the license under the 6 & 7 Vict. for theatrical entertainments in places beyond the jurisdiction of the Lord Chamberlain.

971. I am speaking more of the music and dancing places: would the police report improprieties in the performance, or would they look more to the conduct of the people?—Supposing there is a license, they would look merely to the conduct of the people. I am not aware that they have ever reported any improprieties in the performance itself; if it was very gross, they would no doubt do so.

972. The police would almost think it beyond their sphere if the plot of any play or any performance were of a grossly immoral character?—If it were grossly immoral they would report it, perhaps; but unless it was considered grossly immoral, or calculated perhaps to corrupt the mind, I do not think they would report it; they have no power; their general duties are the employment of a police power to preserve order; to report any indecency in the men or women, or any clamour.

973. The inspection of the police is rather an inspection of the audiences than of the pieces that are performed?—Certainly.

974. No directions are given them with regard to the pieces performed, and they would go out of their way if they were to report upon them?—Yes, altogether. There are no such regulations, nor should I consider it would be a police duty; in fact, I do not think, except in extreme cases, they would be very competent judges of what is objectionable or otherwise.

975. Mr. Powell.] Do you refer to the proceedings on the stage or the proceedings among the audiences?—I meant on the stage, but I spoke also just now with regard to indecencies or improprieties in the conduct of the audience. I am not aware that I have ever had a report with regard to the improprieties or immoral tendencies of a piece itself.

976. Chairman.] You know of no case where the police have reported that the pieces have been grossly improper or immoral?—I do not remember one.

977. If they were singing on the stage, and the songs were grossly immoral, the police would not consider it their duty to interfere?—I do not recollect any report of the kind, and, unless it was very grossly immoral, I do not think they would consider it their duty to notice it. Sometimes the police have been called on to interfere between the audience and the performers where there has been very uproarious hooting or derisive applause, and the police have always refused to interfere; if there is any distinct charge given of misdemeanor or conspiracy against any particular actor, then the police would take the charge from the proprietor or the authorised person, but they would not interfere on their own authority. I mention that, as showing the line they would take in noticing anything that might be considered immoral in the performance, or disorderly in the behaviour of the audience.

978. Then if there were a change in the law with regard to the licensing, and different places were licensed for different performances, would you think the police would be a competent body to decide whether the proprietors were going beyond their licenses or not?—I do not think that the police would of themselves be competent. There might be a law that it would be the duty of the police to bring cases before the magistrates, but there must be an ultimate resort, otherwise it would not accord with our English system; it would be a very objectionable duty to give to the police to make them final judges with regard to such questions.

979. But would you say you could give to them, in the first instance, the duty of inspecting and reporting on a case?—I think there might be an Act defining the duties for those cases in which they should bring the question before the magistrates; for instance, take the case of an unlicensed theatre; there are very large powers and strong powers given to the police by an order from myself to enter the theatre, and carry off the people, and charge them before a magistrate; there are heavy penalties; there they must be to some degree judges in the first instance, whether the performances are theatrical performances or not. It is reported to me, for instance, that there are performances going on at such a house which is not licensed; I desire the police to observe and report to me, and if it seems to me a theatrical performance within the terms of the Act, I send warrants, authorising the police to apprehend the people, and bring the charge before the magistrate, who has to decide whether the case is within the law.

980. Have you had such cases?—Yes, several.

981. Mr. Locke.] Under what Act is that?—The 2 & 3 Vict., c. 47, the Act for the improvement of the police, and it is enlarged in the 6 & 7 Vict.; there is a definition there giving a much larger application of the term theatrical performance.

982. It would be very interesting to the Committee if you could describe one or two of the cases which you have had of that kind?—There was one the other day in which it was represented to me that performances of a dramatic nature were going on at a public-house. I could give you the particulars of that case hereafter. I signed the usual order for the police to enter, which they did, and convictions were made before the magistrates. Part of the consideration with me always is whether the class of persons who attend are such as themselves ought not to be allowed to assemble for any purpose; as, for instance, where there are a number of young thieves and a number of women of the town meeting together at a public-house; if the case is within the law, that would be an additional reason for my exercising the power to stop that which was illegal in itself, and which had also a demoralising effect in that way.

983. The police can inspect public-houses with a view to see whether theatrical performances are going on in houses which have no licenses from the magistrates?—Yes, that is part of their duty; for this purpose the 2 & 3 Vict., c. 47, applies.

984. That is in the district beyond the Lord Chamberlain's jurisdiction?—Yes, that extends to the whole of the metropolitan police district, which is about 16 miles round Charing Cross.

985. In the case you mentioned were the parties convicted?—Yes, I think so; they have been convicted in many cases.

986. Do you mean the owners of the public houses, or the people attending them?—The people attending, generally, and also the manager; the manager is subjected to a penalty; the clause is very similar to that with regard to gaming-houses; there is a power given to me, on report made. I issue the warrant to enter, and then it is for the magistrates to decide.

987. Have you ever had a case within the area of the Lord Chamberlain's district?—Yes, many cases.

988. I mean cases of apprehending people for assembling for the purpose of theatrical performances in houses without a license from the Lord Chamberlain?—Yes; I have often had representations of this kind. Persons who are licensed for theatrical performances are naturally anxious to report unlicensed performances. They represent the case to the Lord Chamberlain, and the practice of the Lord Chamberlain is to refer the application to me, and ask, "Is that a case in which you can enforce the law?" Very often I have to say no, and sometimes yes; and then steps are taken. Of course the possessors of the Lord Chamberlain's license are inclined to stop all other performances for their own interests.

989. In those cases would you look at the intention for which the parties collected together?—That would be part of the case. I think there should be a certain amount of discretion exercised. I have always thought that police laws must include a great number of cases which do not really come within the spirit of the law. I think that a certain amount of discretion ought to be exercised in the application of the law, otherwise it would be very hard, and go beyond the objects of the Act. Those cases have sometimes become the subject of litigation, and several of them I have refused to interfere in, not being satisfied that they were theatrical performances.

990. Who sets the police in motion generally?—Anybody who reports the fact, but it is usually done by the police of the district themselves. Their duty is to watch and observe very closely what is the conduct of any of the public houses, if it affects the good order of the place; they report that performances are taking place at such a house, and that it is not licensed. I inquire into the circumstances, and if it seems to me to come within the law, then I issue an order for the police to enter. There is another class of cases, however, under the Statute of 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, which is, with regard to music and dancing, which comes closely upon the other class of theatrical performances where they have dancing exhibited by ballets, and, in fact, carry on a sort of operatic and pantomimic performance; it often becomes a question whether they are within the law, either that of Geo. 2, or the law with regard to the theatrical performances without a license.

991. But the general conduct of the public house, or the audiences, has considerable weight with you in determining whether the police should interfere?—Yes, in many cases of music and dancing especially; because in some public-houses they have a pianoforte, and singing, which is very near being a private entertainment, but still various persons go in, and, if there is not money actually paid as a fee, there is drink which pays the publican. It would be bad in every case to prevent that, even if the law was applicable, and in many cases I refuse to interfere. It is sometimes in the nature of a club; respectable tradesmen go there and have a song, and where there is no disorder or harm done I refuse to interfere. With regard to licenses for music and dancing, the police have no power to bring the parties before the magistrates; they must proceed by action; their power is very limited except by reporting to the magistrates, unless it comes within what is called an offence against the tenour of the license; but the penalties under the Act of Geo. 2 are to be enforced by action at law, and I have never thought it the duty of the police to bring actions that were beyond the proper limit of their procedure.

992. With regard to the Act of 25 Geo. 2, the police can do nothing except reporting to the magistrates?—They report first to me, and then, when the time comes for licensing, to the magistrates.

993. But you have no power to stop that, have you?—None whatever.

994. That is in the case of music and dancing?—Yes; what they call an entertainment.

995. But not theatrical performances?—Not theatrical performances; the only direct power of the police is in the case I have mentioned.

996. Then in the case of theatrical performances the police have power to take action themselves, if the houses have theatrical performances without a license?—Yes.

997. But if it is only music and dancing, the police have no power to do anything but report?—The police have no power to do anything but by an indirect power of this nature. I may refuse to let the police attend to preserve order. Within a few days I have had a case of that kind, where the landlord had no license for music.

998. Do you think that that state of things points to a defect in the law?—It makes that Act of Geo. 2 very ineffective indeed.

999. Then the police have no power to interfere with houses on account of their not having licenses if only music and dancing goes on?—No; they have no direct power of interference.

1000. Are there many cases where you report to the magistrates?—On account of music or dancing there are several. I should not say a good many, because I caution them, and then they are afraid of losing the renewal of their license.

1001. Do you mean the renewal of their license for spirits?—Yes; the licensed victualler's license.

1002. But supposing there was music and dancing going on in a house where there is no spirit license at all; who would stop that?—In practice I think nobody does. I remember no case in which an action has been brought of that sort. I apprehend, but I am not sure, that money is extorted from those people. Informers threaten to bring actions and they are probably paid for not taking proceedings; but the police never take proceedings to enforce penalties; that could only be done by action.

1003. There is no power to enforce that law except through informers, who are interested themselves?—That is so, practically.

1004. You would think it advisable, would you not, that power should be given to the police to enforce the taking out of a license in such cases in the same way as in the case of theatrical performances?—Yes, I think so; an inefficient law is always a very bad thing.

1005. The defect of the law is only corrected now by the power of the magistrates who have the refusal of the spirit license?—Yes, the licensed victuallers' license, which is in fact the power of selling wines and spirits.

1006. Do you know of many cases where there are music-halls without the licensed victuallers' license?—Yes, I think there are several. The great check upon the beer-houses is, that they are forced to close at an earlier time, earlier than would be sufficient for an ordinary theatrical or music performance; but, practically, there is no check on the beerhouses as distinguished from the spirit houses: the beer-houses are merely under an excise license.

1007. And the excise grants those licenses without any inquiry at all, simply for the purposes of revenue?—Just so; in fact I do not think they have the power to refuse; at least, they tell me so.

1008. So that in the case of a beer-house where they had a musical entertainment without a license there would be no one to control them; there would be no pressure that you could bring to bear on them to make them take out a license?—No, I have no such power.

1009. Mr. Powell.] You opened your evidence by saying that you spoke from a police point of view; you do not give your opinion as a private citizen, but simply with regard to such offences as come within your cognisance?—I speak with regard to the action of police law.

1010. When you spoke about demoralisation, and so on, you meant that kind which would come within your sphere, such as robbery and violence; you did not speak, as a private citizen, of anything that would be dangerous to morals strictly considered?—No; I spoke with regard to cases in which I should feel justified in directing police action; my own private feelings I think I ought hardly to allow to operate in such cases.

1011. But supposing it were the case (which is not, as I gather, your opinion) that those halls were greatly frequented by prostitutes plying their vocation, would you consider that fairly within your sphere as a police official?—If they were openly soliciting people; if they were there for the purpose of solicitation, I should.

1012. Although they were conducting themselves quietly?—It would depend on their conduct, and how they showed their purpose.

1013. There are, in various parts of the town, places of amusement which are often described as penny-gaffs, and by similar denominations, and where, no doubt, performances take place contrary to the law, as not being licensed?—Yes.

1014. Is it the duty of the police, supposing they conceive there are such performances going on in such houses, to enter such houses and discover the fact without receiving special instructions?—At almost all those places, if not all, there are police in attendance.

1015. I am speaking of unlicensed places?—Most of those penny-gaffs and halfpenny-gaffs are licensed for music; I have been at several of them myself; there is a very low class of persons there, but one does not see anything objectionable. I have very often desired observations to be made upon them, and there was nothing to justify police interference. Many persons consider them very objectionable, inasmuch as they induce boys and girls to steal the entrance-money; if that be so, of course that is beyond the the knowledge of the police; but if I have been told that there was such a place demoralising the neighbourhood I have sent the police to observe, and I have very seldom found that there was anything that the police could interfere with.

1016. Your information would, in such a case, be derived from the public and not from the police?—I send the police when such a report is made to me; no doubt there are thieves there and young girls who are prostitutes, but their conduct is unobjectionable in the place itself.

1017. If there was music and dancing going on with only a music license, the police would not take cognisance of it?—No; at many of those places, especially in the sailors' part of the town, they dance, and I am not aware of any evil arising from that; the women are not very correctly dressed, but I think it would be over-squeamish, looking at the class of persons who frequent those places, to find fault with them.

1018. Do you know whether those humbler places of amusement admit women of the town without a charge?—I believe it is said so, but I am not aware. I should think, where there was such a very small payment, it is not so; but women of the town may find it to their advantage to go there.

1019. Evidence has been laid before the Committee, which is contradicted with regard to the existence in some of those music-halls, of what were described to us as private rooms, where considerable improprieties occur; have those been mentioned to you?—I believe there are houses of that kind, but not forming immediately a part of the theatrical or dancing-rooms.

1020. But easy of access from the dancing-rooms; from the public rooms I mean?—I believe so.

1021. And in direct communication?—I believe so; in the nature of brothels or reception houses.

1022. Do you mean accessible from the hall itself, without going into the street?—I think not, but I am not sure; those that I know of are near, part of the same house as it were.

1023. There would be a tolerably close relationship between the two establishments?—Yes; but I think, generally speaking, that is not so much the case where there is music and dancing as where there is drinking; in the low class of beer-houses, and so on.

1024. Mr. Locke.] I find, by the 46th section of the 2 & 3 Vict., that power is given to the police to enter unlicensed theatres, and take away the persons found there?—Yes.

1025. Now that applies only, as I understand you, to theatres unlicensed?—Yes; in the 6 & 7 Vict. there is a definition of the words "theatrical entertainment," and I think that the powers are repeated for the police to enter.

1026. The police would enter simply into those places where there is no license; but supposing there were a license for music and dancing, the police do not take upon themselves to decide whether or not the performance that is going on there is a performance within that section of the 6 & 7 Vict., namely, the Dramatic Licensing Act?—Yes, I am sorry to say it has been a great trouble to me to have to decide such matters.

1027. Have you, in fact, decided such matters?—Yes.

1028. Can you give us instances?—Yes. I cannot now remember the names, but I can supply you with instances; if it is reported that an unlawful theatrical performance is going on, I desire the police to go and see, and report to me; sometimes it is plainly not a theatrical performance; it is merely a person coming in with a speech, but no dialogue, and then I have refused to interfere; in other cases I thought there plainly was a theatrical performance, and then I have acted upon it.

1029. Is that where there has been a music and dancing license possessed by the person?—Yes.

1030. Now with regard to the Alhambra and Oxford Music Halls, and those places, you have never interfered, then?—I think I remember once or twice sending a notice to the proprietor of the Alhambra; it was stated to me that there was a dramatic performance going on, and I then said if it was continued it would be the duty of the police to enforce the Act.

1031. But you know that there have been several decisions on the point; with regard to the ballet, for instance, in the Court of Common Pleas, the other day, they did not come to a decision that it was a dramatic performance, and it has been continued since?—No action has been taken by the police since that decision, and of course I should conceive myself strictly bound by the spirit of that decision. I have always been very abstemious in acting where there was any doubt.

1032. But still you have acted where there was a music and dancing license?—Yes.

1033. I presume you would go yourself; you would not leave it to a policeman to decide whether it was a dramatic performance or not?—No; but the superintendent of police goes; I have asked the Assistant Commissioner once or twice, and he states exactly what he did see, that a person came on dressed, and said so and so, and then if there is a dialogue, I consider that a pretty safe rule.

1034. But suppose it were a ballet; the question, I believe, has been, has it not, whether it was a ballet d'action, or whether it was merely dancing about without any meaning in it?—In those cases I have always refused to interfere.

1036. Then you think that a policeman is a better judge of this matter than Mr. Donne, because you recollect that Mr. Donne stated that he had never been able to make any sense out of any ballet that he had ever seen?—I have seen ballets d'action in which there would be no difficulty in making out the story; I have seen many ballets d'action, both in France and in Italy, but especially in Italy, where I should have no difficulty in following the plot.

1037. And in England too, I dare say; "Esmeralda," for example?—Yes; in many of our ballets you have no difficulty in making out who is the lover and who is the jealous rival, and who is the mother, &c.

1038. But when you have dances in character, as a Spanish dance, and then an English dance, and French dance, and so on, you would not consider that within the definition of a performance of the stage?—Certainly not; in many of the cases referred to me by the Lord Chamberlain, where the application has been made by licensed licensed owners of theatres, I have refused to interfere, merely saying that I thought there was nothing to justify police interference.

1039. Do you think it desirable that it should be left to the police to say whether a ballet told a story or not; do you think it makes any difference?—No, I do not think there is any real difference. I may be a little lax, but I am rather for allowing performances than restraining them; I see places at the east end, where they have two performances in the evening, beginning at six o'clock, coming out at eight, and immediately a fresh audience comes in, showing a great demand for these amusements, and I think the people behave very properly.

1040. You think, that so long as they behave properly, there is no objection?—On the contrary, I think they are better there than they would be in most of the other places where they would probably be otherwise.

1041. From any of those places, such as music-halls which have a music and dancing license, have any complaints been made of the conduct of the people within the place?—No; I think not. Under the Act for closing public-houses there is power given to me to allow houses to be kept open after one o'clock. Now questions have arisen where the object certainly was to have dancing, to which women of questionable character might go. I have never thought it right to refuse the license if the proprietor answered me in writing that he had such regulations that there should be nothing offensive to decency. I have given a large number of such occasional licenses.

1042. In short, a license to keep open between one and four o'clock in the morning?—Yes.

1043. Have there been many of those licenses granted?—A great many, from Willis's Rooms downward; the Hanover-square Rooms or St. James's Hall cannot be kept open without a special license.

1044. Your view is this, that you do not look to the precise position in society which the people occupy, but, if they conduct themselves with propriety, you think that persons in one rank of life have just as much right to dance as persons in other ranks of life?—Yes, but more than that, if their conduct is proper there, whatever it may be elsewhere, I should not consider myself justified in refusing to let them meet and dance.

1045. It has been asked whether the police would interfere with a performance on the stage, and you say they would interfere where it was a performance of the stage which infringed the 6 & 7 Vict.; but suppose it were a ballet and there were anything indecent done on the stage they would interfere I suppose?—They would interfere then, certainly, if the nature of the piece was such as to make it a very demoralising performance, but there might be a good deal of vague indecency which could not be defined.

1046. But suppose a man came on naked would the police interfere?—I do not think that the police would have any direct authority to interfere.

1047. But would they?—I think that in so strong a case as you put, they would.

1048. That is to say, if a man on the stage did something that made him amenable to the law he would not be exempt from the interference of the police, simply because he did it on the stage?—No; the law is very vague and perhaps ineffective with regard to indecent exposure of the person.

1049. Do you mean where it is done in public?—Yes, even in the public streets, unless it be done in such a manner as to be indictable, or unless it be with intent to insult or assault a female, the police have no direct power to interfere.

1050. But any indecent exposure in a public place is indictable, is it not?—I am not sure that the law is so strong as that; take the case of people making water in the streets.

1051. But where it is done wilfully I suppose it is indictable?—I do not know that even then the police would have the power to interfere. There was the well-known case when Sir Charles Sedley exposed himself naked in a balcony, and it was held indictable, and that has been held ever since; if a man does anything grossly in violation of common decency, it is indictable, but suppose a man makes water in the streets where it is in truth indecent, that is not necessarily indictable.

1052. But he does not commit an indecent act with that intention?—No; his object is not indictable.

1053. But supposing there was an indecent exposure on the stage, the police would interfere there, would they not?—There would be a great difficulty; it would be a stretch of the law; if it was a very strong case they would interfere, and public opinion would justify them; but I doubt the law.

1054. But the police have never been under a necessity of the kind; you have never heard of any indecency on the stage in any of those places?—Never; the cases where the police have interfered were cases with regard to danger. There was a case at the Alhambra, and a case at Cremorne, where there was obviously great personal danger. The Secretary of State authorised me to write to the proprietor telling him that such a performance was calculated to cause great public alarm and danger, and that if he continued it he did it at his own risk, and we were then prepared to try the question by action or indictment if he persisted; but the proprietor yielded in those cases. One was a rope-dancer; after a man had been very nearly killed; that was at the Alhambra. We gave notice that such circumstances had arisen, and were likely to arise again, and that the police would interfere if the performance were persisted in. But if we had been actually forced to proceed by law, I am afraid our powers would have been found rather ineffective.

1055. But supposing there is a public-house where there is only music and dancing, the police merely make a report to the magistrates, and the punishment is that the license will be taken away; that is the course of proceeding, is it not?—Yes.

1056. Your interference is only in the case of acting stage plays in defiance of this section of the Act?—Yes; and there is another clause in the Act applying to cases where people are assembled for the purpose of disorder.

1057. That is with regard to disorderly houses, under the 25 Geo. 2?—Yes; but it is under the 2 & 3 Vict. also, for the improvement of the Metropolitan Police; the first Act was the 10 Geo. 4, cap. 34, and then 10 years after that, this Act of 2 & 3 Vict. cap. 47, was passed; it is an Act for further improving the police in and near the metropolis.

1058. Does that repeal any part of the previous Act?—I think it does not repeal any except with regard to the appointment of local constables in Westminster, the 44th section says, "and whereas it is expedient that the provisions made by law, for preventing disorderly conduct in the houses of licensed victuallers be extended to other houses of public resort, be it enacted that every person who shall have or keep any house, shop, room, or place of public resort within the Metropolitan Police district wherein provisions, liquors, or refreshments of any kind shall be sold or consumed (whether the same shall be kept or retailed therein, or procured elsewhere), and who shall wilfully or knowingly permit drunkenness, or other disorderly conduct in such house, shop, room or place, or knowingly suffer any unlawful games or any gaming whatsoever therein, or knowingly permit or suffer prostitutes or persons of notoriously bad character to meet together and remain therein, shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty of not more than 5 l.," and so on. That gives the police considerable powers with regard to the assembling of women of the town, and disorderly characters, whether it be for dancing or anything else; that is a clause of considerable importance in police action, and there is a similar clause in the refreshment houses Act, which is called Mr. Gladstone's Act.

1059. In that case the police would not interfere unless the result of the dancing and music was to make the people disorderly, they must commit a disorderly act first?—Yes.

1060. Their merely dancing in an ordinary way would not entitle the police to interfere?—Most of the interference is in this way: the police report the facts, and then if they appear sufficient either I myself or one of the Assistant Commissioners look into the case, and there is a printed form for direction, and it is registered, so that there is no possibility of using it for extorting money from the publican; the Commissioner is responsible for the application to the magistrate, and the magistrate is responsible for such a statement to him as will justify a summons, and then for the decision.

1061. What would the summons be for?—For disorderly conduct.

1062. What is the penalty?—£. 5.

1063. That would be irrespective of the power of withdrawing the license for the public-house?—Yes: "Provided always, that if the offender be a licensed victualler, or licensed to sell beer by retail to be drunk on the premises, this enactment shall not be construed to exempt him from the penalties or penal consequences to which he may be liable for committing an offence against the tenour of the license to him granted."

1064. This is cumulative, and additional to the offence against the tenour of the license?—Yes.

1065. Chairman.] You would not issue a summons to make a man take out a license, supposing he were unlicensed?—No, the magistrate could not grant such a summons.

1066. Mr. Locke.] The magistrate could only take away his license the next day, or take away the spirit license at the March licensing?—Yes, just so.

1067. Lord Eustace Cecil.] You have said something about disorderly conduct; would you mind defining more exactly what would be disorderly conduct in the eye of the police; would a nautch or gipsy dance, or any other dance where there were indecent overtures and gestures be considered to come under that head?—Yes; I think so. In a public-house not licensed for music and dancing, it always rests with the magistrates to decide whether the conduct is disorderly conduct; ours is only a proceeding on a primâ facie case.

1068. If there was any doubt about it, either the Assistant Commissioner or yourself would go personally to inspect the dance in question?—Yes.

1069. Something has been said about "private rooms;" and I think you stated that there are some music-halls where there are private rooms; can you particularise them?—I really cannot; and I am not quite sure that with regard to music-halls I am justified in making that statement. I rather stated that I thought they were near beer-shops; but I can collect information and let the Committee know. My general impression is, that with regard to music and dancing places it is not so.

1070. Have you ever known of "private rooms" at theatres?—I think not any since I have had to do with the police; we all know that formerly the display of women of the town at theatres was very different from what it is now; there is no saloon as there once was, or a place for promenading.

1071. Do you think that there are a greater number in the ordinary way of women of the town at theatres than at music-halls?—In proportion I should say there were a greater number at music-halls. I hardly like to name them, but there are one or two music-halls I know where women assemble who are known to be women of the town, but they are very decorously behaved while there.

1072. But still there are women of the town at theatres?—Yes, and also at those places where there is dancing. Take many of those dancing saloons in Whitechapel, the district which is known as the sailors' quarter of the town; the women there are, perhaps without exception, women of the town, but their behaviour is perfectly decorous. I have been struck, too, in those houses where foreign sailors and foreign women are found, by noticing that their conduct is much better than that of our own women, and much more decorous externally both with regard to dress and manner.

1073. Mr. Locke.] They are more accustomed to be allowed to amuse themselves, perhaps, than in this straitlaced country?—I do not know the cause, but it is rather striking as a fact.

1074. Mr. Miller.] Where the conduct of the women of the town is perfectly unobjectionable, but where you know a number of them congregate, would you think that a good reason for withdrawing the license from a place of entertainment?—No, I should not.

1075. But I should like to have your opinion, as I attach much importance to it; do you think that the mischief is less insidious where their conduct is good, but where their number is large?—You mean less demoralising? No doubt. But looking at it as a police functionary, I have only to look to see whether it is mischievous to decorum. What the ultimate consequences may be I do not consider within my province, and any opinion I could form would only be vague and speculative.

1076. Suppose any fresh Act of Parliament were to result from our inquiry, would you recommend that it should be an element in that Act that the granting of a license should be restricted stricted when the place was attended by a large number of the women of the town, though their conduct might be unexceptionable?—Looking at the present state of society, I think that would be mischievous, and I would rather let even women of that class dance and amuse themselves, although I knew men went there for the purpose of meeting them.

1077. I think that the Alhambra is spoken of as a place very well conducted?—Yes.

1078. Have you any doubt that a number of women of the town assemble there?—I fancy that a very large proportion go there, so, too, at such places as the Argyll Rooms, and the Casino, in Holborn (in fact, there are several of them), but the women are perfectly decorous. I should say that you cannot prevent it in the present state of society, and it is not for me, as a police functionary, to look beyond that; you cannot prevent men and women assembling in these places, and the women may be found soliciting the men for what must be called immoral purposes; but I think that if you attempt to prevent this being done openly, you will have it done in a secret manner. Even with regard to the open parading of these women in the streets, though it is offensive, and, in my opinion, ought to be restricted, yet it saves us from pimps, such an odious class that, with all the evils of our own system, I think the other must be called the greater evil.

1079. Would you recommend that all those minor places should be classed as theatres under any new Act?—By theatres I understand you to mean where there are actors, and a scenic representation of some sort; but men and women here are actors and audience too.

1080. Would you make any distinction in the license to be granted to all those minor places, and those to theatres like Drury Lane for instance?—The license to a theatre would imply merely that the performance should be of such a character as not to be immoral or mischievous; in the other case you have only to look at the conduct of the people. My opinion is, that on the whole I should not prevent people meeting for music or dancing, although we knew that a great number of the women there, even the great majority, were women of the town. At the East End there are performances of a different class. On the whole, I would rather see the people dancing at such places than drinking in public-houses.

1081. But would you grant them licenses for dramatic performances, if they wished it to such places?—There is no objection that I can see.

1082. On the contrary, if they had the power of performing dramatic pieces, would it not be likely to be less immoral than what is now exhibited in a ballet?—Yes, I think so, in fact these places would then belong to the class of saloons; take Greenwich, where they have a magistrate's license, there is no objection that I know of.

1083. May it not be said to be the case that, of all performances, the ballet is the most demoralising?—That is a matter of opinion.

1084. Supposing that to be so, if you gave those places an opportunity of performing anything else better, that would be rather to the advantage of the public than otherwise, would it not?—Yes, my general opinion is, that I would rather grant a liberal license in the first instance, to be checked and corrected upon misconduct being proved, but not to interfere beforehand, to prevent what may be unobjectionable.

1085. Mr. Locke.] Do you recollect the performances which used to take place at the Eagle Tavern, City-road?—Yes.

1086. There they used to act plays?—Yes.

1087. That was not under the Lord Chamberlain's license?—No.

1088. That was under the music and dancing license?—Yes.

1089. The White Conduit House?—Yes.

1090. There performances used to take place under the music and dancing license?—Yes.

1091. Did you ever see any objection to those?—No, I do not remember any instance of anything wrong. There was also an instance up at Hornsey Wood; several of those places, I believe, are conducted with perfect propriety; in fact, I have been very often invited to go and see; I have not had time to go much, but I do not believe there is any objection to them.

1092. Lord Ernest Bruce.] I believe that it is the practice of large houses, such as the Haymarket and Drury Lane Theatres, to have policemen always in the house?—Yes, one or two.

1093. That is to say inside the house?—Yes.

1094. All regulations outside the house are made by your men, of course, as a matter of duty?—Yes.

1095. But the manager generally retains one or two policemen inside?—Yes.

1096. And the policeman, I suppose, receives a gratuity in addition to his pay?—No, I think there is nothing additional to his pay; generally during the season, police are added for the purpose; the constable who attends does not get anything more except sometimes for plain clothes.

1097. I thought it was understood that they get a fee of 2*s.* 6*d.* a night?—That is only very occasionally, when it is in addition to other duties, but where two or three men are wanted for the whole season those men are added to the division for the purpose, and the managers simply pay the whole charge, which would otherwise be paid out of the public funds.

1098. Now the duty of the police is to aid in maintaining order?—Yes.

1099. But I believe that the law is very defective and that the policeman has very little power, for instance, in securing places, or if there is a great noise in the box, have your men the power to interfere?—I think they have not the power to interfere. I said a little time ago that if there was uproarious hooting in consequence of a conspiracy against an actor, and if the manager gave a man in charge, the policeman would take the charge, but the policeman would not take on himself the responsibility of deciding whether it was legitimate disapprobation which the audience may show or whether it was a conspiracy. I think it desirable that at all theatres some person on behalf of the manager should have more power; for instance, with regard to seats, if a person gets into a seat and refuses to move there is very great difficulty in getting him out, and if the police remove him at the desire of the manager, the manager is probably liable to the consequences of an action for assault.

1100. If anything disorderly occurs in a theatre licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, or if anything immoral goes on in the audience, are the Committee to understand that it is in part of the policeman's duty to report it to you?—It would be his duty to report to me if there is open disorder.

16 April 1866.

1101. Then, with regard to music-halls, do they have policemen inside, too?—In every case, I think; their desire is always to have them, and that is a check which I sometimes have upon them; if they are not well conducted I say I will not allow the police to attend, and you must take the consequence.

1102. Now, if anything immoral was to go on at one of these places, would it be known to you which was a well-conducted house and which was a disorderly house?—Yes, I think so.

1103. Would it be reported to you if one music-hall was better conducted than another?—Yes, if there was an obvious difference, and a decided distinction affecting the public propriety and the decorum of the place, but the power of acting upon that is another matter; the police have little or no power.

1104. Has it been reported to you that there are people admitted free into those halls who are common prostitutes?—I do not know that it has; in fact, the payment is usually so small that I do not think that there is any great object in not paying.

1105. Has it ever been reported to you that there is one large hall in the metropolis, the name of which I shall not mention, nor am I sure that I know it, where there is a bar behind the scenes to which parties are admitted on an extra payment, and where they can drink and keep company with the ladies of the ballet; has that been reported to you?—No; it has not, I feel confident.

1106. Is it your opinion that those houses which are licensed by the Lord Chamberlain are more respectably conducted than those houses which are licensed by the Middlesex magistrates; has that ever come before you as a question?—No, it has not.

1107. You are not prepared to give that opinion?—No. I have not heard of any failure of proper discrimination on the part of the magistrates. The police district extends into four counties—Surrey, Kent, Essex, and the whole of Middlesex; and I do not remember any case in which the magistrates have granted licenses where it was supposed that they ought not to have done so.

1108. Referring to my previous question about the private bar, it would have been the duty of your men to know it, and they would, in all probability, have reported to you if such a thing existed in any of the music-halls in the metropolis?—I think so; it may be, however, that they have not done so.

1109. Mr. O'Beirne.] Let me ask you whether you, as Chief Commissioner of Police, have any control over the accommodation afforded in the theatres to the public?—None whatever.

1110. Not with regard to fires or easy exit, or entrance?—No; the Lord Chamberlain has asked me occasionally to report whether there was a proper arrangement with regard to egress in case of fire; but it was more in aid of the Lord Chamberlain.

1111. It is no part of your duty?—None whatever, and now especially when the Fire Brigade is established; with regard to fires I should say, apply to the head of the Board of Works.

1112. Does that answer refer to all places of public entertainment as well as theatres?—I do not remember that I have ever had to inquire except with regard to theatres, at the request of the Lord Chamberlain.

1113. Then if any of those houses licensed for entertainments, not being theatres, were badly constructed, with a very narrow entrance, it would be no part of the duty of your inspector to report to you that fact?—It would not. In two or three cases the police surveyor has told me that he had heard that such-and-such a place was not properly constructed for the safety of the number going there, and then I have referred it to the proprietor.

1114. But that was a voluntary report?—Yes; altogether beyond the surveyor's regular duties.

1115. But you said, I believe, that if there was any evident disorderly conduct in any of those music-halls, you would hear of it by the reports of your officers?—Yes, I think so; certainly if it was flagrant or notorious.

1116. Have you ever had such reports?—Yes; I think so.

1117. With regard to what particular class of house have you had those reports?—I should say rather with regard to the larger places. The lower houses, I think, are more dependent on public opinion, and the attendance of the police to check disorder, which would be discontinued if there was disorder allowed. I think they are very careful always to attend to any suggestion.

1118. What was the nature of those reports which you have received?—I think they were to the effect that persons were admitted drunk, or that the women were indecently dressed.

1119. That was not with regard to the large establishments at this end of London, I suppose?—No, I should say not; I should say it was more with regard to the lower places at different parts of the town, such as part of Southwark, the East End, and the north east.

1120. What was the character of the reports that you have had, if any, with regard to the larger establishments?—I think generally that allegations have been made that there was disorder and indecorum, and upon inquiry I have found that it is only that a large number of women who were known to be prostitutes, and some people who had been drinking have been seen, but no open or overt acts of indecorum or indecency were observed.

1121. Did you think it necessary in those cases to take any action in the matter, by communicating with the managers?—I think I did, so far as I remember, and the managers were always very willing to adopt any suggestions which I offered.

1122. Now, with regard to any admission of women of the town to any establishment free, what do you say to that?—My belief is that, with rare exceptions, they pay, but I may not be a very good authority upon that point.

1123. You have said that you yourself have visited some of those houses?—Yes.

1124. Do you think there is any difference between the class of persons who frequent the houses at the east end of London, and those who frequent the larger establishments at this end?—Very remarkably; they are a totally different class of people; in some parts of the East End, the Whitechapel district and Wapping, there are the very lowest class of men and boys, the working classes of the neighbourhood, but I am bound to say that they were perfectly well behaved; they all seemed very much amused; the performances were not of a very high order, but there was nothing demoralising.

1125. At this end of the town it is different?—The —The classes of people are different, and the order of the performance is somewhat different, but I do not think that there is anything objectionable as a general rule in those low localities.

1126. I am anxious to know what is your view with regard to the powers of the police upon the subject of indecency; have the police any power to interfere with regard to indecency, unless the indecency is sworn to be intended to offend some particular person or persons; take the exposure of the person in any manner?—I do not think that they have any power to interfere, unless it be of that gross character which the Honourable Member for Southwark referred to, or where it is done (that is, under the Vagrant Act) with intent to insult or assault any female.

1127. I understood you to say that in the course of your visits to foreign cities, you observed a great difference between the behaviour of the femmes publiques there, and that of prostitutes in England?—Although the display of these women in public in this country is offensive, and might be restricted, yet I think even that has its advantages, as contrasted with the state of things in foreign towns, where, although the women do not appear in public, the consequence is that there is a very odious class of people, who are called pimps, to conduct men to the places where there are women.

1128. Do you think that the greater effectiveness of the regulations applying to this subject in Paris arises from the powers of the police being greater than they are here?—Yes, I think so; and, in some respects, the power which the police have there would be very beneficial to a certain extent anywhere; for instance, they have the power of prohibiting those women from appearing in certain places.

1129. Mr. Lusk.] You say that on the whole these music-halls are, in your opinion, well conducted?—I really think so. I really do not think, looking at the amusements of various classes, that there is any great objection to anything that exists there especially.

1130. There are few complaints that come under your notice?—Very few.

1131. The police attend in most of those places, I understand?—With very rare exceptions, in all of them.

1132. Are the police paid by those houses, or by the public?—They are paid in this way: an application is made by the manager for the attendance of one or two constables; if, on inquiry, I think it is right that the police should attend, the manager is told that he has to pay so much, which is, in truth, the whole pay of the men, including something for clothing, and even for superannuation allowance; he pays that to the Receiver of the Police, but the constable himself receives nothing but his ordinary pay. If the question points to whether the constable is in any degree under the influence of the proprietor, he certainly is not.

1133. It is difficult for a man to serve two masters, of course?—Yes; and that is why he is in no respect under the control or influence of the manager.

1134. The payment goes into the general fund?—Yes, the payment goes into the general fund, and the constable receives his pay just the same as any other man, being simply assigned for duty in the theatre instead of in the streets; but sometimes a manager will state that a man has performed his duty satisfactorily, and that he wishes to make him a present of 1*l*. or 2*l*., &c.; but no man is allowed to receive any gratuity without permission under my hand; I inquire if his conduct has been entirely what it should be, and, if so, I allow him to receive the gratuity.

Sir R. Mayne.
16 April 1866.

1135. Do you think it desirable that all kinds of houses for public entertainments should be licensed?—Yes, I think so; otherwise everybody might open a shop for the sale of intoxicating drinks.

1136. But do you think that houses of entertainment should be under a license of some kind from a public authority?—I should think so.

1137. You would have them, if I might use the word, physically under the control of the police, to see that they had not dog fights or cock fights?—Yes, certainly; there are specific laws for those cases; for instance, there is a law against cock fights.

1138. You think that the houses should be licensed, and that they should be physically under the control of the police, or subject to the surveillance of the police?—Yes, I think so; if you do not make them so, the law is a dead letter.

1139. You would not have the police the judges of the literary character of the pieces produced?—Certainly not; I should be very sorry to undertake that myself.

1140. There are two things to be considered, the thing you represent, and the way in which you represent it?—Yes, the censorship is a very delicate office.

1141. Now what is done in the music-halls?—Very often it is not anything more than a concert, singing in parts, pieces out of an opera, or other music, and sometimes it is very good music.

1142. Dancing and music?—Yes, dancing and music; you have dancing by classes who are not respectable out of that room, but in that room their conduct is proper.

1143. But suppose a party of people go in to sing, and the people themselves begin to sing, what class do you bring that under?—Of course there must be a line drawn somewhere; if a few guests among themselves sing, I should not think that required a license; in some public-houses, too, there is a piano, and there is a part of the house which is a sort of club-room, and respectable tradesmen go there, and some man who has a talent that way plays and sings, and I suppose they subscribe something for him; I never considered that that came within the necessity for a license, and I have refused to put the police in action against such cases.

1144. Taking things as they exist, and considering the object of the people who establish the music halls, do you think that their object is chiefly to make money by selling drink or by those performances?—I fancy their great object is to sell drink. What I mean is that that pays them the best; the payments for admission are very trifling.

1145. It is desirable, I suppose, that people should be entertained?—I think so.

1146. Perhaps you do not think that drinking is desirable?—Not in excess.

1147. You think that the primary object is to sell drink?—I am sure that many of them make their profit in that way. There was a question with regard to a Treasury license granted to a theatre to sell drink; it was a doubtful thing whether that was advisable, but it has been decided that such licenses are to be granted, and they are granted.

1148. With regard to the penny gaffs, do you think that the police are the best men to inquire into the morality of the performances at those places?—They do not do so unless it is something very gross.

1149. They go into those places and look round them?—Yes; if there was anything very offensive to common decency, or very immoral or subversive, they would no doubt notice it.

1150. Do you think that they are the best parties to make inquiry with regard to the tendency of the pieces performed?—They are the best parties to report the facts, but they are not the best persons to decide what should be done, or whether the facts bring the case within the law. I should be sorry to let the police have the power to decide.

1151. Their functions would be entirely executive?—Yes; the magistrates must say whether the police have brought the case within the law.

1152. This is not a school for scandal, but do you in fact hear anything about "private rooms" at any of those establishments?—Yes, I have heard of that, but generally speaking I think they are in the neighbourhood rather than in the house or building itself; a disreputable class of houses may, as we know, be found in the neighbourhood of theatres.

1153. But I mean in the houses themselves?—Yes, I have heard of that.

1154. Belonging to the same proprietor, I mean?—I really cannot say that I have heard of their being under the same proprietor, there may be communications or understandings, but I do not remember now any places of that kind; it has been often alleged that there are such places, but I do not remember any case in which the proprietor of a saloon or gaff was shown to be the proprietor of the private rooms.

1155. Allegations and facts are different things?—I should say that they were allegations and not facts generally, or rather I should say that there may be some exceptions.

1156. Keeping in view that you think those entertainments desirable, do you think it is necessary that there should be drinking and refreshments at those places of entertainment?—It is not necessary, but it is very much the habit of our people; I should be very glad to see the two things dissevered. I do not see why men should drink intoxicating liquors when they wish to be amused, but it is very much the habit of our people, high or low. I do not think it is necessary, but with regard to the license granted to theatres, Parliament and the public authorities seem to have decided the other way.

1157. Do you think that the drinking is a consequence of the entertainment, or that the entertainment is a consequence of the drinking?—I think they act and re-act. That people when they dance will drink, and that also when they drink they dance.

1158. Do you think there should be a difference in the license between a large theatre and a small music saloon; I mean with regard to the authority who should grant it?—I think that they should be under one authority; it would be very difficult to draw the line.

1159. At present the magistrates license in one case and the Lord Chamberlain in another?—The magistrates' jurisdiction is co-extensive with the Lord Chamberlain's, except in the case of music or dancing.

1160. Do you think that there should be any difference in that respect between the large theatres and those small entertainments?—It would be better if there were one authority, I think.

1161. You do not think it right to have a wholesale and retail license?—No; it would be difficult to draw the line. I think it would be better to have it all subject to one power.

1162. Do you think that the license should be so extended that all those places might give entertainments of the same character if they were within the bounds of morality and good taste?—Yes, I should be disposed to grant them liberally; some people think that the "requirements of the neighbourhood" should be considered, but that is a very vague matter.

1163. A solicitor takes out his license and practices at will among the high or the low, and you think it should be the same with those entertainments?—Yes, I think there should be one license and one authority.

1164. Do you think that would tend to bring the entertainments up to the people, or bring the people up to the entertainments?—If you grant those licenses liberally, subject to police supervision, for such matters as the police can prevent, perhaps the tendency would be rather to elevate the people, though I cannot see any distinct ground to expect that.

1165. You think that the tendency would be for the public good, rather than otherwise?—I think so.

1166. Sir Arthur Buller.] Though they have intoxicating liquors at the Alhambra, the people do not get intoxicated as a rule, do they?—No.

1167. If they did get intoxicated, and made a disturbance, that would be reported, I suppose?—Yes, the Alhambra is a licensed place, they have got the licensed victuallers' license.

1168. In your opinion is there any harm in a person having his glass before him, and enjoying it, while he is enjoying something else in the way of dancing on a stage?—No, except that if you make the theatre an actual drinking place, it is very likely to create disorder. I would rather have the drinking separate.

1169. But the fact is, that drinking does go on, and disorder is not the consequence?—It is a matter more of taste than of morals.

1170. You would not, yourself like that, being a person of high taste, but why should a person who has no other opportunity of having his smoking and drinking, not have it if he likes it in that way?—I am not aware of any reason.

1171. You see no more harm in a ballet d'action than in a common ballet?—No. The French dancing compared with a ballet d'action, is, perhaps, the more objectionable of the two. You may, without any sort of story, have just as much of what is called the indecorum of the ballet.

1172. Provided that the story is in itself harmless, there is no more harm in a ballet d'action than a common ballet?—No.

1173. Pursuing that further, would it not be an advantage to have a decent play, or even Shakespeare performed?—Yes, I think so.

1174. It would be better to see Shakespeare than to see a nigger grinning with the bones?—Yes.

1175. Then there could be no earthly objection to give a license to perform anything, at such places as the Alhambra, provided they were always always subject to a censorship?—Yes, certainly, I think that is so.

1176. Can you undertake to say whether the people who frequent those places having paid their money, have ever complained of annoyance from women of the town, or anything of that kind?—No, if they were annoyed they would not go again, I suppose.

1177. The respectable parts of those places are filled, are they not?—I have not heard of any complaints, but some think one thing objectionable and some another.

1178. Public opinion is not in any way outraged, however?—No, the worst case is where some gymnast tumbles and breaks his back; that kind of performance is objectionable, and should be prevented.

1179. Mr. Selwin.] The theatres are under a license from the Lord Chamberlain, and they are subject to certain restrictions, are they not?—Yes.

1180. Those dancing and music saloons are not under any restrictions of the sort, except from the magistrates' license?—The license for music and dancing.

1181. The police are there, but they have no power to do more than report?—That is all, unless the case is such as to come within the law.

1182. Unless there is a breach of the peace?—Yes; disorderly conduct. If a man were to walk about the room half drunk, or if he were insulting a woman, that would be disorderly conduct under the 2d and 3d Vict. c. 47.

1183. Should you think it advisable that the theatres should continue to be, as they are, licensed by the Lord Chamberlain?—I think there should be some power; it is not for me to say what that power should be.

1184. Do you think it would be advisable that theatres and music-halls should be on a different footing?—I think the present state of things, where the law is doubtful, is very bad. It is very bad that there should be any doubts of the legitimate character of any entertainments frequented by large classes of people.

1185. The reports from the police seem to be your only means of getting at a knowledge of how those places are conducted; but in certain instances you withdraw the police as a sort of punishment; that is, withdrawing their supervision where it should rather be doubled?—I am aware what the difficulty is; but I know that is a punishment, because people will not go so freely if the police are withdrawn, and that has generally had the effect of inducing people to alter what I thought objectionable.

1186. You have alluded to keeping houses open after certain hours, on the manager giving an assurance that nothing shall take place contrary to public order; are there any means taken to ascertain that those conditions are fulfilled?—Yes; we have regular printed forms. The grounds for the application for the license are set forth, and the license is granted by me on the report of the superintendent that the terms of the license are observed. Those licenses are granted subject to the approbation of the Secretary of State; practically they are granted by me, subject to his disapproval if I refuse, when I should grant them, or grant when I should refuse.

1187. Suppose a person came on naked at any of those performances, or there was any violation of decency, then the police would not have any real power of interfering, but they would report?—Certainly.

1188. Would any steps be taken with regard to the license of that place?—It would be reported to the magistrate at the first opportunity, certainly.

1189. Mr. Powell.] In most of those music-halls and places of amusement the police are present?—Yes.

1190. Are they instructed to take notice of what takes place?—I do not think that any special instructions are given, but they know that they are sent there for the purpose of preserving order, and enforcing the law in any case where the law is violated, and if there was anything that was grossly indecorous, or if it were indecent, they would report the fact to the superintendent of police, and, in that way, it would reach me.

1191. With regard to the structure of the houses, supposing it were found to be the fact that there were arrangements made for private rooms, or rooms of some other character for facilitating immoralities, would it be the duty of the police to make themselves acquainted with those circumstances, and make a report to you?—No, I think not, unless it was very gross. The police have no direct authority with regard to brothels; the public are quite mistaken upon that subject; the police have no authority whatever with regard to brothels, and those private rooms may be considered of that class.

1192. Then it comes to this, that, except there be something of a most gross character, something of almost an exceptional character, the police would not afford information of it?—With regard to indecencies or indecorum, or as to drunkenness, or women being dressed indecently, they would report.

1193. It would be their duty to report without being asked to do it?—Yes. At every place where the police are employed, a superior officer visits the house likewise, to see that the police are doing their duty properly.

1194. Can you inform the Committee what is the statute under which provisions are taken against disorderly houses?—It is the same statute; the 25th of Geo. 2.

1195. Those sections are now living sections on which action is taken?—Yes.

1196. Chairman.] I understand it to be your opinion, that all places of public entertainment should be licensed?—I think so.

1197. Do you think it would be good policy to throw open places of entertainment entirely?—I think not.

1198. And you think that it would be advisable to put all the licensing under one authority?—Yes, I think so. I am speaking with regard to the district which I understand the best. I cannot speak for other districts. My district is about 90 miles, exclusive of the City of London. What happens there I do not know, good or bad.

1199. But if you had one authority it would not necessarily carry with it that there should be one form of license for all entertainments?—No, certainly not. The licenses might be adapted to the nature of the performances, and there might be a different scale of payments.

1200. The licenses might be adapted according to the nature of the performance, and according to the nature of the building?—Yes.

16 April 1866.

1201. With regard to the point of indecency, a very extreme case was put, but take the case of an indecent song; if at a place of entertainment, if there were a very indecent song sung, would the police have any power to check it?—None.

1202. Do you think that there should be an improvement in the law in that respect?—Perhaps so, it should be carefully worded; any police power must be exercised with a large discretion, but the less that is left to their discretion the better.

1203. The police would have no ordinary power to stop an indecent song on the stage?—None; I think that that could only be corrected afterwards by penalties before a magistrate. I have always thought it very right to keep a very distinct line between what I call judicial and executive functions. What I have to deal with are executive functions, and they should be controlled by the magistrates or the judicial police.

1204. You know the entertainment called the Judge and Jury, would you call that a theatrical performance?—I think it is; and it is very amusing: the jury assemble, evidence is given, and they deliver their verdict. I think it is a theatrical performance.

1205. Mr. Locke.] Something in the nature of "La Gazza Ladra," for example?—Yes.

1206. Chairman.] The police would have no power to interfere with an entertainment of that kind?—No, the only power is with the magistrate's license, in that case.

1207. The magistrates might withdraw the license for beer and spirits, if they felt justified?—Yes.

1208. But if there was an authority for the inspection of public entertainments, that would be an entertainment coming within the scope of such a law, as much as many of the entertainments in music-halls?—Yes, I think so; it is a dramatic performance.

1209. And any kind of indecency that goes on there the police would not stop?—It is more indecorous than indecent; there is a great deal often in the evidence that is not of the most proper kind.

1210. Take the case of Poses Plastiques, the police would not interfere, however indecent the exhibition of the women was?—No, they never have done so, it must be a very extreme case if they did, and the interference could only be by report, unless it was an indecent exhibition of the grossest kind. I can conceive such cases, but I cannot believe that they would take place.

1212. There is no power in the magistrate to withdraw the license in the course of the year?—None.

1213. Now, with regard to those "private rooms," I think I understood you to say, in reply to some honourable Member, that there were "private rooms" attached to some of those music-halls?—I did not say music-halls, but I have heard it stated with regard to some of those places licensed for music or dancing, or both, that they have such rooms. I should be sorry to insinuate that any particular place was misconducted; I am really not able to say that they are true, but such allegations have been made in some cases. The report was made and the superintendent said, "I have no doubt the rooms are used for such purposes." In fact, men and women assembling as they do, you cannot very well decide whether such reports are true or not.

1214. Perhaps you have a little delicacy in mentioning names?—I could inquire, and if it was worth the while of the Committee hearing me again, I will do so; my impression is, that if it be true it is very rare, but in some cases it is believed to be so.

1215. It would be very hard that the music-halls should rest under any unjust imputation?—I am quite prepared to say that there is no foundation for it as a general imputation.

1216. Mr. Clay.] Do you think it at all possible, if the practice which has been hinted at of directly offering facilities for prostitution was carried on at any of the music-halls, that it could be carried on without being perfectly notorious and well known to the police?—I think it could not at the music halls.

1217. So that if we should hear that the police have no evidence that such practices exist, we may take it for granted that they do not exist?—Yes; if it is the wish of the Committee to have more specific evidence I am not prepared to say which way it would be, but it is my firm opinion that it is not the general rule, and, indeed, if it is the case at all, it is a very rare exception.

The Honourable GEORGE CHAPPLE NORTON, called in; and Examined.

The Hon. G. C. Norton.

1218. Mr. Locke.] YOU are magistrate at the Lambeth Police Court?—Yes.

1219. I believe that your attention has been drawn to music-halls?—Yes, certainly, that was last year.

1220. That was in the case of the Canterbury Hall?—Yes.

1221 Will you state, for the information of the Committee, precisely what that case was?—It was a case on the new discovery of Pepper's; that was adopted there, I suppose, to escape being licensed for the regular drama. I thought the best way was to go and see it. I was very much amused, and I must say delighted; it seemed to me to be very new and very superior in many respects to ordinary representations.

1222. The effect of that was, that no person appeared on the stage; but there was a reflection?—It was a double reflection; there was a lower stage, and the action which took place there was made to appear on the upper stage.

1223. There was dialogue, was there not?—Yes, and story.

1224. Your decision was that it was a performance of the stage, although the audience could not see the performers?—Yes, and that decision was upheld by the Court of Common Pleas.

1225. Now, you say that you visited the Canterbury Hall; what was your opinion with regard to the performances at the Canterbury Hall; were they of a proper character?—Quite so.

so. I thought it was an imitation somewhat similar to what I have seen in the tea-gardens of Germany, only it was an improvement upon them; because in addition to the music and dancing, they gave this simple story.

1226. Now, I believe, that at the Canterbury Hall they have tables set throughout the room, where the people take refreshments during the time of the performance?—Yes.

1227. And smoke?—Yes, they smoke.

1228. Is that similar to what goes on in the German music-halls?—Qu'te.

1229. Do you think that any inconvenience arises from that?—Not at all to the class of people who frequent those places.

1230. What was the class of people at the Canterbury Hall?—It seemed to me that they were artizans, and I am happy to say very much with their wives and children sitting round those little tables and also enjoying the performances.

1231. Now in your opinion, is it a good or a bad thing that these people should have that opportunity?—I think it is not a matter of unmixed good, but I think that the good predominates very much; I think that if those places were properly guarded, and if the performances were not allowed to extend beyond 11 o'clock at night, under proper surveillance, they would be productive of great good. I rather suspended my decision with the hope that the Lord Chamberlain would have extended the license to that sort of piece that was then being acted, but he stated that he was compelled to draw a line of distinction between the theatres and those music-halls, and that that line was mainly drawn by preventing refreshments going on in the area of the play-house; I was very sorry that the light of "Hodge Podge" should have been quenched, for it was a very brilliant affair.

1232. Was there any impropriety in the piece itself?—None whatever.

1233. Did you observe any improper characters there?—No; I may say that the Canterbury Hall is within my district, and I cannot recollect a case from it being brought before me of disorder or drunkenness on any occasion whatever.

1234. Have you likewise another music-hall in Lambeth or Southwark?—Not in Lambeth.

1235. There is one in the London-road, is there not?—Yes, that is not in my district.

1236. Is there any other music-hall in your district besides Canterbury Hall?—I am not aware.

1237. Are there any private rooms at Canterbury Hall?—I do not believe there are.

1238. You never heard of that?—No, never; there is another thing, which, in my opinion, would be important, that is, that the money paid on entrance should be entirely for admission, and not to be taken out in drink.

1239. Is that the case at Canterbury Hall?—No, but it is the case at some other places I am told.

1240. They are not obliged to take it out in drink?—They do not do that at Canterbury Hall, but I am told at some other places they do.

1241. They pay for admission?—Yes.

1242. But they do as they like about taking the drink?—Yes, but I presume that most of them do take it.

1243. Are you aware that it is the same thing at the Cafés-Chantants, at Paris?—No, I have not been to them.

1244. At what hour does the Canterbury Hall close?—I do not know exactly, but I think it is after 11. The Hon. G. C. Norton. 16 April 1866.

1245. Do you think 11 o'clock the proper hour?—Yes, I think so.

1246. You say that there have been no complaints brought before you of any improper conduct in the Canterbury Hall?—No, nor from Astley's.

1247. Do you know what the charge for admission is to the Canterbury Hall?—I think the stalls are 1 s., and that the admission to the other places is 6 d.

1248. A man by paying 6 d. gets refreshment to that amount, and he can stay there all the evening?—No, that is merely for admission; there is no refreshment for that money.

1249. If he wants anything to drink he buys it?—Yes.

1250. Do you think that is a proper arrangement?—I think so; I think they charge rather high for refreshments in those places.

1251. I believe that your attention has been drawn to the 6th and 7th Vict., the Dramatic Licensing Act?—Yes.

1252. Do you think it would be an advantage if all these places were put under the Lord Chamberlain, and that they should have the privilege of performing any species of play that was acceptable to the people, provided it had the sanction of the Lord Chamberlain with regard to the propriety of its being put on the stage?—I do, indeed; I think it is most important that it should be under one authority; I think that one department would be the only one that would be properly fitted to exercise the censorship over the acting as well as over the place.

1253. You think that there should be a direction from the Lord Chamberlain, or some other authority, not to draw a distinction between the theatres where they have a spirit license, and keep refreshments at the back of the pit or in a different room, and those places which keep it at the tables, with people sitting at them, in the body of the place?—I think it is very necessary that a distinct character should be kept up between the theatres and the regular drama and those inferior places; I think that the rule which the Lord Chamberlain drew was a very necessary one, for preventing people taking refreshments in the theatre in the way that they do in the area of music-halls. I think that the refreshments in theatres should be restricted to light drinks, and that no exciseable liquors should be consumed in the pit or boxes of any theatre; I would exempt the gallery, because the gods have always been accustomed to it, and I do not think that it would be productive of the same nuisance to the more respectable people who go to the pit and boxes. I would allow the theatres to have places out of the area of the pit and boxes for refreshments, all the same.

1254. The same as they have now?—Yes.

1255. You know that the Lord Chamberlain's license carries a wine and spirit license?—Yes.

1256. You think it beneficial that men sitting at a table taking refreshments should have an opportunity of seeing a performance of the stage, to what particular performance would you restrict that?—I think that the Lord Chamberlain would be the best judge as to what the building was adapted for.

1257. Would you see any objection to a Vaudeville?—No.

1258. You would see no objection to a play?—No,

The Hon. G.C. Norton.
16 April 1866.

No, not if the building was suited for it, and if the taste of the people led to it.

1259. Whether they sat at a table or not?—I think so, as long as you do not come to the regular drama.

1260. You mean what is called the legitimate drama?—Yes.

1261. I do not know whether that is an undefinable thing, but has it ever been clearly defined?—I suppose it is impossible to define that exactly.

1262. Do you think, seeing that it has never been defined for so many hundreds of years, that any Act of Parliament could do it now?—That would be mainly determinable, I think, by the nature of the building, whether it had accommodation for scenery or not.

1263. If the stage was large enough for the representation of "King John," there would be no objection at all to that tragedy being performed at the Canterbury Hall, would there?—I think it would be very hard upon the theatres; I think they would be deserted.

1264. People would so much prefer sitting comfortably smoking a cigar and witnessing the performance of King John, that they would go there instead of to the theatre; is that what you think?—The great bulk of the people no doubt would.

1265. Supposing they did prefer that, do you see any particular reason why they should not enjoy their own bent instead of sticking in the same place throughout the whole of the night, and if they wanted refreshments walk into the back of the pit or into the saloon, if they happened to be in the boxes or in the gallery, going to the beer engine at the back of it?—In my opinion, there is no objection to it, but some masters object to their servants going to Music-halls, they think that when they have once had that enjoyment, they will go too often, and neglect their duty at home.

1266. We cannot lay down laws to regulate relations of that kind between masters and servants, and you would hardly wish to have difficulties of this kind added to those that often come before you on those subjects?—No.

1267. A master can turn his servant away, if he thinks that he goes too often to the music-halls?—I really think that almost despotic power should be given to the Lord Chamberlain, and that he should be responsible to the Home Secretary who is responsible to Parliament.

1268. In what sense despotic power?—That he should have the power to stop a play being acted.

1269. That is to say if it was improper?—Yes, if it was improper; and also that he should have the power of suspending a license and revoking it.

1270. For what reasons?—For good reasons, political, moral, and so on.

1271. If the place was ill-conducted and improper characters came there, and if there was disorderly conduct?—Yes, if there was any indecent play, or a play decently written but indecently acted.

1272. But do you think it would be an advantage that the Lord Chamberlain should have the power of licensing a play, and that it should be sent to him beforehand?—Certainly.

1273. Then is there any distinction which you would draw, with regard to a performance between a music-hall and an ordinary theatre?—No, there is not.

1274. Do you think that they should have an opportunity of performing precisely the same things as the theatres?—Yes; it is desirable that the peoples' taste should be raised, and that, instead of listening to trash, they should have good sound pieces performed.

1275. You think that it would tend to raise the taste of the people generally if music-halls were allowed to perform stage plays?—Yes; I do, indeed, and perhaps it would lead them to go to the pure dramatic places.

1277. How would you propose that it should be outside the metropolitan district?—There of course the magistrates would have the power. I would enlarge the Lord Chamberlain's power to the metropolitan district. I would take in Greenwich, for instance.

1279. Lord Eustace Cecil.] That would be a very great enlargement of the district?—It would; the Lord Chamberlain would require a staff.

1280. You would allow the Lord Chamberlain to make his own regulations entirely with regard to what the separate places should be wherein the drama took place, and places wherein music and dancing took place?—Yes.

1281. Whether refreshments should oe sold within the building, or without the building, you would leave it to him to decide entirely?—That would depend on whether it came within the proper drama or not. I think that the proper drama should be guaranteed from those tables for refreshments.

1282. But the Lord Chamberlain would decide whether it was a drama proper or not?—Yes.

1283. Lord Ernest Bruce.] How many of those music-halls are there in your district?—I am not aware of more than one.

1284. I suppose you heard the question which I put to Sir Richard Mayne, with regard to indecency and immorality; I think you have stated that no such case of indecency or immorality has been reported to you?—None whatever, or even of disorder.

1285. Mr. Clay.] If you were asked to define the difference between the legitimate and the illegitimate drama, what would be your definition?—I really could not define it.

1286. Why should we impose upon the Lord Chamberlain a task which you yourself would not undertake?—I think it would be mainly determined by the nature of the building; if the building had all the accommodation required for the pure drama, I think the Lord Chamberlain ought to license it.

1287. The Honourable Member for Southwark put the case to you of a theatre having the capacity for giving good effect to King John, which is rather a spectacular play, and you said you considered that such a place should be a theatre for the legitimate drama?—According to my opinion, it should, because I think it would elevate elevate the taste of the people who go to those music-halls.

1288. Are you not aware that quite as much space, and considerably more elaborate machinery is required for the performance of ballet or pantomime, than for King John?—I can quite understand that more room may be required. In the piece that I witnessed at the Canterbury Hall, there was only one scene altogether, and I thought it quite suited to that place.

1289. Then even tried by that test, the Lord Chamberlain would be a little puzzled to draw this definition, which has never been drawn?—Even if he made it into a theatre, I think the Lord Chamberlain would find himself compelled to draw that line, and make them give up supplying refreshments in the body of the place.

1290. Then supposing that the state of the law were this, that every place of public entertainment, where anything like a dramatic performance was carried on, were taken in by words so extensive that they should include beyond doubt poses plastiques, and all imitations of the drama; and suppose that the law was that all those places should be under one law and regulation, and that that law and regulation should have no object whatever, except to secure decency, both in the performances and the audience, what should you think of a law having in view the carrying out of that object?—I should think that that law was a great improvement on the present undefined state of the law, and the present evasions of the law; I think that the licensing system might be made in a great measure self-supporting. I think that the Lord Chamberlain would require a very strong staff of inspectors, and making those places pay for their licenses would ensure their falling into more respectable hands, and make their responsibility greater.

1291. Mr. Miller.] As you propose to place in the hands of the Lord Chamberlain such vast powers to determine what constitutes the drama, would you not at the same time give to the Lord Chamberlain a council or committee to assist him in the discharge of his duties?—Certainly, I think he should have inspectors; of course he would require architects, and a certain number of inspectors, and those inspectors might visit the different theatres.

1292. Do you think that there would then be uniformity in the decisions of the Lord Chamberlain and his committee?—Yes.

1293. Would you recommend that there should be any appeal from the Lord Chamberlain?—Yes, I think there should be an appeal to the Home Office, which would increase the responsibility.

1294. Would it not be better to have an appeal to some open public court?—No, it is not a machinery that could be managed so well.

1296. Mr. O'Beirne.] I apprehend that the difference between the halls where ballets are played and the places where stage plays are acted is, that drinking and smoking are allowed in front of the stage in one case, and not in the other?—Yes.

1297. Now, as a magistrate of experience, do you think that permission to smoke and drink in those halls produces any immorality?—I think not; I think that the great evil which we have to contend with is drunkenness, and drunkenness generally arises in tap-rooms of public-houses, where fathers of families meet together, as the upper classes do in club-rooms, and there they drink in a private manner. Now, by taking them out into public places their families go with them. In some districts, I have been very much shocked to see that the women get drunk in a larger proportion than the men; that has been very much caused by men going to those tap-rooms away from their families, and leaving their wives at home. I think that taking their wives with them to places of amusement has very much led them to neglect the tap-rooms.

1299. Mr. O'Beirne.] You think that the effect of those halls on the people generally is rather to improve their conduct and their habits than otherwise?—Certainly.

1299*. And that, under proper restrictions, it would be more useful socially, that they should be continued than that they should be discouraged?—Yes.

1300. Mr. Lusk.] You have said that you were very much pleased with the performance at the Canterbury Hall?—Yes.

1301. Were drinking and refreshments used there?—Yes, during the whole of the time.

1302. Do you think that drinking and refreshments were necessary?—I think they are to John Bull.

1003. You think that the people would break down before the entertainment was done if it was carried on without refreshments?—I think they would cease to be amused.

1304. You think that the object of those entertainments is for the benefit of the people on the whole?—I do think so.

1305. What is the distinction that you would draw between the large theatres and the smaller places?—Merely this, that there should not be at the theatres those tables and public drinking, because the people who go to the large theatres go there for mental enjoyment, wheras the primary object of the people who go to the music-halls is refreshment after a hard day's work.

1306. Did you say that you would not like the smaller theatres to enact plays?—No, I said the contrary.

1307. Would you like to see them enact the legitimate drama?—Yes, but then you must get rid of the refreshment tables and the smoking.

1308. But why should you protect the legitimate drama?—I am afraid that the legitimate drama would stand very little chance if drinking and smoking were introduced.

1309. But keeping the good of the people in view, on what ground would you protect it?—I should be sorry that Shakspeare should disappear.

1310. Would that make him disappear, or make him more popular than ever?—If they wanted to hear Shakspeare they would not be thinking so much of the refreshment tables.

1311. But why do you think that the legitimate drama should be protected; for whose benefit benefit is it?—I think it is for the benefit of the higher classes and of the public generally.

The Hon. G.C.Norton.

16 April 1866.

1312. Cannot the higher classes take care of themselves?—I think that the lower classes might be led on by those minor pieces to go and see the legitimate drama.

1313. Is not it much better to have the legitimate drama than those negro songs?—Yes, a great deal.

1314. Then if the lower classes were led on to that, it would be an advantage, would it not?—Yes.

1315. Mr. Powell.] A great difficulty has been confessed by the previous witnesses with regard to the definition of the legitimate drama, and I understand that you feel some difficulty on that point; they are not able to define the difference between the legitimate drama and, we will say, plays of another character?—Yes, that is so.

1316. You are not in a condition to assist us by suggesting a more definite phrase?—No.

1317. You made use of the terms regular theatres and inferior places; can you define the two?—What I meant was the music-halls; they have one character of entertainment, and the great theatres have another.

1318. But, in fact, at the present time there is a continual tendency on the part of the music-halls to approach the regular theatres?—Yes.

1319. And that is one cause of our difficulty?—Yes.

1320. But you still feel unable to draw the line between a regular theatre and an inferior place?—Quite.

1321. Taking the music-halls either as places for music alone, or for music with some very minor theatrical performance, would you allow refreshments in the auditorium?—Certainly I would.

1323. I do not mean women going round between the acts with some light refreshments, but having tables, and so on; would you allow that?—I think not at the regular theatres; it would be a great annoyance to the main body of the audience.

1324. But you would allow them in music-halls?—Yes.

1325. What reason can you give why a person who desires to act Shakespere, and to produce the more intellectual drama, should not be allowed to have those tables in the auditorium, while a man who relies on music alone, or music with some minor scenic accessories, might have them?—Because a man who goes to a regular theatre goes there for mental enjoyment, but the primary object of the man who goes to the music-halls is refreshments.

1326. It comes to this, that it is the class of people appealed to which makes the difference?—Yes.

1327. But in the music-halls where you recommend that there should be permission to consume liquors during the performance in the auditorium, would you confine it to beer?—I meant beer and spirits.

1328. Do you draw a difference between beer and spirits?—I do with regard to the galleries of theatres, because they have always been accustomed to beer.

1329. Take the music-halls, would you allow gin and brandy to be sold in the audience part of the house?—Yes.

1330. But you would not allow them to be sold at regular theatres?—Not in the audience part.

1331. But assuming that a person wishes to represent Shakespere, and that he is of opinion that it would tend to his benefit and advantage as a speculator to sell exciseable liquors in the auditorium during the performance, do you see any reason why he should be denied that liberty?—I think that the general class of people who would attend to see a play of Shakespere would be very much annoyed by those little tables, and smoking, and so on.

1332. You think that a theatrical manager having such an ambition in favour of the higher drama would, as a matter of policy, not allow the sale of exciseable liquors among the audience during the performance?—That would be a matter to be determined by the result; but I should think that would be so.

1333. Chairman.] I understand you to be distinctly of opinion that it would be well to continue licensing entertainments?—Yes.

1334. Would you throw them open altogether and have no regulations at all to control music-halls and places where theatrical entertainments take place?—Certainly not.

1335. For what reasons would you wish to continue the system of licensing?—Because it ensures control.

1336. Do you mean control of the performance or of the audience?—Most of all the audience, but also the performance, because the license might be refused.

1337. You consider it desirable to exercise a control over the pieces to be performed?—Yes.

1339. Have you ever had cases of complaints brought before you for indecencies in the performance?—Never.

1340. Do you think that is a proof that there are none?—They are not carried very far or we should hear of them.

1341. Would you interfere with the judge and jury performance magisterially?—No, I consider it a dramatic performance.

1342. And not of an improving character?—It may be carried too far.

1343. But is there a point at which you would stop it?—Yes, if it brought any of the Judges into contempt.

1344. But what I mean is if they performed very indecent mock trials, would that, in your opinion, be a case for stopping them?—I have only been at one of those judge and jury trials in my life, but I do think that they carry their questions rather too far sometimes.

1345. Lord Eustace Cecil.] You said in your evidence just now that you were in favour of extending the Lord Chamberlain's influence over the whole of the metropolitan district?—Yes.

1346. Of course you are aware that that would be 15 miles around town, and that by so doing you would deprive the Middlesex Magistrates entirely of the power of granting licenses for music music and dancing?—Yes, and the Surrey Magistrates too.

1347. Did I understand you rightly on that subject?—Quite so.

1348. Chairman.] Have you anything which you would wish to add to your evidence?—I think if the department of the Lord Chamberlain was strengthened, and the Metropolitan police district was put under his single and undivided authority, wholesome uniformity of administration would be secured, and his Lordship's department might serve as a model for the other parts of the kingdom.

The Hon. G. C. Norton.
16 April 1866.

FREDERICK STRANGE, Esq., called in; and Examined.

1349. Mr. Locke.] You are the Managing Director of the Alhambra Music-Hall, are you not?—I am.

1350. Is it in the hands of a Limited Liability Company?—It is.

1351. Since when?—Since the 11th of December last.

1352. Will you state to the Committee the amount of capital embarked there?—100,000 l. is the capital, but it is not quite all called up.

1353. That is the nominal capital of the Company; how much is paid up?—I should say about 60,000 l.

1354. What was the cost of the building; first of all it was built for scientific purposes, was it not?—It was built first of all for the Panopticon; it is said that it cost 120,000 l., but I cannot tell.

1355. There was horsemanship performed there at one time?—Yes, Howes and Cushings had it for a long time for horsemanship.

1356. Then you took it first of all after that?—No, Mr. E. T. Smith took it.

1357. For what purpose?—For a music-hall, the same as it is now.

1358. In what year was that?—About six years ago.

1359. How long have you been manager?—Since December 1864.

1360. What sum of money has been laid out on the building since?—I, myself, have spent about 25,000*l.* in the Alhambra in decorations, independently of leases.

1361. Was that on the fabric?—In decoration and furniture.

1362. The building was in a very bad state?—Yes.

1363. You have had to repair it?—Yes, that is what the money was spent for, repairing the building, decorations, furniture, and so on.

1364. But there is furniture as well as the outlay on the permanent building?—Yes, and I have a very long lease.

1365. This 25,000*l.* has been spent by you, irrespective of the lease?—Yes, 25,000*l.* has been laid out to make it fit to be opened, as it is now open to the public.

1366. You have had the Alhambra since 1864, you say?—Yes.

1367. What was the nature of the performances at the Alhambra when you first became connected with it, what performances had Mr. E. T. Smith?—He was doing ballets nearly the same as I am doing now; but after Mr. Smith left it, Mr. Wilde of Norwich did away with ballets, and substituted a singing and gymnastic performance.

1368. How long had Mr. Wilde the Alhambra?—About four years I think.

1369. You succeeded Mr. Wilde?—I succeeded Mr. Wilde.

1370. You carry on the Alhambra under certain licenses, you have four, I believe?—I have a wine and spirit license, a tobacco license, and a music and dancing license.

F. Strange, Esq.

1371. And now in addition to that, you have a limited license from the Lord Chamberlain, have you not?—I have a license for morning performances from the Lord Chamberlain.

1372. That is to obviate risks from the provisions of the 25 Geo. 2, which prevents any performance under the music and dancing license before 5 o'clock in the afternoon?—Yes.

1373. Was that license granted to you in consequence of the same license having been granted to the Hanover Square and Willis's Rooms?—Yes, I think so.

1374. That arose, I believe, from a petition which was presented to the bench of magistrates, in October last?—Yes.

1375. To prevent actions under that provision of the Act, which makes it imperative on the magistrate to take away the license, and prevent a person even keeping the house again?—Yes.

1376. Have you ever taken advantage of that license with regard to performances before five o'clock in the afternoon?—I have had morning performances since I obtained that license.

1377. Of what description?—Precisely the same as in the evening.

1378. Ballets?—Yes, everything the same, a few little things being cut out because the time is shorter.

1379. Has the attendance been full in the morning?—No; but the attendance was very good, especially on Saturday last.

1380. Were refreshments sold during the morning performance?—Yes, just the same as in the evening.

1381. Mr. Powell.] Refreshments were sold in the auditorium?—Yes in the auditorium.

1382. Mr. Locke.] There are always refreshments in the audience part?—Yes.

1383. Is the proportion which is spent on drink in the morning the same as the proportion which is spent on drink in the evening?—I think very nearly the same; but I have not gone into that question.

1384. Have there ever been any complaints with regard to improper conduct in the Alhambra?—Never.

1385. Mr. Pownall stated in his evidence that he had heard that there were private rooms at the Alhambra; he did not say that he had ever seen them; are there any?—I most distinctly deny that; there are no private rooms in the Alhambra, there are private boxes.

1386. How many private boxes are there?—There are two at present, and I am making two more; they are about 12 feet above the pit, under the first balcony; there are lights burning in them, and I do not think there can be anything improper in them; they are the most public places in London.

1387. There is likewise, quite distinct from the

F. Strange, Esq.
16 April 1866.

the auditorium, a very large refreshment room, is there not?—Yes.

1388. On what floor is the supper room?—There is a large supper room on the grond floor, but there is nothing on the first and second floor.

1389. The supper room is open to everybody?—It is thrown open; there is nothing to divide it from the grand hall; there is a passage 8 or 10 feet wide, and anybody can walk in, there is not even a door closed.

1390. It is like a coffee-room, with tables where persons can dine?—Yes.

1391. It is entirely distinct from that part of the building where the performances take place, is it not?—Quite.

1392. What sort of refreshments do people take at the tables in front of the stage?—Gin, brandy, and a very large quantity of Bass's pale ale, and soda and brandy is consumed very much at the Alhambra.

1393. What is the charge for entrance?—1 s., 2 s., and 4 s., and 1 l. 1 s., and 6 d., we charge 6 d. for the second balcony, it has a separate entrance from the street. The promenade part of the pit and the first balcony is 1 s., the reserved seats are 4 s., and private boxes a guinea, and stalls 2 s.

1394. Whereabouts are the stalls?—Those stalls are two-thirds of the front part of the pit, they are within a circle of railings.

1395. Mr. Miller.] Do you mean to say that the box is a guinea seat?—No, the whole box is a guinea.

1396. Mr. Powell.] How many does a box hold?—Four persons.

1397. Sir Arthur Buller.] You say that the box is a guinea, and you say in your paper that there is only one?—There will be four in a few days, but at present there is only one public box; there is one used by the house, which is called a private box, but it is never let; there is only one private box, which is let at a guinea.

1398. Mr. Powell.] You keep the other box for your own private friends, as a matter of hospitality?—Yes; I have a house in Leicester-square; I never let that box, except sometimes to the press or a neighbour that wants to go into it particularly.

1399. Mr. Locke.] I suppose that box is open to the building, just like the others?—Yes.

1400. Have the police free access to the building?—Yes.

1401. How many policemen attend there?—They vary; I have employed 12; I have only got three now.

1402. But, in addition to that, have the police got free access to the building, if they choose to come in?—If they please, they are not stopped; I may add that I have six of my own private policemen in livery.

1403. They are rather masters of the ceremonies, I suppose?—They have nothing to do but to walk round and look to the order of the establishment.

1404. They do not act as waiters?—No, nothing of the kind, not even to show people into their seats; they are in fact policemen.

1405. How many persons do you employ in the establishment, first of all how many waiters have you?—About 24.

1406. Is that the number throughout the whole building?—Yes.

1407. Those persons who keep order are only policemen?—Yes.

1408. How many policemen have you?—I have three policemen and the one inspector or sergeant, which makes four. I have six private policemen also.

1409. How many persons are employed on the stage?—I should think there are about 300, as near as possible.

1410. Your ballet is very extensive, I believe?—Yes; it is very extensive.

1411. How many are there in it?—In the last ballet with the young ladies suspended, I think the number is 98.

1412. Has your employment of those young ladies in the ballet tended to increase their salaries?—Yes; most decidedly.

1413. Not merely at the Alhambra, but throughout the metropolis?—I think so.

1414. How much have their salaries increased?—Fully 4 s. or 5 s. a week, I should say.

1415. What are the pursuits of those young women, what do they do besides dancing on the stage?—I can hardly tell you; but I know that a great many of them use the needle. They are tailoresses, dress-makers, and so on, or rather more in the tailoring line.

1416. Now this dancing at night is an addition to their earnings?—Yes.

1417. In the tailoring, and so on, the pay is not very high, I believe?—Very low indeed they tell me.

1418. Does this dancing enable them to get an honest livelihood?—I think so.

1419. Is there any impropriety in their conduct?—I have never seen any whatever.

1420. Would that be permitted?—Certainly not inside our establishment.

1421. What they do outside you cannot tell, but they conduct themselves very well in your establishment?—Yes, very well indeed.

1422. You have a great many singers, have you not?—Yes.

1423. What description of performance do you give in music?—Songs, glees, duets, and operatic selections.

1424. Now, with regard to opera, in what way do you put opera on the stage, you have no dresses, have you?—No; all the singers are plainly dressed. I can only put it on as a selection; there is no acting.

1425. How many have you in the chorus?—Forty, besides the band; 70 including the band and chorus.

1426. You have had the "Orphée aux Enfers"?—Yes, I am performing that now.

1427. Do they sing all the music?—No; it would be too long for a music-hall.

1428. How long does it occupy?—I think about 30 minutes, from 20 to 27 minutes perhaps.

1429. Your performances are varied, are they not?—Yes.

1430. What other performances take place at the present time?—We begin the performance with a grand chorus; after that a duet; after that a ballet, which we call the comic ballet; then a little more singing and tumbling, and then the second ballet, "the National ballet;" to follow that we have this selection and a little tumbling; and perhaps another glee, and we finish with what we call a transformation scene.

1431. That is a species of ballet?—It is a kind of transformation scene.

1432. They dance in it?—They dance in it.

1433. Then there are leaves which open, and there are young ladies behind them, and they are all lifted up; it is similar to what you have at pretty nearly all the theatres?—Yes, very much the same.

1434. Now, do you think that you could give a higher species of performance in any respect than you do at present, if it were not for your being restricted by the 6 & 7 Vict.?—Yes, there could be a better class of entertainment then; for instance, what they call dress opera, a little sparkling opera, such as you see in Paris, could be done, which you cannot do now. Although we want the thing thrown open, I do not think that it would answer any music-hall proprietors' purpose to give any of Shakespere's plays at this moment in music-halls.

1435. What description of performance do you think it would answer the music-hall proprietors' purpose to give in preference to what you now give?—Anything in the way of a pantomime and those little operas dressed, and so on.

1436. Do you recollect the Eagle Tavern before the alteration was made by the Lord Chamberlain?—Yes.

1437. Do you recollect the species of performances given there?—Yes.

1438. They had tables and chairs in the audience part, and persons taking refreshments?—Yes.

1439. What pieces were performed there?—They used to do many things on the stage that cannot be done now.

1440. Plays and ballets?—Yes; simply because there was no one to interfere with them.

1441. But this same kind of entertainment is now carried on at the music-halls, is it not?—Yes; but the public taste is very much altered; you must now do things very much better.

1442. But still of that character?—It would be that kind of thing, only far superior.

1443. Do you recollect the Yorkshire Stingo?—I never saw that.

1444. There is one at Highbury, is there not?—There is one now at Highbury Barn.

1445. That is licensed by the Lord Chamberlain as a theatre, is it not?—Yes.

1446. But previously they used to have performances of plays, and so on, under the music and dancing license, did they not?—I never saw myself any performance there of that kind.

1447. Can you tell the Committee exactly what style of performance you think would be advantageous in a music-hall?—I think that we ought to be at liberty to do any style of performance; but the principal thing at the present moment would be selections, properly dressed, that is, little operas dressed, and anything in the way of farce or pantomime.

1448. Do you think that that would answer?—I think that would answer.

1449. Do you think that would tend to elevate the taste of the public?—I do.

1450. And that it would be preferable to a portion of the entertainment which now you are obliged to give?—I do think so.

1451. Have you made any calculations with regard to the proportion of money that you take at the bar, as compared with what you take for entrance money?—Yes.

1452. Will you state to the Committee what that proportion is?—The price for admission is 1 s. a head; take it all the year through the average for drink, eating, cigars, and everything, would be about 6 d. a head. On great holidays it is far less than 6 d., such as Whitsuntide, Boxing days, and Easter Mondays, it is below 6 d.

1453. In that calculation which you have made out, you include every species of eating, drinking, and smoking?—Yes, I take every species of eating, drinking, and smoking. On Saturday night last, which was rather a good night for refreshments, we took 180 l. at the doors, and 101 l. for refreshments.

1454. How many visitors have you every night, on an average?—I think I may say that the average is a little over 3,000; it is about 20,000 a week.

1455. A good deal has been said about the composition of the visitors; there are some women of the town who attend the Alhambra, as there are in all public places in London, in theatres and elsewhere, I suppose?—Yes, no doubt.

1456. What per centage of your audiences should you say were women of the town?—I am very happy to have an opportunity of answering the question, because I think that it is very much overrated. I have taken the trouble to have those that we know to be women of the town counted on several occasions, and I find that they average 3 to 100, or a little over, certainly not 4 per cent. If I have 3,500 people in the place, there are very few over 100 whom we know to be women of the town.

1458. Are there persons who come there with their wives?—Yes, with their wives and families.

1459. Have you ever known any excesses committed by them?—No, not by the wives and families.

1460. But now and then they do occur, I suppose?—Sometimes, and the people are immediately put out.

1461. In fact you have a sufficient number of police present, and police attached to the establishment, to keep order?—Yes.

1462. And order is kept?—Yes, it is.

1463. I think you have stated that the present law, with regard to theatres, that is to say, forbidding you to give those performances which would be most conducive to your benefit, causes you to lose a large sum of money?—Yes.

1464. What do you estimate that loss at?—I think I may say, first of all, that in the performance of opera for instance, I could, with the persons properly dressed in character, do with half the people, and that would save me 50 l. or 60 l. a week.

1465. And you could do it with more effect?—Yes.

1466. You would then have to employ only half the number?—Yes, because the opera would be put on the stage in the form of a play, now it is only a chorus.

1467. But you would still want the chorus, would you not?—Not so large a chorus.

1468. Is that because you are forced to cover the stage?—Yes; if we cannot do little pieces with the acting, we must do something to do justice to the opera, and other little things must be done. The public would not be satisfied with two or three people coming on the stage. If I could dress opera, very likely we should do the other part quite differently.

F. Strange, Esq.

16 April 1866.

1469. Mr. Miller.] If you employed half the number to do the opera, would you not have to employ a superior class of people and have to pay a higher rate of wages?—I think not.

1470. Mr. Locke.] You employ very efficient singers now, do you not?—Yes, we pay a very high price for singers now; I have paid 20 l. a week to a singer.

1471. How long do those selections occupy?—About 30 minutes.

1472. Mr. Powell.] For how long a time was that 20 l. a week paid?—Perhaps it was a six months' engagement, or perhaps a twelvemonth; it was a long engagement.

1473. Mr. Locke.] It is notorious that you have had proceedings taken against you on several occasions?—Yes, on three different occasions.

1474. That was with regard to your having "a performance of the stage?"—Yes.

1475. However, the decision of the Court of Common Pleas has quashed that conviction against you?—It has.

1476. And I believe the managers of theatres are now quiet?—They have not interfered at all since the last decision at Westminster.

1477. Nor have the proprietors of music-halls taken any further steps with regard to performances before five o'clock in the afternoon?—Not that I have heard of.

1478. Do you think it is very necessary that there should be some legislation on the subject clearly defining what the rights of the different people concerned are?—I think so.

1479. Do you think, as manager, that you should have the privilege of performing stage plays if you please?—Yes.

1480. Do you think that if that privilege were granted in as large a degree to the music-halls as it is to the theatres, that there would be any detriment to the theatres?—I do not think so.

1481. For what reason is it that you do not think so?—I do not think that the parties who go to the theatres to see Shakspeare's plays would come to the Alhambra to see them; they would go to see them done in their proper form.

1482. Then you would not have Shakspeare's plays performed at the Alhambra?—No, certainly not; if it was thrown open to-morrow I should not attempt one of Shakspeare's plays.

1483. If it were thrown open to-morrow, can you distinctly say what you would wish to have performed?—There are several little things that can be done, dozens of little short things to amuse the public, but they would not come to the Alhambra to listen to Shakspeare, because, in fact, it would not be heard.

1484. The audience would not be able to hear it?—The audience would not be able to hear it. The same gentleman who goes to the theatre comes in at 10 o'clock to smoke his cigar at the Alhambra.

1485. They come to see the late performance?—Yes.

1486. It amuses a man while he is smoking his cigar?—Yes.

1487. Can you see any reason why he should not have that enjoyment if he likes?—I can see no reason why it should not be thrown open to theatres if they like to put tables round the pit; but I do not think it would answer their purpose.

1488. Can you see any reason why a man should not have any enjoyment he please, if he does not interfere with the people?—No.

1489. Mr. Clay.] Can you assist us to a definition of what is the legitimate drama?—It is very difficult to define.

1490. But you have been manager long enough to know what the audience like, and what they do not like?—Yes, I think so. I am doing a ballet d'action, which they like very much. I think that is entertaining if it comes to the point.

1491. I believe that some of your music is of the very highest class?—Some of it is.

1492. You give selections nightly from very well known authors, such as Gounod, Donizetti, Rossini, Meyerbeer, and Offenbach?—Yes.

1493. All your music is not of the same high character, because occasionally you have men with very long tailed coats who sing some offensive nonsense, like "hoop-de-dooden-doo"?—There is very little of that at the Alhambra.

1494. There would be more at the Alhambra, I suppose, if the audience liked it?—Some do like it, no doubt; but they have very little of it.

1495. If you were told that you must throw up your musical selections or your niggers, which would you throw over?—The nigger performance.

1496. Now supposing that you were left entirely alone, and dictated to by no law as to whether you performed the very highest class of drama, or went down to the very lowest, do you think that you would raise or lower the tone of the present performances?—I would raise it decidedly.

1497. With regard to the opera of Offenbach, the Orphée aux Enfers, and probably also, La Belle Hélène, you would probably give them entire, as they are given in Offenbach's own theatres, if you could?—Yes.

1498. Is it your belief that they would have a very great success?—Yes.

1499. Are you aware that they have had the greatest success in Paris?—La Belle Hélène is now under rehearsal at the Alhambra, and will appear there before it appears anywhere else.

1500. You feel quite clear that an alteration of the law which would leave you more the master of your performances would result in raising and not in lowering the performances?—I am quite sure it would.

1501. Can you tell me how many refreshment rooms you have got in your music-hall?—The supper room, and a room under a part of the building.

1502. Taking the room under some part of the building, on the basement, is that open to everybody?—Only those that I allow to go in with special permission.

1503. In fact, that is any one going to that room avails himself of a special permission, as the attendants at the theatre avail themselves of the special permission of the manager, to go behind the scenes?—Yes.

1504. That being so, you are, no doubt, well acquainted with the conduct of that room, and I suppose it would be impossible that any gross immorality could be carried on without your being aware of it?—It is quite impossible that anything immoral could take place; it is nearly the size of this room, sometimes there are 40 people there, never less, and sometimes 200. The police go to the room; there is always a policeman there. I allow no one to go on the stage, or any other other part of the building, except to this large public room.

1505. That is a room with a bar in it?—It is fitted up precisely the same as any large refreshment room would be. When I first went to the Alhambra, I used to find that so many of the people were at the public-houses when I wanted them; some of the singers would go away for a time; and I said, I will not have public-house cans coming in here; I will open that public-room, and charge you public-house prices.

1506. Chairman.] Is that called the canteen?—Yes.

1507. Mr. Clay.] Can any one go in there by extra payment?—No.

1508. It must be by special permission?—Yes, from me or the manager.

1509. Chairman.] Are they admitted by tickets?—No ticket and no money will admit you in any way.

1510. Lord Ernest Bruce.] How long have you been proprietor of the Alhambra Music Hall?—Only 17 months.

1511. Had you ever been proprietor of any of those music-halls before?—Not for a long time, but I have been connected with all kinds of public entertainments.

1512. There was another place of entertainment in Leicester Square, which was burnt down, was there not?—Yes.

1513. I presume that you have been in the room the whole of the day?—Yes.

1514. You no doubt heard the questions which I put to Sir Richard Mayne; now, during your experience as manager, and your knowledge of music-halls in general, have you ever known such a thing as an inner bar in a music-hall, where there was an additional payment made that young men might go in and smoke, and drink with the ladies of the ballet, in your own hall, or anywhere else?—Not in my hall; I never heard of it, and I do not believe it is so.

1515. Mr. O'Beirne.] You have stated that you have had some morning performances since this last decision of the Court of Queen's Bench?—Yes.

1516. About how many have you had?—We have had four.

1517. What is the proportion of your audience at the morning performances as compared with that in the evening?—A little more than one-third.

1518. Have you been there yourself?—Yes.

1519. Have you made any remarks with regard to the audience?—The character of the audience at the morning performances is rather superior to the audience in the evening; for instance, with the small number there at the morning performances the four-shilling seats are filled, and perhaps they are not so full in the evening.

1520. The performances are nearly the same?—As near as we can get it.

1521. And the consumption of drink?—That is about the same.

1522. With regard to the particular class of women who frequent the Alhambra, were they present in the morning performances?—No, I did not notice any of them.

1523. Are there any free admissions?—No, not one.

1524. Not to any class of persons?—Not to any class of persons whatever.

1525. I allude to that to clear up a statement which has been made here?—It has been reported that a lot of women enter free. I assure you that every woman that comes to the Alhambra has to pay her money to whatever part of the house she goes.

1526. Are your private police authorised officers, or servants of yours only?—They are servants of mine only.

1527. They are not recognised by Sir Richard Mayne?—No, they are pensioned men from the Blues and Horse Guards.

1528. I think you have stated that you have been to the Eagle Tavern and to Highbury Barn. I suppose you remember the arrangement of the Eagle Tavern, is the arrangement anything at all approaching to that at the Alhambra, does smoking and drinking go on in the auditorium?—I have not been there for many years.

1529. You have told the Committee the proportion of women of a certain class who go to your house, can you give the Committee any idea what proportion of the working classes with their wives and families go there?—I have not gone into that particularly, but I should think that half the space is occupied by husbands with their wives and families.

1530. You say that deliberately?—I say that deliberately, that is my opinion.

1531. Have you had many cases of disorder?—I think, only one case was ever taken before a police court, that was on the Oxford and Cambridge night, we always expect a row on that night, I mean the boating night.

1532. Now with regard to the class of entertainment; you have said that you were of opinion that the nigger class of entertainment, and comic tumbling, was not so popular as high-toned music?—I think so; the best proof of it is that I have done away with that nigger singing.

1533. But you had it at first?—Yes.

1534. But in consequence of its being less popular than other music you got rid of it?—Yes.

1535. Is that the case with other music-halls in London?—Perhaps they have more of it than I have, because the selections, with large choruses, are very expensive, and the ballets are very expensive, and they have not got the space; also the charge for admission is lower.

1536. Do you mean to represent to the Committee that the audience has increased since you have changed the character of the performance?—It has increased very much.

1537. Do you think that is in consequence of that change of performance?—It is in consequence of that or something else, I do not know what.

1538. Do you think that the increased audiences arises from the introduction of ballet or scenic performance, or from the introduction of a high-toned class of music?—I think it is because I have introduced a higher class of amusement altogether.

1539. But do you consider that the class of entertainment which you have introduced as musical entertainment or as ballet, has increased your audience?—I think that the musical performance must have increased it very much, because it is the only thing which I have altered; I started with ballet.

1540. Supposing

F. Strang, Esq.

16 April 1866.

1540. Supposing that you were called upon to do away with the music or with the ballets, which would you dispense with?—I could not do away with the ballets.

1541. Now, about this canteen, is the canteen open during the entire evening?—Yes, it opens with the hall.

1542. And gentlemen, who have your permission, go there?—Yes.

1543. Chairman.] Do you ever give permission to the ladies to go there?—No.

1544. Mr. O'Beirne.] You say that there are a great many people who go there?—Yes.

1545. Do all your company go there?—All who care to go; it is open for them.

1546. The ladies of the ballet can go there then?—Yes, if they please.

1547. As a matter of fact, do they go there?—Yes, some may perhaps go there between the ballets; you may see 15 there, not more.

1548. The first ballet is given early in the evening; there is a considerable space of time between them, is there not?—Yes, nearly an hour or so.

1549. Do the same ladies perform in all the three ballets?—Yes.

1550. Is there any place for those ladies dressed for the ballet to remain in during the space between the performances?—They have got dressing rooms.

1551. There is no green room?—No.

1552. Is this room in the shape of a green room?—It was not intended for that.

1553. But the ladies of the ballet come there?—Some few of them do.

Mr. FREDERICK STRANGE, recalled; and further Examined.

Mr. F. Strange.

20 April 1866.

1554. Mr. O'Beirne.] IN answer to a question put to you by an Honourable Member, you told the Committee that the canteen, from time to time, had 200 people in it in the evening; from that varying to 40?—Yes.

1555. Can you tell the Committee what class of people those 200 consist of, generally speaking, I mean can you define the character of the people?—It all depends upon who goes there; I speak of the company at the Alhambra, which consists of 360 people; there are never more than 30 or 40 of what we call visitors there at one time; I should think that the greatest number ever known to be there would not exceed 50.

1556. On any night?—On any night.

1557. Are their names placed on a book, or are they admitted nightly?—No, their names are not placed on a book; I have a man stationed at the door, and no fresh visitor can go down unless he passes him, and if that man goes another night the man at the door would let him in, but not with friends.

1558. Unless you recall that pass, the man at the door lets him go in when he likes?—Yes; sometimes I do say, "Do not pass such a man in again."

1559. You say that the number does not ever exceed 50?—Certainly not, for any night.

1560. Have you lately increased the number that you have admitted, or have you in your own mind limited it?—There is no limit; it is just as it happens; some nights there are none at all.

1561. Has your manager the power to admit any visitors?—Yes.

1562. Has he the same powers as you have?—Yes, but not as to leaving their names at the door; he might pass a gentleman down once, and then there is an end of it.

1563. You have stated that there are three ballets performed during the evening?—Yes, there are three ballets during the evening.

1564. What is the hour at which the first ballet takes place?—About half-past eight.

1565. And the second?—About a quarter to ten.

1566. And the last?—About a quarter past eleven.

1567. Do the same ladies dance in all the three ballets?—Yes.

1568. Do they change their costume between the ballets?—Yes.

1569. Do they come to the canteen in costume?—Sometimes they do; I may say always, in fact.

1570. They are not prevented doing so?—They are not always prevented.

1571. You have said that 15 was about the number of ladies who come into the canteen at any one time?—That may be the number on the average; but I have never seen as many as that; in fact, they have no time.

1572. What is the length of "wait" between the ballets?—Three quarters of an hour after the first ballet, and as near as possible the same with the second.

1573. Can you assure the Committee that you are quite certain that not more than 15 ladies is the average number who frequent that room at one time?—Not at one time; I do not say that there are not more than 15 in the course of the evening; perhaps they may all go, but there are not more than 15 at once.

1574. Are they forced to pass through that room to get to the stage?—No.

1575. When did you commence allowing your friends to come into this canteen; did you do it the first night that you opened the room?—No, I think not.

1576. How long after the Alhambra was opened did you begin the plan?—I cannot say; it is a thing that has grown by degrees; that room was never intended for the public at all.

1577. You have stated that this canteen was adopted by you for the comfort of the company at the Alhambra?—Yes.

1578. Do you think that it is an advantage to let as many as 30 or 40 visitors into that room?—It is no advantage to me.

1579. Is it an advantage to your company?—Not the slightest in any way.

1580. Do you not think that it would be a more regular course for the manager to exclude those visitors?—I have never seen anything improper going on, and I do not think there is.

Mr. F. Strange.

20 April 1866.

1581. Can they obtain better refreshments there than they can in the audience part of the house, or what is the object with which they go to the canteen; they do not get better drink?—I cannot say what their object is. If they come and ask for a pass, I say, "What do you expect to see?" they say, "I should like to go down;" then I say, "Well, I will pass you down; I have no objection."

1582. Can you give the Committee any opinion of your own with regard to the probable object which those 30 or 40 gentlemen may have in going down into that room of an evening?—No doubt their object is to go down to see the girls.

1583. Do you think that that is an advantageous system to encourage?—I do not think there is any harm in it.

1584. Can they see any of the performance in that room?—No.

1585. Nor hear the singing?—Not a note.

1586. How is the canteen situated with regard to the stage?—It is away from the stage.

1587. Not under it?—No.

1588. There is an entrance into it from the auditorium, I suppose?—Yes.

1589. A pass-door?—Yes, a stage-door.

1590. Has that always been there?—The door was always there.

1591. Is the canteen open during the morning performance?—Yes, I am bound to open it, because it is for the staff of the establishment.

1592. Is the pass-door open during the morning performance?—Yes.

1593. Do you admit gentlemen during the morning performance?—If they asked me, I should admit them.

1594. Have they ever asked you to be admitted during the morning performance?—No, I think not; I do not remember.

1595. How many police have you employed at the hall, as a rule, every night?—I used to employ a great many; I only employ three, or four, or five now.

1596. What do you pay them?—Really, I forget; I have a bill sent in every week from Scotland-yard. I do not pay the police personally; I send the money to the Yard; I think it is about 3*s.* a night for each man.

1597. Do they have any gratuity from you independent of that?—No, I have never given them anything whatever.

1598. Have any of your people done so?—No; I generally give them a glass of beer at night when the hall is closed. The men are so often changed that it would not be worth while giving them anything.

1599. You have given us a return with regard to the number of women of the town who attend your hall, and you say that there are about 100 a night?—Yes, about that.

1600. I asked you at the last sitting of the Committee on Monday last, about the number of artizans and their families who attend; have you considered the question since?—No.

1601. You cannot give me any more information on that point?—No. I only know that, as to the stalls and the enclosure of the hall, none of those women go there; those are all respectable people.

1602. Is there any re-admission to the hall during the course of the evening?—No.

1603. There is no re-admission to anybody?—Not one.

1604. Those are your orders?—Yes. If you wanted to go outside for a moment, and spoke to the man at the door, he would re-admit you.

1605. But you have given orders for no re-admission?—Yes; it is quite an exceptional case.

1606. Do you ever satisfy yourself that those orders are fulfilled?—I think they are. I should hear of it if they were not fulfilled.

1607. Of course you adhere to the answer which you gave on a former occasion, that there are no free admissions whatever to the hall?—None whatever.

1608. Do you think that there could be free admissions without your knowledge?—No. I do not mean to say I never give away admissions.

1609. A statement was made that women of the town were allowed to go into the hall without paying?—That I distinctly deny.

1610. Could it happen that those women could go to any part of the hall free, without your knowledge?—No.

1611. What check have you on your door-keeper?—We see the tickets every morning. If he passed women in without any ticket, I could have no check.

1612. But I suppose that that could not go on to any extent without your knowledge?—It could not be carried on to any extent.

1613. Mr. Lusk.] You are the proprietor, or representative of the proprietors, of the Alhambra?—I am managing director of the Alhambra Palace Company at this moment.

1614. How many people do you employ?—About 360 at this time.

1615. How much wages do you pay per week?—The pay sheet was 490 l. last Saturday.

1616. Do you call your occupation a profession or a business?—I hardly know.

1617. I mean those whom you employ?—The professionals generally call themselves "artists."

1618. Have you and your professionals any grievances with regard to the present law?—Only the thing that we have been fighting for the last year or two.

1619. What is the real grievance of which you complain?—I have been summoned three times; and I have gained my cause each time; but I have had to pay my expenses, which have been about 1,000 l. or 2,000 l.; and I stand to be shot at even now.

1620. But what, in two or three words, is your real grievance?—It is said that we can only do singing at the music halls; but I am doing ballets and dancing; the music halls are supposed not to be allowed to do such things on the stage.

1621. If that restriction were removed, would it be better for your professionals?—It would be better for everybody; very much better for the public.

1622. But I speak to you now as the representative of a class; would it be better for your profession if that grievance was removed?—I do not know that it would be any better for the people employed on the establishment, but it would open up a kind of new entertainment; it would do away with the niggers and tumblers, and all that sort of performance a great deal.

1623. But with regard to those 300 people whom you employ, the grievance, whatever it is, must fall upon them in the last instance?—Yes.

1624. Would it be better for those people who live live by that occupation if that grievance was removed?—It would be better for all the music people and the ladies of the ballet, but some other members of the establishment might suffer.

1625. In what respects would it be better if that grievance was removed?—Simply that all the music halls would open up a new entertainment. Since the ballet has been out at the Alhambra, I think I may say that 20 per cent. has been added to the girls' wages.

1626. It would improve their wages?—Yes.

1627. It is generally supposed that if people improve their wages they improve their circumstances in other respects, is it not?—When a commodity is scarce, it always fetches a high price.

1628. Do you think it would improve the article you dispose of, if you had more liberty?—Certainly.

1629. You could put on a better article at as cheap a price?—Yes, and at a cheaper price perhaps.

1630. You could give the public a better entertainment at a cheaper price, if you had full liberty?—Certainly.

1631. What is your reason for thinking so?—I am quite sure it could be done; I am speaking more particularly of little comic operettas and things of that kind that could be done.

1632. You have spoken of the taste of the public being changed, what was it you referred to; how is their taste changing?—I think that their taste is changing in this way; we have now 35 music halls in London, and they are always crowded.

1633. You think that people prefer to go to music halls?—They like to do that, and have a lounge and smoke a cigar.

1634. In preference to going to a theatre?—Yes, I think so.

1635. The theatres have been all here for the last 20 years, and there has been no change in them, while the population has been increasing?—We want a new Act of Parliament. The present Act of Parliament is the most absurd Act which was ever made in the world; everybody at the Alhambra at this moment is liable to be locked up for being there for some unlawful purpose.

1636. Can you account to me how it is that for the last 25 years there have been 25 theatres in London with no change, while the population has almost doubled, and yet you have this large number of music saloons?—I cannot account for that; I cannot understand it. I suppose they were all satisfied with what they got, so long as the houses were filled.

1637. But how is it that there was no increased demand for theatres corresponding with the increase of population?—We have one new theatre building in Holborn.

1638. One in 25 years is nothing, I suppose?—It is not much.

1639. If you had more liberty, you say you could produce a better article?—Yes, a far better article.

1640. Do you mean better literature?—I do not wish to produce a much better article than I am now producing, but I do not know at any moment that I am not to be summoned.

1641. Do you think that you could improve the taste of the people, if you had more liberty?—I have done that already.

1642. But take it generally?—Judging from my own establishment, you can see what I have brought that to by making an alteration.

1643. Would it, in your opinion, develope the talent of literary men who produce pieces for the public entertainment?—There is no doubt about it.

1644. You think that would be most desirable?—I think so.

1645. You think that the restriction lies heavy on literature and the profession altogether?—Yes.

1646. It is something like a stone in a flower bed?—Quite so.

1647. Sir Arthur Buller]. You are afraid of this phrase, "stage plays," hanging over your head?—I am.

1648. I understand you to say if you had the fullest liberty you would never dream of interfering with Shakesperian performances, for instance?—Certainly not.

1649. It would be impossible, in fact, in that large room, with all the noise and the clink of glasses going on, to hear a long dialogue?—Impossible; the proper things at the Alhambra would be things to be seen and not heard.

1650. Even burlesques full of punning could hardly be done at the Alhambra to much purpose?—They must be very short.

1651. You would clearly not interfere with the theatres with regard to the great plays?—Certainly not.

1652. And in all probability not in regard to those burlesques which are full of punning?—Very short things perhaps, but not long things certainly, not more than 20 minutes.

1653. Could you say, of your own knowledge, whether the attendance at the theatres in pit and gallery has fallen off lately?—I cannot answer that question; I have heard so.

1654. About that canteen which you have at the Alhambra, I understand that you made that expressly for the use of the persons employed in your theatre?—Yes.

1655. For the use of the women as well as the men?—Yes.

1656. That is the only place they can go to?—That is the only place they can go to, except their dressing rooms.

1657. It is laborious work which they have to do, dancing three times a night?—Yes, but they like it.

1658. It is a natural thing for them to have refreshments, and, in plain language, they must have it?—Yes.

1659. They formerly had it brought in from outside?—Yes, or they went out for it.

1660. It was to avoid those inconvenient absences, and those inconvenient presences on the other hand, that you invented this canteen?—Yes.

1661. You were asked whether any payment was ever made at the door by strangers going into that canteen?—No, never.

1662. Could a stranger by offering any sum of money get in there?—I do not think that if a person offered a 10*l.* note he would get in there.

1663. You were asked if any free passes were given to women; of course it is very possible that people might come in without your knowing it; they might evade your orders?—There may be such a thing, but there is not much of it.

1664. But it would be rather a dangerous thing for the man who is stationed to collect the tickets if you were to find it out?—He would be dismissed immediately.

20 April 1866.

1665. I observe that in this printed statement concerning the Alhambra you say that the Alhambra has 14 constables of its own, is that a mistake of a figure?—At one time I had more than 14, but I have reduced them very much.

1666. You now employ no more than you want?—Just so; I had 12 constables for a long time, but it is not requisite to have so many.

1667. Do you find that you have a sufficient number to keep order?—Quite so.

1668. With regard to the gentlemen whom you allow to pass through to the canteen, I suppose you do it in the same way that people used to go behind the scenes at the opera?—Precisely; the only difference is that they go to this canteen instead of going behind the stage.

1669. Those ballet girls do not stop long in the canteen, I suppose?—They have not time, and they cannot stop.

1670. Mr. Selwin.] You say that this is in the same way as people used to go behind the scenes at the opera houses and theatres?—Yes.

1671. Are you aware whether they do so or not at this moment?—Yes; there is not a theatre or opera in London where gentlemen are not allowed on the stage.

1672. You think that it is a common practice?—I am sure it is; it is well understood; Mr. Gye would pass his friends in.

1673. But would the public generally, on application, be passed in?—No, perhaps Mr. Gye would not make it as public as I do; I admit that.

1674. It is generally supposed that that license of passing behind the scenes which did exist, was to some extent given up in consequence of public opinion?—I have not heard lately about that.

1675. You say that the only object that you can imagine which makes those gentlemen come there, is the society of those young ladies?—I cannot see what else they come for; they stand there sometimes when it is so hot that I would not stand there for 10 l.; it is fit to bake them.

1676. That view is confirmed by their not coming in the morning?—Yes; there are very few in the morning.

1677. You are responsible for the good conduct of the establishment, and for keeping it, as nearly as possible, what it should be?—Yes, I am quite sure that their conduct is proper while they are there; but you may make appointments at Church, any Sunday morning, or anywhere else.

1678. Are you frequently present in the evening?—Perhaps twice in the evening; I have always one of my officers there.

1679. As you cannot be cognisant of everything, would your officers report if anything wrong took place?—Yes; I had a man taken out of the canteen and put into the street once.

1680. Your officer is sufficiently independent of the people there, to be certain to report to you any irregularities that took place?—Yes.

1681. Mr. Powell.] How many girls dress in the same dressing-room?—It all depends on the number employed; I should think, perhaps, 20 at the present moment.

1682. Have they fires in their dressing-rooms to dress by?—No, there are no fires.

1683. Have the girls plenty of chairs to sit upon, and other arrangements necessary for their comfort?—They have everything they require.

1684. Supposing a girl going through the fatigues of the evening was anxious to have tea or coffee, would she have it in the dressing room?—She could send one of the dressers to the canteen to get it.

1685. Is the practice adopted?—Yes, it is adopted.

1686. But not to any extent, I suppose?—No, the girls have not much money to spend.

1687. Perhaps the girls get the refreshments cheaper in the canteen by going themselves than they would if those refreshments were brought to the dressing-rooms?—Yes, I think that is very likely.

1688. I suppose that the gentlemen who visit the canteen treat those girls?—Very likely.

1689. Can you give the Committee any idea how long it takes a girl to become a fair average stage dancer?—I cannot.

1690. Have you no idea?—Not the slightest.

1691. How many hours a day are they occupied by rehearsals?—Perhaps two hours when we are getting up a new ballet; but once got up, there is an end of it; we have had no rehearsals since Christmas.

1692. When once it is fairly put on the stage, the moment the ballet is well known to the ladies, the performers have the entire day at their own command?—Yes.

1693. Do you think that they earn money by tailoring and some other occupations during the day?—Some of them do.

1694. Should you consider that an exceptional mode of spending the day, or the custom?—I see so little of them, except when they are about their business, that I could not answer that question.

1695. You do inquire with regard to the manner in which they spend their leisure hours?—No.

1696. If it came to your knowledge that a girl was a loose character, would you conceive that any reason for dismissing her, if she did her duty on the stage?—If I heard that a girl was a common prostitute, or anything of that kind, I should dismiss her.

1697. In fact, if you thought that being a dancer on your stage was not done so much for the sake of dancing as for the sake of following another calling, you would dismiss such a girl?—If it was so represented to me, I should.

1698. Should you exercise any vigilance in these matters?—I have done so; some of the girls have been discharged on that account, but not many, perhaps five or six in a year.

1699. Would the circumstance of some being discharged act as a check on the others?—I think so.

1700. You carry your vigilance to such a length as that?—Yes; if the ballet mistress told me that a girl was not a proper girl to be on the stage, she is discharged immediately, and I have no doubt that has some effect on the others.

1701. Do you exercise any vigilance over the character of the females who attend the stalls?—None of the ladies attend the stalls.

1702. But there are female attendants at the bars?—Yes.

1703. Do you exercise any vigilance over the character of the females who keep the bars?—No, we cannot do that; I have never found any lady at the bars misbehave herself.

1704. You have no reason to suppose from their dress or demeanour, that they are ill-conducted girls?—Not the slightest.

1705. You have never seen anything in their conduct, conduct, while at the bars, to lead any person with common sense and knowledge of the world, to suspect that they have another object beyond being your servants?—No.

1706. Would the same observation apply to the ladies of the ballet?—They are not allowed to come in front of the house at all.

1707. Having heard the questions I have put to you, and having answered them, have you any further remarks to make with regard to the character and conduct of the ballet girls?—I think that the ballet girls are thought to be very much worse than they are; if you were to put 100 ballet girls on one side of the room, and 100 of any other kind of women on the other side, I think that the 100 ballet girls will come out as well as the other 100; I believe they are put down very much worse than they are; I have found they are, many of them, highly educated and respectable, good girls; there are of course a few bad ones, but in my ballet there are some very highly educated women.

1708. Sir Arthur Buller.] To use a phrase which is incidentally significant just now, they are "the same flesh and blood as all other women?"—Yes.

1709. Mr. Powell.] Were you in a Committee room, on Monday, when we had evidence with regard to the girls employed on pit banks and collieries?—No, I was not.

1710. Lord Eustace Cecil.] There are special temptations which every class is liable to?—True.

1711. I observe that in one answer that you gave, you said that nobody would be admitted behind the scenes, not even for a 10 l. note?—No.

1712. Is the price of admission behind the scenes over 10 l.?—No, there is no price whatever.

1713. We know that gentlemen who have a great deal of money, if they have a fancy, will pay any sum to indulge it?—I only remember one case of payment being made, and that was when one of the check-takers, who, I thought, was the best man I had, received 5 l. from a man to take him downstairs.

1714. Mr. Locke.] You mean that a man would not for 10 l. run the risk of being discharged?—That is it; I only know of that one case.

1715. Mr. Powell.] Have you any turntable, so that you can know by the mechanical action of the table how many persons come into your place of entertainment?—There is no turntable; I know by the checks.

1716. But you have no checks, such as they have at the South Kensington Museum?—No.

1717. Do you see any reason why there should not be such a check?—No; but the public generally do not like them.

1718. But if you had a check of that kind you would be able to ascertain whether any admissions took place contrary to your wishes?—Yes; but it would be very awkward; I am in and out 20 times in a night, and a lot of officials go in and out.

1719. Should you consider that closing the canteen to the public would be an injury to the speculation of the Alhambra?—Not the slightest.

1720. Are you aware that during last year, or the year before, when it was said that gentlemen were admitted behind the scenes at the theatres, the managers of the theatres entirely denied that that was the custom?—It always has been the case.

1721. Have you had a conference with the managers of other music halls?—Never.

1722. There is no association of managers of music halls, is there?—There is an association of managers of music halls, but I have never attended their meetings, although I am a member.

1723. Do you think it would be possible for the gentlemen who conduct the music halls to put before the Committee any result of their deliberations which might be useful?—I am not aware; I never had any meetings with the managers in any way; I know nothing of their movements.

1724. You have stated the grievance under which you labour; can you, assuming the affirmative rather than the negative side, suggest an amendment of the law?—I can suggest an amendment of the law; we think that the whole thing thrown open would suit better than anything else.

1725. Subject to police or magisterial supervision?—Certainly you must have some officer.

1726. Should you object to a superintendence over the performances on the stage by the Lord Chamberlain?—I think that all performances ought to be licensed, to see that they are properly conducted.

1727. Considering the great variety of performances which take place at the music halls, and the great number of songs sung, and the light character of many of the pieces, and the nature of those pieces, do you think it would be possible for one authority to exercise supervision over them all?—Certainly; with sufficient officers.

1728. That would not obstruct your speculation?—Not the slightest.

1729. Should you object to this being an authority, arbitrary in theory, but practically subject, as all other authorities in England are, to public opinion controlling every ballet you put on the stage?—I should not object to that in the slightest degree whatever. I think that the Alhambra ballets are very modest indeed.

1730. Mr. Locke.] Their petticoats are rather longer than they are at any of the other theatres, are they not?—Yes, they are.

1731. What you contended for last year was the freedom of putting performances on the stage which, by the 6th & 7th Victoria, "The Dramatic Licensing Act," you were doubtful whether you were permitted to do or not legally?—Yes.

1732. To what extent would you wish us to go in putting performances on the stage?—I should like to be able to do ballet, duologue, pantomimes, and operas. Shakespeare's plays we should not care about; as a matter of course it would be no use.

1733. But you would like to be able to play anything that would be profitable?—Everything that would be profitable.

1734. Do you see any reason why, simply because you have refreshments in music halls, you should not be able to put on the stage those performances which would be agreeable to the audience?—No, I see no objection; we ought to be able to suit all classes of the public.

1735. You think that the taste of the audience should regulate the performance on the stage, provided there is nothing indecorous?—I do.

1736. Mr. Du Cane.] You say that the pieces which you would wish to give must be very short?—Yes.

1737. Is that because your audience is constantly changing?—A moving audience will not stand to listen to anything that lasts a long time.

Mr. F. Strange.

20 April 1866.

If my selections last more than 20 minutes they get a little tired.

1738. You have no idea of the average time that any one person would remain in the course of the evening?—In the centre of the house, the stalls, where the families go, they come in early and stop till it is over; the enclosure is generally filled the whole of the time.

1739. I understand your wish to be that it should be lawful for you to give operatic performances, ballet, and pantomime? — Yes; and duologue.

1740. But you have no wish, at this present time, to interfere with the drama?—Not the slightest.

1741. Is that because you find the public taste is at the present time more in favour of operatic music and ballet performances, than Shakespeare and the drama?—You could not get the people to be quiet enough, because they walk about and talk.

1742. If it was lawful to do so, and you found that the public taste changed, and that there was a great wish for Shakespearian representations, if it paid you, you would put it on the stage, I suppose?—Yes, I should do it immediately.

1743. You would not, then, have any hesitation in competing with the theatres?—No; I should attempt it directly, if I thought it would pay.

1744. Mr. Lusk.] You have mentioned that you would have no objection to competing with the theatres in acting plays?—Yes.

1745. And that you would like to see it thrown open altogether?—Yes.

1746. Do you mean without any license?—No; what I mean is, that I should like to see the thing thrown open, so that the music halls could do the same as the theatres.

1747. But you would not like to see it thrown open without a license?—No, I should like it to be under the same license.

1748. Would it inconvenience you in your profession if there was anybody to look over your pieces to see how you put them on the stage?—Not the slightest.

1749. You would not be afraid of that at all?—Not at all.

1750. That surveillance would not injure you if the thing was morally and properly put on the stage?—Not at all.

1751. Lord Ernest Bruce.] You close every night at 12 o'clock, at the Alhambra, do you not?—We close at a quarter before 12 o'clock.

1752. But you have no positive order to close at that hour?—No.

1753. That is because you think it right to close at that time?—Yes, my license allows me to keep open till 1 o'clock.

1754. But you close as near 12 o'clock as you can, and, I suppose, you close earlier on Saturday nights?—Yes, the house is always cleared before 12 o'clock of Saturday nights.

1755. Do you find that on any particular night in the week you have more crowded audiences?—We get more of the lower class of people on Saturday than on any other night; the 6*d.* place is fuller on those nights, but there is not much difference elsewhere.

1756. And on Monday, I suppose?—Yes, to that particular part of the house.

1757. Because theatrical people tell me that Monday night is the great night?—Saturday night is the greatest night with me.

1758. Chairman.] Have you any further observations to address to the Committee?—No, I think not.

William Henry Bodkin, Esq., Examined.

W. H. Bodkin, Esq.

1759. Mr. Locke.] You are Assistant Judge for Middlesex?—Yes.

1760. How long have you filled that position?—About seven years.

1761. I suppose that very few persons have had more experience than you have had with regard to questions of licensing?—I have had very considerable experience for the last 30 or 40 years.

1762. I believe there are more cases of licensing before the Middlesex bench than any other?—Certainly.

1763. You have had great experience on the licensing day for public houses, which, I believe, is in March?—Yes.

1764. And the licensing for music and dancing is in October?—Yes. With regard to licensing public houses, I have never interfered with that except when the parties have appealed, and then they come to my court.

1765. You have never been on the licensing session?—No, never.

1766. But you sit as judge when appeals come from the session?—Yes.

1767. On appeals in Middlesex, do all the magistrates decide the question, or do you sit alone?—All who are not respondent justices have a voice; I speak now of public house licenses only.

1768. That is different from your jurisdiction at Dover, I suppose, where you are Recorder?—I have nothing to do with the licensing there, except there is an appeal.

1769. Which there never is, I suppose?—Never.

1770. In all appeals, as Recorder, you are the only judge to decide, are you not?—Yes, but there is a decision that the Recorder is not to hear appeals against the refusal of licenses for public houses; it goes to the county sessions.

1771. But in other appeals the Recorder is the sole judge, I suppose?—Yes.

1772. Is that so with regard to other appeals in Middlesex?—I am not the sole judge in Middlesex; any magistrate attending has a concurrent jurisdiction.

1773. With regard to those appeals in public house licenses, and music and dancing licenses, the whole bench of magistrates in Middlesex are judges to decide on appeals with the exception of those appealed against?—With regard to the music licenses granted in October; I very seldom attend on those occasions, and there is no appeal against the refusal of a music license.

1774. And in quarter session, you decide on that?—Yes.

1775. Consequently there would be no appeal from the quarter sessions to the quarter sessions?—Just so.

1776. But with regard to the public houses, it is an appeal from a smaller body to a fuller body of licensing magistrates?—Yes.

1777. Have music and dancing licenses for some years been easily obtained in the metropolis at the Middlesex Sessions?—I have never seen any objection which did not appear to me to be well founded; a good many applications for dancing are refused. The magistrates were not aware until the last eight or nine years that they could grant a license for music only, but they took an opinion on the subject, and they now do it.

1778. Whether that opinion which they took is right or not has never been decided in a superior court?—Never.

1779. At all events, in consequence of that opinion the magistrates have acted, and they have no difficulty in doing so, because they can always refuse the license?—Yes.

1780. Therefore, if the applicant does not please to be contented with music only, they will not give him a license at all?—I have never heard the doctrine questioned.

1781. But, however, the magistrates do exercise their discretion in that matter?—Yes.

1782. Have you any experience with regard to the manner in which the music halls are conducted?—Not from personal observation.

1783. But you would know that from questions arising before the magistrates from any petition from the inhabitants, and so on against the renewal of their license next year?—Yes.

1784. Judging from those petitions, what is your opinion with regard to the mode in which the music halls are conducted?—It is a still higher question whether they ought to be licensed at all, according to the present interpretation put on the license. This Committee would I think have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the present state of the law should be changed.

1785. But I am now speaking merely of the mode in which they have been conducted?—We have assertions and counter assertions before us, but there is very seldom any serious contest raised. The magistrates are in the habit of going and seeing those places, and exercising their own discretion with regard to the license.

1786. What is your opinion with regard to the present state of the law?—I have watched the progress of these things for many years: it is curious to observe the manner in which the present state of things has arisen. If you start with the 25th George the 2nd, which is the foundation of this matter, you see that it is a statute totally inapplicable to the present day, but it permitted the magistrates to grant licenses for music and dancing conjointly, which they now separate. Under that statute for a long time such was the anomalous condition of those things that all the minor theatres had only those music licenses to sanction their performances. I remember very well when I was a young man seeing a man at the pianoforte just running his hand over the keys for the purpose of turning that which was in truth a dramatic performance into a musical performance, and so the law was evaded. Then on the motion of Mr. Duncombe, an inquiry took place which led to the passing of the late Act, and the placing of those theatres all under the control of the Lord Chamberlain.

1787. The case then was, that the only places that had the privilege of acting plays were Covent-garden, Drury-lane, and the Haymarket?—Yes.

1788. Did the other places perform under a music and dancing license only?—Yes.

1789. Those theatres were very much discontented?—Yes, of course; they were liable to penalties, and there were constant endeavours made to enforce the penalties against them.

1790. There was the case of the Victoria Theatre?—Yes.

1791. That was a very important case, was it not?—Yes. The statute to which I allude is the 6th and 7th of Victoria, which I have no doubt has been before the Committee.

1792. Then, since that time, as you say, the music halls have sprung up?—Yes, in a strange way. Under that power to grant music licenses, constant appeals were made to the Bench for music and dancing licenses. They were put on the growing taste for music, and that persons, particularly in the eastern part of the town, were addicted to dancing, and, on the other hand, it was said that a man could not have music or singers at a public dinner. And then it was said too, that in some religious ceremonies, Jews' marriages, and so on, music was needed, and on those pretences, from time to time, licenses were extended to public-houses, and I think unfortunately; but that was so. Then, whether from change of taste or not, the springing up of those music halls began by granting a license to public-houses by the men finding that music attracted a good many customers. A man built a large room behind his house, and others, seeing that room was so very well attended, followed, and then we had those magnificent places built.

1793. You recollect the "Eagle Tavern," I presume?—Yes.

1794. What license had they in the first place? Only the music license.

1795. Now they have the Lord Chamberlain's license?—Yes.

1796. What difference does it make with regard to that place now?—They perform dramatic pieces.

1797. Did they do that before under the music and dancing license?—It was by stealth, if they did so, by evading the law.

1798. They called those places saloons, did they not?—Yes, they called them saloons.

1799. But under the music and dancing license they did perform dramatic pieces?—Yes.

1800. The late Mr. Robson originally came out there, did he not?—I do not know.

1801. And some of the very first actors. That was under a music and dancing license, in a place where they had refreshments in front of the stage?—Yes; but a few years back the theatre was separated.

1802. You have had one case before you recently, against Mr. Strange of the Alhambra; have you not?—Yes.

1803. That case was brought before your bench of magistrates?—Yes.

1804. In what form was that?—He was brought before one of the police magistrates, and he was convicted, and he appealed against the conviction; that was tried in my court.

1805. What was that conviction?—It was a penalty for performing stage plays without a license.

1806. Was that under the 6th and 7th of Victoria?—Yes, under the 6th and 7th of Victoria.

1807. What did you do with that conviction?—We quashed the conviction. It is right to say that since that time the same police magistrate has had another complaint made against Mr. Strange by the same parties, who are understood to represent the patent theatres, and the magistrate said, "Whatever my opinion may be, as the quarter sessions has decided that I am wrong, I will not not convict;" but he gave a case for the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas, with regard to his refusing to convict, and the Court of Common Pleas refused to interfere with his decision; that is the state of the law now.

20 April 1866.

1808. That is very unsatisfactory, is it not?—It is very unsatisfactory.

1809. It is a matter of opinion, you would say, to what extent restrictions should be taken off the music halls with regard to their performances?—I should say that I should like the state of things for which they were originally built restored; music halls to be music halls, and theatres to be theatres.

1810. But when they were in the old state they acted plays?—Yes, in evasion of the law.

1811. You would have them acting plays again, would you?—No, I would not; I anticipate that the legislature means to interfere, and to put them on a proper footing.

1812. What should that footing be in your opinion?—You have not found any witness, nor will you find one, who can define a "stage play." In the Court of Common Pleas, it was stated by the judges that the line where music ended and dramatic performance began, was extremely difficult to discover, therefore I should shut it out entirely.

1813. But it was "a performance of the stage;" those were the words you decided on?—Yes; there is an interpretation clause, which is to tell you what stage plays mean.

1814. Tragedy, comedy, farce, and so on?—Everything.

1815. Will you mention what those words are?—It is the 23d section of the 6th & 7th Victoria, chapter 68: "And be it enacted, that, in this Act, the word stage play shall be taken to include every tragedy, comedy, farce, opera, burletta, interlude, melodrama, pantomime, or other entertainment of the stage, or any part thereof."

1816. Are you aware that burletta was introduced into that Act of Parliament for the first time?—It is very probable.

1817. That section, you see, embraces everything?—Yes.

1818. Previously to the passing of this Act, I believe, those minor theatres, as they were called, had played burlettas, and a question arose whether they had the right to do so or not?—Yes; it was contended before us that what they did at Mr. Strange's place was a burletta, and we thought it was not; but in giving that judgment, we said that we thought that if our judgment would cause any public inconvenience it was a matter for the legislature to interfere with.

1819. In a Bill which was brought in by me last session, entitled, "A Bill to amend the Law relating to Theatres and other Places of Public Amusement," by the 9th clause it is proposed to declare that, "The term stage play for purposes of this Act includes every tragedy, comedy, farce, burlesque, opera, burletta, interlude, melodrama, pantomime, ballet, and other entertainment of the stage, and every oratorio, and every other piece, composition, or entertainment, dramatic, scenic, lyrical, or musical (not being merely instrumental), acted, sung, or presented, and whether by way of dialogue, monologue, or otherwise, and whether accompanied or not with any special dresses, scenery, or other accessories." Now, I suppose you would allow the music halls to play something?—I would allow the music halls to play music; what they have now as a stage, I should have as an orchestra.

1820. You would not allow anybody to sing? Singing is music; vocal and instrumental.

1821. Would you allow them to have dresses?—No, I should consider it a mere concert; that was the original intention.

1822. Do you not think that things have very much changed since then?—Things have very much changed, whether rightly or wrongly.

1823. Are you aware how many music halls there are?—There are a great number, no doubt; but I am aware they obtained their licenses under the representation that it was to encourage the science of music; it was never said that they were to perform theatrical entertainments, or anything approaching it.

1824. But the music halls having done it, and the people liking to go and see it, do you see any reason why those people should not be permitted to enjoy themselves?—That is a question for the Legislature.

1825. But, in your opinion, provided they conduct themselves with propriety, is there any reason why they should not be permitted to enjoy themselves in that way?—I think that the public demand for entertainments of this kind has increased considerably; I know that there are refreshments and smoking while the entertainment is proceeding; that is so; but really I do not see that morality is advanced by a man's seeing women dance half naked on the stage, and then go downstairs to join the audience.

1826. But do you consider that a woman in flesh-coloured tights is naked?—I said half naked.

1827. What part of the figure then should you say was half naked?—I do not want to go into particulars; we all know what is meant.

1828. You have been to the Alhambra, I suppose?—No.

1829. You are not aware whether the ballet dancers at the Alhambra are more or less "naked," to use your own expression, than the dancers at the opera?—They are much about the same I suppose, but then the opera is to amuse quite a different class of people.

1830. Do you think that the ballet at the opera tends to foster immorality?—I have no opinion to offer, but it is a very different section of the public which attends the opera.

1831. You think that the higher classes can take care of their own morals?—Yes.

1832. And that there should be legislation to guard the morals of poor people?—I think so.

1833. Do you think that poor people do not know what they are about as well as rich people do?—I do not lay down any general rule on the subject.

1834. Why should not one man who has not so much money as another man have an opportunity of seeing a ballet if he likes?—I do not know; I give no opinion about that; I only know that cases frequently come before me of a crime that is now very much on the increase, I mean the crime of embezzlement, robbing employers; and I find that the young men are very much induced to get into these difficulties through attending cheap places of amusements of this kind.

1835. Would you say, then that because some young men committed crime for that purpose there should be no such places?—No, I do not say say that; but the nature of such unhappy cases cannot be overlooked.

1836. But you would not deny, what is always understood, that there is no virtue except in rising superior to temptation?—I would put as little temptation as possible in the way of everybody.

1837. What would you reduce the "temptation" to in this case?—To mere music.

1838. Would you allow music halls to have a small opera?—No, certainly not.

1839. Would you allow them to dress the singers?—No; that would be turning it into a dramatic performance.

1840. You would reduce it to a concert?—Yes; and grant any number of licenses you please.

1841. You think, perhaps, that people would not stop at such places very long, if that was the only performance?—That is a matter of taste; I do not know.

1842. A great many people entertain the notion that a regular old English concert is about the dullest performance that can possibly be produced, do they not?—Some people may think so; but I believe the concerts given in the metropolis are very well attended.

1843. But are they not attended by a very high and dry sedate kind of people?—They are attended by others of a lower degree also.

1844. But if some persons do not like that form of pleasure, and if they do not interfere with other people, why should they not enjoy themselves in their own way?—That is a matter of opinion.

1845. It is my duty to ask you what suggestion you would propose to make towards any alteration of the law that may be decided on?—The alteration that I would suggest is, that all theatrical performances should be under the control of the Lord Chamberlain, as they have hitherto been.

1846. Do you mean that that should apply to the whole country, or merely to the metropolis?—I speak of the metropolis; and I think that the music halls should be licensed by the magistrates; that the license should, in the first instance, be given by the magistrates in petty sessions, who are likely to know the districts, with a power of appeal to the quarter sessions against either the grant or the refusal to grant the license.

1847. Are the Committee to understand that you uphold that curious principle, "the wants of the neighbourhood?"—The magistrates residing in the district would know better the nature of the building for which the license is sought.

1848. And "the wants of the neighbourhood?"—I do not know about the wants of the neighbourhood particularly.

1849. But that is the great bone of contention, is it not?—It is with regard to public-house licenses; but not as to the music licenses, I think.

1850. It would be absurd to have that restriction with regard to a music license, inasmuch as people come from distant places to the "neighbourhood?"—Yes, no doubt. Highbury Barn is out of town, almost, and "the wants of the neighbourhood" would be that it should be swept away.

1851. Mr. Pownall, the chairman of the Middlesex magistrates, was wrong, then, if he said that you ever acted on the principle of "the wants of the neighbourhood," with regard to music halls?—My own experience does not satisfy me that that should be an element in the question, except the place was likely to be a nuisance.

1852. That would apply to the theatres in the same way, most of them being in the same localities as the music halls?—Yes.

1853. Covent-garden, Drury-lane, and so on, are all in the same neighbourhoods?—They are not to supply the wants of the neighbourhood.

1854. They are to supply the wants of the inhabitants of the metropolis?—Yes.

1855. Probably it is more convenient to have most of them round about the same spot?—Yes, no doubt.

1856. Is there anything which you would wish to add to your evidence?—I think that, in consequence of what I have heard since I have been sitting in this room, with regard to the canteen, and the visits paid by men, and the introduction of some of the ballet dancers into that room, I ought to add, that it recalls to my recollection a case which came before me once from the neighbourhood of Covent-garden; it was a place which had a music and dancing license; and they had poses plastiques, and had ballets of women there in a demi-nude state; they drank with the men who went there, and at last it became so horribly disgusting that the police interfered, and it was put down.

1857. Was that in Leicester-square?—No; it was at a place called the "Cider Cellars," in Maiden-lane, Covent-garden.

1858. That was where Porson first took the chair, was it not?—I do not know; very celebrated persons have been there, no doubt.

1859. Very celebrated persons used to take the chair there in former days; a gentleman in our profession, who was attorney-general once, took the chair, did he not?—I do not know.

1860. But they had no poses plastiques then?—No.

1861. But you do not compare the ballet to poses plastiques, do you?—It is very much the same kind of thing.

1862. Have you seen Menken?—No.

1863. You have not been to Astley's theatre?—No.

1864. Are you aware that the performance there takes place with the sanction of the Lord Chamberlain?—I daresay it does, because he licenses all those places.

1865. I believe she is not what you would call "half naked" (I have never seen her), but what you would call "quite naked," or nearly so?—I cannot say.

1866. But if so, and if it be "immoral" that the female figure should be seen in ballet costume, or in a costume which exhibits even more of the outlines of the body, then it appears that there may be "immoralities" in theatres as well as in other places of entertainment?—No doubt.

1867. But do you not think that, with proper supervision and distinct rules laid down, it would be an advantage to give as much liberty as possible for the performance of play or opera in music halls?—I think you have then no alternative but to license those houses as theatres; they must be either concert rooms or theatres.

1868. If you license them as theatres you would put them under the Lord Chamberlain, or somebody?—Yes; under any proper authority.

1869. Then would there be any objection to people taking refreshments in the middle of the room, or anywhere else, under those circumstances?—If Parliament thought fit to authorise an extension of the number of theatres, so as to include all the music halls, it would be very difficult to withdraw that element.

W. H. Bodkin, Esq.
20 April 1866.

1870. You know, I presume, that the Lord Chamberlain's license to a theatre carries a spirit license with it?—It authorises the officers of Excise to give it.

1871. And the Excise Office give it as a matter of course?—They have no discretion.

1872. There is the opinion of Sir Fitzroy Kelly, that they are bound to do it?—Yes.

1873. Have you observed that any of those licensed theatres have refreshments at the back of the pit and in the pit?—I do not know; I believe it is the case that there is a counter or bar.

1874. For the sale of spirits and beer, and everything that persons who go there can desire?—Yes; but that is not like sitting down to a table.

1875. It is not so comfortable, but there is only the difference between sitting down and standing up?—No; but I should suppose that those who sit down at those tables are expected to call for something to drink, whereas in the other case it is optional.

1876. Have you been to those places in Paris?—Yes, to one or two of them.

1877. Have you been to the Café Chantant, where Theresa sings; everybody sits down at tables?—Yes.

1878. And in Germany it is the same thing, is it not?—No doubt.

1879. Of course it is necessary that the police should keep order; but if that is done is there any objection to those things, in your opinion, if people like it?—If you were to sanction everything that people like, you would have to sanction very widely.

1880. You must not license what would be inconvenient to other people; but what is the objection if that point be conceded?—I think I have already stated my objection.

1881. You would like to stick to the old system of licensing?—No; the magistrates might very properly be authorised to grant music licenses to the music halls, and that performance should be confined to music, and all theatrical entertainments should be under the Lord Chamberlain or some other authority.

1882. You have no objection to the Lord Chamberlain doing anything he pleases; he may license any place he likes for theatrical entertainments; it is the person who does it that makes the difference. You do not like the magistrates to act differently from what they have hitherto done?—That may appear to you inconsistent, but I do not see it. The Lord Chamberlain may license any house that Parliament may authorise him to license, and so may the magistrates.

1883. Are you aware that complaints have been made with regard to such places as the Beaumont Institution; you know that, I suppose, in the Mile End-road?—Yes.

1884. Are you aware that there are no refreshments there of any kind?—Yes.

1885. And that the Beaumont Institution would be liable to a penalty if they enacted one scene out of Shakspeare?—I daresay if they acted any theatrical or dramatic performance they would be liable to a penalty, if they had only a music license.

1886. But they have not what is called a publican's license?—No; Mr. Beaumont, who founded that institution, was a strong opponent of the junction of the two things, drinking and music.

1887. Has the manager of the Beaumont Institution ever, to your knowledge, made any complaints that they cannot have a dramatic performance on their stage?—I am not aware of any such complaints.

1888. However, if they were to put on the stage the dialogue between Brutus and Cassius, they would be liable to a penalty, in fact, that would come within that section of the 6th and 7th Victoria?—Yes; and so it would with regard to any other hall.

1889. Do you not think that some relaxation should be made in that respect?—If you want to hear Brutus and Cassius to advantage you can go to any of the theatres.

1890. Do you think that the theatre is the place where you could hear that to advantage?—Yes.

1891. Then you would say that persons who prefer to go and hear Mrs. Kemble read are demented?—No; that is quite a different matter.

1892. But they might have persons of that kind at the Beaumont Institution, or they might have two persons who could read very well a scene out of Shakspeare; and while they could not afford to have a full company to act a play, the performance might be a great deal better than any performance in a theatre?—All this merely shows again how difficult it is to draw the line.

1893. It being so difficult to draw the line, do you not think it would be a very good thing to rub out the line and leave the people to act what they please?—Speaking as an individual, I do not think so.

1894. You think that there is something objectionable, per se, in people acting plays?—No; I do not say that.

1895. Then what is your objection to rubbing out the line. I put to you the case of the Beaumont Institution; what objection is there that the Beaumont Institution should not, if they pleased, act a play?—I say that no music hall ought to be allowed to perform any dramatic entertainment whatever.

1896. Why not?—Because it is a departure from the object for which they were originally built, and it leads to that which, I think, is objectionable in the Alhambra, and places of that sort.

1897. You think whatever change may take place in society and the wants of the public, that nothing shall be in this year, 1866, applied to any other purpose than the object for which it was originally licensed?—I do not lay down any such absurd proposition.

1898. Then what is the proposition that you do lay down?—My opinion is, that the innovation on the part of the proprietors of music halls ought to be stayed; that they should be restricted to their original object, and that theatres should take charge of all dramatic performances; but if the wisdom of Parliament should think fit to say that all those places should become theatres, be it so.

1899. You think that Parliament having sanctioned that, it would be right?—No; Parliament does not always sanction what is right.

1900. But you mean to say that you think the law is so and so, and until the law is altered the music halls should not act plays?—Yes.

1901. But that if we choose to alter the law, they may do it?—That is for Parliament to decide.

1902. Lord Eustace Cecil.] You have stated that you would prefer two jurisdictions; that of the Lord Chamberlain and the magistrates; one to deal with stage plays and the other with music halls?—Yes.

1903. Would you lay down any regulations for their granting licenses or leave it entirely to the discretion of the Lord Chamberlain and the magistrates?—With regard to the Lord Chamberlain I give no opinion. He is a high officer, and I suppose, with his assistants, he would properly regulate such things. With regard to the magistrates at petty sessions, I think they should grant licenses (with such regulations as should tend to order and morality) to other places for dancing and music.

1904. You would leave that very much to the discretion of the magistrates?—Very much.

1905. Have you ever heard of a case in which the petty sessional magistrates have been unduly influenced; I mean in granting licenses from improper motives?—No, never; whenever any mistake has been committed by the magistrates below, I have found it corrected by the magistrates on appeal.

1906. But I mean as a matter of favoritism or any other consideration, private or public?—I think not.

1907. My question refers only to the music and dancing license?—Just so.

1908. In your long experience of the cases brought before the Middlesex Sessions, have you any reason to suppose that music halls are worse conducted than theatres, or that disturbances leading to crime are more frequent there than at theatres?—No, I am not aware that there is any other tendency to crime than naturally attaches to the congregation of a number of persons of both sexes, but you give dangerous facilities when you let the ballet girls go downstairs, and associate with men who go there for that purpose.

1909. The music halls are, as a rule, just as orderly as the theatres, are they not?—I do not say that they are not; with that exception.

1910. Do you recollect any trial before you, where the fact of there being private rooms at either music halls or theatres has ever been mentioned?—No, I have never known that.

1911. Nor at casinos or dancing places?—No, I do not recollect any instance.

1912. Would you be in favour of granting to literary institutions the power of giving entertainments, such as those given by Mr. and Mrs. German Read, and Mr. and Mrs. Howard Paul?—If they approached to the character of dramatic performances then they would come within my view of the matter, and I object, but if they were merely musical, of course then the magistrates' license would sanction them.

1913. You would make no exception of that kind?—No, I would leave it entirely to the magistrates' discretion.

1914. Of course, with regard to literary institutions, there is nothing like an excise license, so that they would almost come under a different category?—They would no doubt obtain the magistrates' license.

1915. You would not positively forbid it, but in any enactment you would leave it to the discretion of the magistrates?—Quite.

1916. Would you license places of every description, such as penny gaffs, or the judge and jury?—The judge and jury, from what I have heard of that sort of entertainment, requires no license.

1917. But, I suppose, that you would call that a dramatic performance?—I never heard it, but from the representations made to me it is like a private party meeting, and one assumes one character, and one another in conversation; there is no stage, I understand.

1918. I am told that people do appear there in wigs and gowns?—I have heard that there was a man who was called the chief baron.

1919. Mr. Du Cane.] I suppose, that you would wish, in any alteration of the law, to have the line where music ends, and a dramatic performance begins, very clearly defined?—It is the difficulty of defining the line that has induced me to suggest that it should be abolished.

1920. But would it not be better, in your opinion, to have it clearly and fully defined?—Music halls should be confined to music, in my opinion.

1921. You wish the music halls to be kept entirely for music, and theatres for dramatic performances?—I think so.

1922. In your opinion there should be no dancing, and no representation in any sort of costume at the music halls?—None.

1923. I believe you have said that you have known cases of young men committing crime from attending cheap places of amusement?—When young men have been convicted of crime before me, I have endeavoured to trace the cause of it, especially where those persons have borne a good character, with honest parents, and I have generally found it suggested that it was from attending those cheap places of entertainment; with regard to men of more mature age it was betting.

1924. You do not speak of the music halls, I presume, where ballet representations are going on?—Yes, I do.

1925. I suppose your argument is, that if you do not allow those places of entertainment to give operatic or dramatic performances, you divest them in a great measure of their attractions?—You may divest them of attractions that I think work injuriously.

1926. And by doing so, diminish the chance of such people attending?—That may be; the proprietors must look after that.

1927. Suppose there should be a greater demand than there is now for dramatic performances, are the Committee to understand that you would rather have the Lord Chamberlain's license for theatres than extend the license for dramatic performances to music halls?—Certainly.

1928. And that, you think, would be generally conducive to morality?—That is my opinion.

1929. Would you extend the authority of the Lord Chamberlain all through the metropolitan district, instead of in the boroughs only as it is at the present moment?—Yes; I think it would be an improvement to do so.

1930. But not beyond the metropolitan district?—No.

1931. How would you define the metropolitan district?—There are several boundaries under legislative authority; there would be no difficulty about that, I think.

1932. Mr. Clay.] You have stated that the great difficulty is to define the line which separates a musical entertainment from a theatrical entertainment?—Yes.

W. H. Bodkin, Esq.

20 April 1866.

1933. You would admit music from operas?—I would admit music of any kind.

1934. Such as duets and trios?—Yes.

1935. But no dressing or decoration?—Nothing dramatic.

1936. But the word "dramatic" wants explaining, does it not; what is your opinion of its definition?—Nothing scenic; nothing theatrical.

1937. Take a duet in Der Frieschutz; would you object to the singers coming on dressed as German jagers?—Yes. You may go on putting cases until you arrive at the old difficulty; one of the judges said that it was extremely difficult to say where music ended, and where a theatrical performance began.

1938. Your object is the prevention of immorality?—Yes.

1939. Would not that be equally accomplished by having one officer to superintend all those places?—Do you mean with different licenses?

1940. With different licenses or not, supposing they were legitimate places of entertainment?—I have no great predilection for licensing by magistrates, or any other persons in particular.

1941. Is not the real thing this, that you want one responsible person to look after the whole of those places?—I doubt whether it would be so well done.

1942. Do you think it is well done now?—Yes, it is.

1943. You have mentioned a case where the police were forced to interfere at last?—Yes.

1944. Would not that state of affairs be prevented by officers whose duty it would be to inspect those things?—Yes, a public officer would be in the same situation as an officer of police; but in that case which I have mentioned, the interference did not take place until the public called out so loudly against that abomination.

1945. There was then no officer whose business it was to inspect those things?—There were the police.

1946. But that was only done incidentally; they were not forced to visit those places?—No.

1947. Lord Ernest Bruce.] Do you remember the case of Cremorne Gardens, where there was an indictment brought by the proprietor against three or four young men rioting on the night of Epsom Races; you tried that case, I presume?—Yes.

1948. Has not Cremorne been better conducted on those nights ever since?—When the license is renewed, no complaints are brought forward against Cremorne Gardens.

1949. Since that case you mean?—None.

1950. I believe that one or two out of the four young men were convicted?—Yes; they were all convicted.

1951. In the case of Strange against Wigan, the Middlesex Bench decided against the magistrates who heard the case, and we quashed the conviction?—Yes.

1952. And the Court of Common Pleas supported us?—Yes, to some extent they did. The same parties complained again to the same magistrate, after our decision, of a new infraction of the law calling for a new penalty; the magistrates said, "these parties appealed to the Quarter Sessions, and they quashed the conviction; therefore I do not feel myself authorised, whatever my opinion may be, to convict again, but I will give a case for the Court of Common Pleas;" and when they went before the Court of Common Pleas, the Court said that they would not reverse the decision that the magistrate had arrived at, which was not to convict. That is the state of the law at present.

1953. Mr. O'Beirne.] I gather from your evidence that you are under the impression that the principle on which those music halls were originally licensed was for music only or dancing, as the case may be?—The music halls were intended for music only.

1954. And you think that the introduction of anything like a stage play by the parties to whom they belong is a clear innovation on that license?—That is my opinion.

1955. You think that they should be continued in their original character?—Yes.

1956. With regard to Highbury Barn and the "Eagle Tavern," have you any report with regard to the arrangements of those two establishments, or do you know it from your own knowledge?—No, I do not know anything of those places.

1957. You do not know that the theatres at those places are separate from the saloons where drinking goes on?—I believe that at the "Eagle" it is so; I do not know with regard to Highbury Barn.

1958. The licenses granted under the Lord Chamberlain are subject to his rules with regard to drinking, are they not?—Yes.

1959. Do those rules of the Lord Chamberlain prevent smoking and drinking within the auditorium?—I believe so.

1960. Mr. Lusk.] I believe that you take some considerable interest in the education of the masses-ragged schools and things of that sort?—Yes.

1961. Do you think it is necessary that the poorer classes should have any amusement?—Clearly.

1862. You approve of the mirror being held up to nature in various ways, I suppose?—Yes.

1963. As far as your experience goes as judge do you think that the amusements at those music halls and establishments of that kind have been well conducted?—I have already said that I have never attended them, therefore my opinion is not worth much on that point.

1964. You say that you would protect the performance of the legitimate drama as it is now preserved, I think?—No, I do not say that.

1965. Do you think that there should be licenses granted to those places of amusements?—Yes, to all places of amusement I think that the theatres should be licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, and the other places cannot be more properly licensed than by the magistrates.

1966. Why should the Lord Chamberlain be the best person to license theatres?—His is a very ancient office.

1967. Is he a man of letters?—I am sure I do not know, but I suppose that whatever assistance he would require from literary men or others he would get.

1968. Do you think that he is necessarily the best man to license theatres?—No, but it is an old office, and I have not heard it complained of.

1969. Would you give the Lord Chamberlain the licensing of music halls?—No, I say that they should be licensed by the magistrates.

1970. It is your opinion that the poorer class of people should have one class of men to license entertainments for them, and that the richer class should have the Lord Chamberlain to license entertainments for them?—The licensing of theatres is a very different thing from the licensing of music music halls, there is the necessity for reading what is to be played in the theatres.

1971. People must have amusement, you say?—Yes.

1972. And somebody must license those amusements?—Yes.

1973. Would it not be better for one man to do it?—No; I think that the Lord Chamberlain is not so well acquainted with the wants of the different localities, and the different class of persons, as the magistrates are, who are in daily contact with them.

1974. Do you not think it would be better to improve the entertainments given at the music halls?—It depends on what is called improvement. They would be improved by withdrawing that which (it is of no use concealing it) must tend to inflame the passions of young men, where women play in the ballet, and afterwards join the men.

1975. But if you hedge round the best class of amusement with licenses from the Lord Chamberlain, you shut out the poorer classes, do you not?—No.

1976. Then would you let the poorer classes enact Shakesperian plays wherever they like?—No.

1977. Then do you not deny them the same privilege as the rich?—No, they have the same privilege of going to the theatres.

1978. If a poor man cannot, perhaps, afford to go to Drury-lane, you would not give him the privilege to enact what he liked if it was moral and decent?—I think that the magistrates are the best persons to be entrusted with the power of saying whether the music halls should be licensed or not.

1979. But I speak of amusements for the people generally. What would you do with the poor down at the east end?—There are theatres there.

1980. But you would not let people do anything except according to the Lord Chamberlain's rules; do you not think it would be better to throw the whole thing open?—I do not.

1981. Why not?—Because I think it would lead to a great deal of immorality and confusion.

1982. But I mean the enactment of a moral, good, sensible play; why should a music hall not do that?—That is assuming that everything should be decent and moral, which I doubt.

1983. But why should they not do it, if they were licensed, as well as other places?—I think that I have already stated my view on that subject.

1984. You have mentioned that young men are demoralised by those institutions; on the whole, do you think that crime is increasing in this country?—Some species of crime are increasing.

1985. But I mean crime on the whole?—No, not in comparison with the population.

1986. Sir Arthur Buller.] Let me call your attention to such an institution as the Alhambra Music Hall. I presume you are aware that that, in fact, is a large theatre in which it would be perfectly possible to have any class of performance?—Yes.

1987. Supposing that all the usual conditions are complied with, the safety of ingress and egress, and so on, could there be any conceivable objection to the Alhambra improving the nature of its performances, and giving that which, under the present state of the law, would be considered a stage performance?—That is only asking me whether I think the number of theatres should be increased.

1988. Would there, in your opinion, be any objection to improving the character of the representations?—Certainly not.

1989. Would there be any objection to the Alhambra performing a decent and decorous ballet, such as they perform at the Opera?—If it had the Lord Chamberlain's license; then of course it would be enabled to do it.

1990. Vaudevilles, ballets, and small plays, would surely be better than what they are compelled in the present state of the law to stick to—merely tumbling or nigger performances; would not that be more improving to the audience?—I dare say it would.

1991. I am supposing, of course, that they were subject to the supervision of the Lord Chamberlain or some officer of that kind?—You must recollect that a new element has been recently introduced into this country, namely, that of having places of refreshment where theatrical entertainments are going on, and it is that new element which we have to deal with.

1992. All those things are in the choice of the frequenters of those places; but it would surely be better that they should see a decent play and pretty dancing, with good singing, in preference to tumbling and comic songs; all that would be an improvement, would it not?—There is no doubt that a better style of performance would be an improvement.

1993. Then, why on earth should not the Alhambra have a license to perform those kinds of entertainment which no doubt do come within the words "dramatic performances"?—That is a question for Parliament to decide.

1994. But will you be good enough to give me your own opinion, what possible objection could there be to that, supposing some officer (the Lord Chamberlain, we will say) had the same cognisance over anything done there as in the theatres; why should not the Lord Chamberlain grant his license to that kind of place, even though they have got those tables, with the grog on the tables?—I only speak of the thing as it is now. If it were licensed by the Lord Chamberlain it might be subjected to better rules and regulations.

1995. But is it not a hardship that the Alhambra cannot effect what you admit would be a great improvement, simply because it encourages the harmless taste of the people?—I cannot see that there is any hardship in the case; the Alhambra was built avowedly for the purpose of music, and music only.

1996. But if the people have an improved taste, why should they not have liberty to indulge it?—I question very much whether it is an improved taste.

1997. You say that vaudevilles and the like would be an improvement on nigger songs and grimacing clowns?—Yes; but I am looking at the way in which the performances are now conducted; I daresay if the Lord Chamberlain thought fit to license such a place, he would take care that it was well conducted. But I am speaking of things as they are; my general proposition is that the music halls should be confined to music; that the theatres should take all the theatrical representations; that they should be licensed under the Lord Chamberlain, and the other places under the magistrates.

1998. Mr. Selwin.] You were asked whether the Lord Chamberlain was a literary person; but I imagine that the Lord Chamberlain has more to do with the morality of the pieces than their literature?—

W. H. Bodkin, Esq.

20 April 1866.

ture?—Yes; and he always exercises a discretion with regard to what houses should be licensed.

1999. The manager in the first place and the public in the second place should be the judges of the literary character of the pieces?—Yes, certainly.

2000. I believe that a question was put which seemed to imply that your evidence would go rather against supplying the wants of the whole of the poorer classes of the people. But I believe a larger number of theatres do exist, licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, in those eastern districts than in the western, there being 15 theatres in those poorer districts and only 10 in the others?—Yes; and at very low prices.

2001. Theatres start up naturally in answer to any demand, and you would prefer that to the liberty of action of the music saloon being extended?—Yes; I should not object to their number being increased if they are confined to their legitimate objects.

2002. Do you know the prices of admission at the theatres in those districts?—No; but they are very low.

2003. And therefore they meet the wants of the people in such places?—Clearly.

2004. Have you any knowledge of the number of complaints that are generally brought before the magistrates from those music halls in the course of a year; are there many?—No, I think not; but I think that the propriety of the performance is not to be judged of by the number of complaints, but by the tendency of the performances.

2005. The inference being that a great number of complaints are never lodged, from the imperfect way in which these places are looked after?—Yes, there are a great many things which are very objectionable which do not come before the magistrates.

2006. What are the things which are taken into consideration by the magistrates in granting a license to a music hall?—There is generally a representation made that a place has been built for the cultivation of the civilising art of music; that the neighbourhood wants it, and so on; there is one observation which I should like to offer upon what my friend Mr. Pownall said. He seemed to think that the magistrates did not pay much attention to the modes of egress and ingress, and the safety of the buildings they license; but in fact there are rules laid down for that express purpose, and the magistrates generally go and ascertain their safety.

2007. Are you of opinion that the magistrates' supervision is as effectual in those cases as the Lord Chamberlain's?—Certainly.

2008. Mr. Powell.] Do the magistrates pay personal visits to those places?—Yes.

2009. Mr. Selwin.] We have heard a good deal about the bar as connected with the theatres being out of the auditorium, and the wish on the part of some people to introduce the present music hall system into theatres; would not that very much conduce not only to encourage drinking, but also to a more lax mode of conducting those places?—Yes, it would be highly objectionable.

2010. Are you of opinion that that system would be a great inconvenience to a large part of the public?—Yes; I think it would tend to disgust well-conditioned people.

2011. Mr. Powell.] I will read to you an extract from the evidence of the Honourable Mr. Ponsonby, with regard to the Alhambra. "A case arose in this way, some years ago (I think it was in the year 1857 or 1858): the proprietor of the Alhambra applied to the Lord Chamberlain for a license for the Alhambra; the Lord Chamberlain took the usual course; he sent an inspector, a professional surveyor, to inspect the building. The surveyor reported that one of the galleries was unsafe to contain such a large number of persons as the Alhambra was capable of holding, and that there was only one entrance for the whole audience. The Lord Chamberlain refused the license, but at the same time they had applied to the justices, and the justices, I believe, without any examination, granted the license to the building." I put that to Mr. Pownall, and he confirmed it?—I do not know the circumstances; but the result proves that the magistrates were right, for there has been no accident, although the building is crowded.

2012. But with regard to all the music halls, it is the practice of the magistrates to make a careful examination with regard to the safety of the galleries and the condition of the exits?—Certainly; they issue special rules for the purpose. They make it a positive condition that they should be satisfied by competent persons that the building is secure, and there are sufficient means of egress and ingress.

2013. Are those competent persons employed by the magistrates, or are they witnesses who are brought forward by the persons applying for the licenses?—They are witnesses who are brought forward by the persons applying for the licenses, but they are checked by the personal investigation of the magistrates who live in the locality, and go and see the buildings.

2014. Practically a personal investigation is made of those places by the magistrates, or by some person in whom they have the fullest confidence?—Yes.

2015. The poorer classes are seen in the theatres at the west end of London in considerable numbers, are they not?—Yes.

2016. You were at the meeting of the bench of magistrates last Friday, the 13th instant, I presume?—Yes.

2017. I am informed that the following notice was distributed on Saturday night last in the Strand Music Hall: "In consequence of the opinion of the Bench of Magistrates having been strongly expressed against stage dancing, under a music license, at their sitting yesterday, 'The Judgment of Paris' and 'Les Circassiennes' will be discontinued after next week, the necessary notices being given to the artists engaged in both in due deference thereto. In the meantime a license will be asked from the Lord Chamberlain (which), if obtained, will permit dancing on the stage, as it is practised at the theatres, in obedience to the desire of the patrons of this establishment and in accordance with the taste of the public"?—That illustrates very much the position of matters at present. The Strand Music Hall was built avowedly for the purpose of encouraging the taste for music, and it was licensed for music only. The parties then engaged in it (who have since become bankrupt) applied to the magistrates to allow dancing. The magistrates refused to do it. We said, "It was a music license and we would not extend it." Notwithstanding that, they did enact theatrical performances on a stage, rather more than even at the Alhambra, I believe. The consequence was, that when it came to the magistrates' term to license that place again they refused to license it.

2018. In passing by, I have observed a notice, that the ballets will be discontinued after this week at the Strand Music Hall, but there is a notice of further performances. Can you explain the circumstances under which they can give those other performances?—They have got a music license, because the magistrates did not take that away; but having already a public-house license, the magistrates said to them, "As you have deceived us, we will not renew your spirit license."

2019. Mr. Locke.] Therefore they have no spirit license now?—No.

2020. Mr. Powell.] But you continue the music license?—Yes.

2021. Chairman.] That music license will be continued until next October?—Just so.

2022. You only gave them a license for music, and not for dancing; you do not wait till next October to say, "We will not give it to you for either," but you take away their wine and spirit license?—It was the first time that we had an opportunity of showing our sense of the impropriety of their conduct.

2023. Mr. Powell.] You think that the state of the law should be changed?—Yes.

2024. Will you favour the Committee in a concise form, with your views with regard to the alteration which you think should be made in the law?—If you are to allow the music halls to perform anything approaching to theatrical entertainments, it would take a man to sit down very carefully, and define if he could, what was music and what was a theatrical performance; my suggestion is that there should be no necessity for that; that the licenses to music halls should be confined to vocal and instrumental music, and that the theatres should be under the control of the Lord Chamberlain; and then if the Lord Chamberlain thought fit, in the exercise of his discretion, to grant a theatrical license to the Alhambra or other establishments, then they would be classed as theatres and places under the same regulations as other theatres.

2025. Do you think that there should be any controlling power over the songs which are sung, so as to guard against indecent or suggestive songs?—Under the Lord Chamberlain's license, they would be obliged to send everything to be seen by his officers, but under the magistrates' license, the magistrates would rely on the police bringing it under their notice.

2026. You think that there should be a controlling power of some kind?—Yes, certainly.

2027. Do you know why there was legislation with regard to betting houses?—Because it was found to be attended by ruinous consequences.

2028. Would not the same reasons influence the legislature to be strict in their laws respecting music halls?—Yes, but betting according to our law, is per se illegal; it is a different matter as to the music halls; it is here a question of excess, but there the principle is wrong. The cases are innumerable of men being ruined by going to low betting houses, and betting, first their own money, and then their employer's money.

W. H. Bodkin, Esq.

20 April 1866.

2029. Mr. Locke.] The evidence which you have given has been more especially with regard to the metropolis, I suppose?—Quite so.

2030. With regard to the country, the licensing of theatres rests with the magistrates, with the exception of one or two places under very peculiar circumstances?—Yes.

2031. But with regard to music and dancing, the 25th of George the Second does not apply to the country; it only applies 20 miles round London?—Just so.

2032. Now, what is the precise law in the country with regard to music and dancing in houses which have a wine and spirit license?—I am not aware.

2033. You know that there are large music halls in Liverpool and Birmingham, and throughout the country?—Yes; but I do not know at all under what authority they are licensed.

2034. I believe the authority is simply this, that where they have a wine and spirit license they consider they have the right to have music and dancing in their houses?—That may be so, because this restraining statute does not extend to them.

2035. Richmond comes within the 25th of George the Second, of course, but a very few years back Mr. Ellis, who then had the "Star and Garter," had a great many informations laid against him for having music in his hotel without a magistrates' license, and he applied to the quarter sessions at Kingston for that license?—Yes; and they granted it directly.

2036. You are not distinctly aware how it is that, in the country, they have those music halls without any special license whatever from the magistrates?—No, I do not know how it is; but I think, if I may be permitted to make the suggestion, it would be a very useful piece of information for this Committee to ascertain that from some persons who are cognisant of the facts.

2038. Pending the currency of the license, any number of indecent songs may be sung, without interference by the magistrates, until the license is again applied for?—Yes; that is so.

2039. Chairman.] Have you anything further to bring under the notice of the Committee?—No; I think not.

William Bodham Donne, Esq., called in; and Examined.

2040. Mr. Locke.] You hold an office under the Lord Chamberlain?—I do.

2041. What is the name of your office?—I am the examiner of all theatrical entertainments.

2042. Is that an appointment for life, or is it merely an appointment at the pleasure of the Lord Chamberlain?—I believe that it is an appointment (at least I infer so from the evidence which Mr. Colman gave in the year 1833) that expires with the Sovereign, but I cannot say that from my own knowledge; I believe it to be an appointment for life.

W. B. Donne, Esq.

2043. Have you got your written appointment with you?—Yes. (The Witness handed the same to the Committee) (Vide Appendix).

2044. How long have you held this appointment?—I became Actual Examiner of Plays on the 27th of March 1857; but I had done the work,

W. B. Donne, Esq.

20 April 1866.

work, with the exception of one year, from August 1849 down to this time. I was doing the work of the Examiner, Mr. Kemble.

2045. When was the office of Examiner of Plays first established?—I believe it was in 1737.

2046. Was it established by an Act of Parliament?—Yes; by an Act of Parliament.

2047. What was that Act of Parliament?—The 10th of George the Second, I think.

2048. That was in the time of Sir Robert Walpole, was it not?—Yes.

2050. It was Foote who introduced Sir Robert Walpole on the stage?—No. It was Gay's "Beggar's Opera" which gave great offence in consequence of the allusions being so pointed, more particularly the song, "If you censure the age;" there was in the opera a fight between Peachum and Locket not many months after the fight between Lord Townshend and Sir Robert Walpole. But the play that really led to the Act was called the "Golden Rump." It was so full of political allusions and grossness, that Mr. H. Giffard, the manager of the Goodman's Fields Theatre, laid it before Sir Robert Walpole.

2051. In what year was that?—In 1737.

2052. But how many years before the Act of the 10th of George II. was passed was the "Beggar's Opera" brought out?—The "Beggar's Opera" was brought out on the 29th of January 1728.

2053. Did that Act pass in 1737?—Yes.

2055. Who acted in it?—It was never brought on the stage.

2056. Then in the year 1728 was there not a piece brought out, or attempted to be brought out, called "Polly"?—Yes; that was a continuation of the "Beggar's Opera." It was printed in 1729; but it was never brought out until 1777, when the elder Colman altered and produced it.

2057. There was an objection made to that, was there not?—Yes.

2058. I think that the Act of 10th George II. chap. 28 was not passed until ten years afterwards?—It was in 1737. [June 21.]

2059. And the "Beggar's Opera" was brought out in 1728?—Yes.

2060. And that continuation of it was about to be produced in 1729?—Yes.

2061. And that circumstance gave rise to the Lord Chamberlain interfering, and then subsequently to that in 1737, the Act of the 10th of George II. was passed regulating theatres?—Yes.

2062. That was the first Act that was passed for that purpose, I believe?—Yes; and it arose out of that play which I have just mentioned.

2063. Was your office created by that Act?—The office was created by that Act: there was an Examiner of plays created, and a Deputy Examiner.

2064. Are there provisions in that Act creating those offices?—I have not the Act with me.

2065. You were appointed in 1857?—Yes.

2066. On the death of John Mitchell Kemble?—Yes.

2067. Who succeeded his father?—Yes, Mr. Charles Kemble was for only a short time Examiner of Plays; he gave up the office in 1840. Lord Melbourne then gave it to his son, and he was Examiner of Plays until his death in March 1857.

2068. What are the duties which you have to perform as Examiner of Plays?—All the manuscripts performed at the theatres in Great Britain must be sent in for my examination, in order to their being afterwards recommended for a license by the Lord Chamberlain. I read all those manuscripts, and if I find anything objectionable, I endorse on the license the objectionable passages, with a direction to omit them in the representation, and then I recommend them to the Lord Chamberlain, or if I am doubtful about the whole bearing of the piece, it is then referred to the Lord Chamberlain to confirm or reject my opinion against it; if his opinion coincides with mine, the play is refused a license.

2069. When you refuse a license altogether, do you state any reason?—Yes, I give the reason for it: it is either indecent, or profane, or it is religiously or politically objectionable.

2070. Now, with respect to the licensing of new theatres, what is the course pursued?—That is not within my province, it is done by the other members of the Lord Chamberlain's Office.

2071. You do not entertain the question yourself with regard to whether or not a theatre is built in a proper style for the performances?—I am Inspector of Theatres as well. That office was first added to the duty of Examiner of Plays when I was appointed Examiner in 1857.

2072. Do you inspect the theatres?—Yes.

2073. With what object do you inspect them?—For the purpose of seeing that there are a sufficient number of exits and entrances, good ventilation, proper arrangements for lighting them, precautions against fire, accidents, &c.; and generally that the public security should be well cared for.

2074. But do you lay down any special rules with regard to the exits and entrances?—Yes, our rules are very strict on those points.

2075. Those rules only apply to new theatres, I presume?—They apply to all the theatres under the Lord Chamberlain's jurisdiction, new or old.

2076. Do you compel the managers of those theatres to make alterations, if necessary?—Yes, if there is anything that interferes with the public security we require an alteration; I am afraid that I cannot give you a precise copy of the rules; I will give you the authority by which I became Inspector of Theatres.—(Vide Appendix.) The rules would vary in different cases; I can give you a sketch of those rules. I always inspect all the theatres in London once annually, generally in the latter end of August or the beginning of September, previously to the licensing day, which is usually on the 29th of September, in order that a license may be either refused if necessary, or granted for a short time in order to allow time for the improvements directed by me. The most important points are these—that there shall be no obstruction of egress; that the doors must swing both ways, and that there shall be no unnecessary barrier put up, so that when the audience comes out each door opens outward, so that in case of any rush there shall be no obstruction; the passages also have been very often widened. I also inspect at other times, when any material change is notified to me in old theatres; and and always when new theatres are reported as fit for reception of the public.

2077. Now, with regard to the passages, and more especially to the stalls at many of those theatres, you have not widened any of those passages, have you?—Yes, there have been some of them widened; but when we have to deal with the old theatres it is very difficult, because one may interfere with the main work, while in making new theatres that is provided for in the beginning.

2078. Are your directions confined to new theatres?—No, they extend to the old theatres also.

2080. Going into a theatre you get on to the dress boxes with a gallery behind; you have to go from there down to the stalls, down a narrow passage, in which two persons could not go abreast, and if you were to widen that you would have to interfere with the boxes or to knock down the wall of the theatre on the other side?—In the case of the Standard Theatre, Mr. Douglass, the proprietor, set his partition at the back of the boxes more than a foot forwarder, in order to widen the passages; it was, previously, dangerously narrow, and he gave up one set of seats; that objection now is removed by the Standard being a rebuilt theatre.

2081. With regard to all the theatres, you say that you have swing doors turning outwards, but in very few of the theatres is there more than one place of egress; take the case of the Haymarket Theatre, there is the pit door, the box door, and the gallery door, all under that same portico?—There are three places of egress.

2082. But you go out of the same propylæum, as the ancients would say?—You go out into a broad street, and the staircases are broad.

2083. At Drury Lane there are modes of egress at three sides of the theatre, are there not?—Yes.

2084. And is not that so at Covent Garden?—Yes.

2085. Do you not think it would be a very great advantage in new theatres that the modes of egress should, if it were possible, stand by themselves?—That is insisted on; it was not long ago proposed by certain parties to build a new theatre in Holborn in which, had the scheme been carried out, the Lord Chamberlain intended to insist upon there being separate entrances for the three divisions of the theatre, for gallery and pit, apart from each other at the sides of the building; and for stalls and boxes in the frontage to Holborn.

2086. Have you seen the new French theatres?—No.

2087. There they stand by themselves, but they have shops all round, so that there is no advantage in that, and therefore after all they have only one mode of egress. Now in this case in Holborn, you say that there is to be a street or passage on each side; do you intend to let them have any shops in the building?—No; those passages were to be kept clear.

2088. But are they in the theatre itself?—No.

2089. How would the sides be constructed?—Open passages.

2090. With doors at the sides?—No, the doors in the theatre.

2091. There will be doors into Holborn?—Yes, and doors into the passage, which was to empty into Holborn.

2092. What is the width of the passages?—One would have been 16, and one 18 feet in width.

2094. It is in fact this, that there is a passage in the theatre?—Yes, a passage in the theatre.

2096. In what way?—To be made with fire-proof bricks.

2097. What is there at the top of the passage?—A coved or arched roof.

2098. How high is that coved roof from the ground?—I should say 14 feet.

2099. What is there above that?—The rooms belonging to the theatre; refreshment rooms, or dressing rooms, or wardrobes.

2100. You consider that on either side of the theatre you have a fire-proof passage in the theatre?—Yes, there would have been fire-proof passages in the theatre.

2101. But the outside walls of those passages, are against the houses in Holborn, are they not?—The pit entrance was not; there would have been a wide passage on the west side, and again a wide space on the gallery side.

2102. But can the people come out into Holborn?—Yes.

2103. I suppose that you recollect in Drury Lane the entrance to the pit is entirely distinct from the entrance to the boxes; would it not be an advantage to have the entrances entirely distinct?—That would almost amount to a prohibition of new theatres in London, because ground is so expensive.

2104. You must have theatres in certain localities, or else people will not go to them?—Yes, the theatres must be in certain localities; we should be very glad to get clear ground, but it would be almost unjust on the parties proposing to build theatres to demand that.

2105. What rules do you lay down with regard to the passages in theatres?—That there shall be no obstructions to egress; of course when a crowd is coming into a theatre, there must be a certain check upon the incoming audience, to allow the money takers and check-takers to have time to settle their arrangements; but in coming out, all those barriers are ordered to be moveable, or to swing back, so that there may be nothing to obstruct egress.

2106. But in the old theatres you can make no alteration with regard to the width of those passages?—No; generally, we can only make them clear.

2107. Do you lay down any rule with regard to the width of the passages in the new theatres?—All the plans are submitted to the Lord Chamberlain, and examined by his own professional surveyor, and a great many corrections are introduced with regard to all points necessary for the public security.

2108. I presume

W.B.Donne, Esq.

20 April 1866.

2108. I presume that the last theatre which you licensed was the New Surrey Theatre; did you lay down any plans for the middle of the passages?—The plans were examined, and instructions were given with regard to the width of the passages, and all the other usual directions.

2109. You do not lay down any specific rule to govern all the theatres, with regard to the width of the passages, but a plan is made by the architect who is employed by the persons building the theatre, and laid before the Lord Chamberlain, and he approves of it or not, just as he pleases?—Yes.

2110. But the Lord Chamberlain does not lay down any set of rules, that the passages shall be so wide, and that the modes of ingress and egress shall be of this or that description?—Each case has its relative merits and consideration. Of course the width of the passages is regulated in some measure by the number of persons that the theatre is to, or will, contain; the Queen's Theatre would not require such wide passages as the Surrey Theatre. It makes also a material difference whether audiences leave the theatre in carriages of any description, or for the most part walk to their several homes. A theatre, for example, like most of the East London theatres, can clear out an audience much more rapidly than the West-End theatres.

2111. But the question is, have you any specific fixed rules; seeing that every theatre will hold so many people, do you take that into consideration, and say that the passages at particular parts of the auditorium shall be of a particular width?—We do not do it before the plan is laid before us, but we take care that they shall be of the width which we prescribe for that particular case.

2112. But do you not think it would be very much better if you had some rules agreed upon for theatrical buildings with regard to the safety of the audience, as a guide for the different architects, before they make their plans?—There are general instructions with regard to the safety of the audience; but I think that the circumstances must determine the rules; it is not a mere question of numbers, but of locality also.

2113. When any one wants to build a theatre, what is the course adopted?—He draws out a plan and submits it to the Lord Chamberlain.

2114. Before he begins to build?—Yes.

2115. You look at that plan, and if the passages are not wide enough you say so?—Yes, we look at the plan to see that the passages are wide enough, and if not, we direct them to be made wider, and so forth, in other essential points.

2116. If a man makes out his plans, and brings them to you, and you say that those passages are not wide enough, and it destroys his whole plan, he must either make another plan, and lay it out all over again, or else he will injure the symmetry of the house?—I do not think that we could lay down very stringent rules, for this reason: some theatres are larger in their dress circles; some depend on their gallery and on their pit, and some on both the gallery and the pit; the width of the passages is dependent very much upon the capacity of the theatre; the wants of the people and the capacity of the house are the things that require the most consideration.

2117. Now with regard to the licensing of plays, is it not the fact that of late years very few plays have been refused?—Very few; I will hand in a statement upon that subject. (Vide Appendix.)

2119. At the present time you license all the plays throughout the country, do you not?—Yes.

2120. But there are very few new plays brought out anywhere, except in London?—Very few.

2121. Where are they?—At Liverpool, Manchester, Edinburgh, Sheffield, and Bradford occasionally, now and then Norwich, Sunderland, Bristol, and Newcastle on Tyne; I licensed two pieces for the Swansea Theatre not many weeks ago

2122. Now, with regard to the music halls or literary institutions; suppose they were allowed to have performances of the stage, and that the authority were placed under the Lord Chamberlain for the licensing of the performances which which they had there, do you think that the Lord Chamberlain's Office could perform that duty?—Yes.

2123. You think, supposing all the existing places of that kind had a theatrical license granted to them, with the privilege of bringing out plays, the Lord Chamberlain would not be over-worked by licensing all the plays which they brought out?—They would all pass through my hands. I think I could undertake to say that I could do it. There is one gentleman who, I understand, introduces extemporary songs every night; such a case as that could not come under my jurisdiction, of course. My busiest time is in the month of December, just before Boxing Night, and in the course of that month I generally have five or six regular plays to examine; but, besides, I always read through about 27 pantomimes and burlesques at that time of the year.

2124. Then you read the pantomimes through; but it would require a very skilful person to find out anything wrong in a pantomime, would it not?—We make them now put down what they do, as well as what they say in the introduction. Formerly the comic business was not put down; but being once called to account for what they did, I said, "If I am to be answerable for what you do, I must see what you are going to do."

2125. You have that comic business written down?—Yes.

2126. When the harlequin comes on and dances with the columbine?—Yes.

2127. And where he makes a change, and so on, you have that written down?—Yes, everything.

2128. How many pieces had you at Boxing time last year?—Twenty-seven pantomimes or burlesques, and five regular dramas.

2129. They come in nearly altogether, I suppose?—They mostly come in the last four or five days before they are wanted.

2130. And you go through them?—Through the whole of them.

2131. With regard to the ballet, I think you have stated that you have never been able to make out what a ballet means?—Yes, but I do not think I was understood, and I strongly suspect that there are a good many people in the same case. A ballet is rarely understood fully by more than about four people: the author of the ballet and the master master of the ballet, the first dancer, and the première danseuse. I doubt whether many people, unless they are professional dancers, know much more than I do.

2132. I suppose you mean the original ballet, not ballet founded on a story?—Yes; for example, there was a ballet, when I was a young man, called "Raymond and Agnes; or, the Bleeding Nun," all played in dumb show.

2135. The ancient pantomime always told its own story, but where the feet are the language, it is very difficult for any one to understand the exact sentiment conveyed by the ballet. I think you have stated that you never understood the story of that ballet which was played at the Alhambra?—Never.

2136-7. You say that the Lord Chamberlain's Office could take the licensing throughout the whole of the country?—I feel confident that the Examiner of Plays could do it.

2138. Now, with regard to the performances at these different places. You say that men sing extempore, and so on; do you think it would be necessary to have any particular public authority vested in the Lord Chamberlain's hands, supposing there was an extension of his function, as to whether or not any impropriety was introduced on the stage?—It is certainly not necessary with regard to the theatres generally. I have very seldom had occasion to go to see whether my instructions are carried out. If I suspect, I go, but it is not three times in the year that there is any occasion for it, and perhaps the same confidence might be put in other places.

2139. How many theatres have been licensed within the last 10 years?—I will hand in a list of the present theatres. (The Witness handed in the same.—Vide Appendix.)

2140. What refusals have there been to license theatres lately?—There have been applications made for licensing places that were not theatres.

2141. There was an application to license St. James's Hall for theatrical performances, was there not?—Yes.

2143. But still, if there were proper modes of ingress and egress, and it was safe, do you see any objection to acting plays at St. James's Hall?—No, I do not, if it were put under the same conditions—I speak only with regard to the public security—as other theatres.

2144. Was it considered that St. James's Hall would not be safe?—I believe it was considered that there were not sufficient egresses, and that there were many things besides of which the hall did not admit.

2145. Your objection was to the building?—My objection was to the building, and that has generally been the objection in all similar refusals. I examined the Marylebone Institute, and there was no objection to it, beyond that the building was not a theatre.

2146. But now St. James's Hall is filled when there are concerts given there; if it is safe for people to go to St. James's Hall to the concerts, would it not be equally safe for them to go there to a play?—I do not think the audiences are precisely the same; there is not the same hurry out of the pit and gallery; you have to arrange for very tumultuous persons in some portions of several theatres.

2147. You consider that a theatre must be for the accommodation of every description of person?—Yes.

2148. With pit, gallery, boxes, and so forth?—Yes.

2149. But do you think it is necessary that the acting of plays should be restricted to their being performed in buildings accommodating every description of person; take the Beaumont Institution, in the Mile End-road; why should not they be able to give theatrical performances so far as their means would allow them?—Because, I think, that a theatre is a building specially contrived and constructed for the purpose of theatrical entertainments; but music halls and institutions are buildings licensed for another class of entertainments quite different; for example, I do not think that a theatre would be a good place for public lectures.

2150. I suppose you know that the people turn the Surrey Theatre into a church on Sunday?—Yes.

2151. Would not that be quite as extraordinary as the converse?—People may not be so hasty to get out on Sunday.

2154. Why should they not have the privilege of doing that if they pleased?—There are two or three things which should be considered besides: Theatres, where plays are to be acted, generally contain in proportion to the house, a considerable number of persons employed; theatres all stand at heavy expenses, and you would be taking the privilege from those who are following their proper vocations by allowing plays to be performed at such places as the Beaumont Institution.

2156. But why should not theatres, like anything else, be regulated by supply and demand?—Then, I would say, let the demand be for theatres, and not for buildings that are not theatres.

2158. But suppose people like to go and see them in music halls, can you see any objection to that?—The objection is this, that the music halls have their own business, and a very profitable one it is, and the theatres have their own business, which I am afraid is not always quite so profitable; then, I say, leave the music halls to their own performances; all the managers of theatres demand is that the music halls shall not take their performances.

2159. But the theatres have a wine and spirit license, just the same as the music halls?—Yes, they have lately.

W. B. Donne, Esq.

20 April 1866.

2160. Since the year 1858?—Yes; it was merely that a clause which had been suspended was then allowed by the Excise.

2163. Mr. Locke.] There is some license by the Lord Chamberlain, and he makes restrictions as to the use of the refreshment license?—Yes; in one case a theatre in the east end was giving refreshments in the body of the house, and it was stopped; the manager was told that if he went on so he must forego his license.

2164. That is keeping refreshments in the centre of the auditorium?—Yes.

2165. But whatever is done at the back of the pit the Lord Chamberlain never sees?—The refreshment counters are all submitted to inspection.

2166. But when refreshments are taken at the back of the auditorium, there is no objection made by the Lord Chamberlain?—No. In the New Surrey theatre capital refreshment rooms are provided for every part of the house.

2167. There is a refreshment room for the pit in the pit?—No; you pass through a door into a room; all the refreshment rooms in the Surrey Theatre are outside the several divisions of the house.

2168. That is not so at all the theatres, is it; the Adelphi for instance?—The Adelphi has a counter on the level of the pit.

2169. With a beer engine?—I think they are provided with everything necessary for refreshment purposes.

2170. Have they those little barrels with gin and brandy, just like a counter in a public house?—I believe so.

2171. And so in the gallery?—Yes.

2172. In the boxes they have rooms behind, have they not?—Yes; for refreshments.

2173. It is at the back of the pit?—Yes.

2174. It does not interfere with the seats, but that is all?—That is all.

2175. How many applications do you say have been refused?—The St. James' Hall was one, and the Strand Music Hall made an application, I think, but I am not so well qualified to give the Committee that information because the applications do not come to me.

2177. Why could you not give that full theatrical license to the Beaumont Institution in Mile End-road?—Would the managers of the Beaumont Institution allow me to alter a staircase if necessary. Have they got a long lease? I understand Mr. German Reed has got a long lease, and his rooms, having been built for a portrait gallery, form an exceptional case in respect to public convenience.

2178. But suppose that the Beaumont Institution had similar conveniences to Mr. and Mrs. German Reed's, then I understand you to say that there would not be the slightest objection on the part of the Lord Chamberlain to give them a theatrical license?—I think not; but I cannot answer that question without reference to the Lord Chamberlain. But they must strictly submit to my inspection, as Mr. German Reed does.

2180. I suppose you could point out to all these people that there is something which requires altering?—I think they would require the same regulations.

2181. Then we shall be agreed on this, that where a respectable man with a long lease, and a building well adapted for the purpose, applied to the Lord Chamberlain, you would see no reason why a theatrical license should not be extended to all those places, if the persons desired it?—I do not quite admit so much as that. Mr. German Reed's case was a very exceptional case, and we might have a similarly exceptional case.

2182. What made Mr. German Reed's case so exceptional?—The circumstance of his having this long lease, and the remarkable fitness of his building.

2183. Suppose there was that advantage in another case, would not that case come under the same category?—If the case was similar to Mr. German Reed's there would be no refusal.

2184. Is there no other case of the kind besides Mr. German Reed's?—No; I think that is the only one.

2185. Now the Royalty Theatre has been licensed recently?—No; it was licensed many years ago as the Soho Theatre; originally it was Miss Kelly's theatre.

2186. And the Alhambra has been refused?—Yes: in 1859.

2187. On what ground was that license to the Alhambra refused?—The Alhambra was surveyed by myself and a professional surveyor, who accompanied me; and his opinion was that it was unfit in its present state for a theatre; that the whole of the inside must be altered.

2188. That is to say, you have one plan for a theatre; it must be in some way assimilated to the ancient form of a theatre; it must be of a horseshoe shape, or something of that kind going round in a particular way, with a pit here and a gallery there, and so forth; and that, supposing a theatre were constructed in which you could see very much better than you could see in such a theatre, and the seats were very much more comfortable, and the accommodation was much better still, you would not give it a license unless it was on that old plan?—No; the objection which the professional surveyor made to the Alhambra was that it was not sufficiently safe for the public.

2190. But since that it is quite obvious that it must have been put in most excellent repair. It is full every night, is it not?—The great part of the weight is on the ground floor; one objection was that the galleries were not competent to bear the weight of a theatrical audience.

2191. Has there been application since?—Mr. Strange made one.

2192. When was that?—Subsequently to this movement on the part of the music halls.

2193. Was that refused?—Yes; Mr. Strange declined complying with the usual regulations respecting refreshments and smoking in the auditorium during the performances.

2194. Was an examination again taken of the building?—No.

2195. Then you are not in a position to say whether or not it has been strengthened?—I have examined it but once, on Mr. E. T. Smith's application.

2196. Is there any other. Did not Mr. Boucicault make an application for a theatre in the Haymarket?—Yes; but there was not a brick of that theatre laid; that was merely a tentative question, "If so and so, then so and so?"

2198. That is to say, it was thus:—"If I build the theatre, will you give me the license; for I do not want to lay out money on a site with a chance of being refused the license." Why, then, was not the necessary sanction given?—There was no objection to the proposed site; but we could not give a license to what did not exist.

2199. But what was the objection to its existing?—That he must produce his plans and specifications; the Lord Chamberlain had not data to proceed upon; and there were several things besides: was the neighbourhood consenting to it, or was the neighhourhood averse to it?

2200. Would you, for instance, really ask the Haymarket whether they would consent to the building of a new theatre?—It is always asked whether there is any preliminary objection.

2201. Is the Haymarket, do you think, a place which would refuse its consent to anything?—We must ask before we can know.

2202. Whom would you ask?—The parishioners.

2203. You have a theatre, and you have an Opera, and at the top of the Haymarket a variety of things; you have the Pavilion, and what not else. Who, then, are the people in the Haymarket whom you would ask whether they would like to have another theatre?—It is always ascertained first if there is any objection in the neighbourhood, and if there is none, I do not know that the Lord Chamberlain should make an objection.

2204. Did the neighbourhood object?—It had not been asked.

2205. You would ask Mr. Buckstone, I suppose?—He would be one of the parishioners.

2206. He would probably say, "I do not want another theatre next door to me;" or he might say that he liked it; but you would hardly be guided by that, would you?—Perhaps I ought rather to have said that we should ask the people of the district in which the Haymarket stands.

2207. Would you ask the clergyman of the parish?—The "parishioners in vestry" used to be the way; there was one month given for the parishioners generally to express their mind.

2208. Do you not think that that is rather absurd in a place like London?—I think that many districts would be very much aggrieved if they were not asked the question.

2209. But you do not consider that the Haymarket people could be aggrieved, do you?—Probably not.

2210. Then that was not the reason?—No; I am not aware that Mr. Boucicault ever came before us in a tangible form; he had not at the time, I believe, a foot of ground to build his theatre upon.

2211. But if the Lord Chamberlain had said, "Well; I think that the Haymarket is a very good place indeed to have another theatre, seeing, that there are several theatres already round about there," do you not think that it might have been effected?—I should have liked to hear Mr. Boucicault's question, and also the answer. I doubt whether he got a direct "No" from the Lord Chamberlain.

2212. Do you know any other case that was refused where an application was made?—The Marylebone Institute applied for a license for theatrical performances, and it was refused.

2213. The applications for theatrical performances for places, not theatres, have been very numerous, have they not?—Not numerous; there was an application last year to have a theatre at Limehouse on a small scale; I examined the ground and saw no objection, and if they go on, they can have a theatre there. There is not the least wish to limit the number of theatres.

2214. But they must be on the present plan, I suppose?—No, I do not think I have said anything to imply that; only they must be constructed consistently with the public safety: whether they are round, square, oblong, or rhomboid, the Lord Chamberlain does not care.

2215. He does not care if they are like a circus, and they have their performance in the middle?—No; Astley's theatre was a circus for years.

2216. But it had a stage to it?—Yes, it had a stage.

2217. The Lord Chamberlain would license a place like the Cirque in the Champs Elysées in Paris?—Very probably.

2218. Suppose people like to act dramas in the middle of a circle, the audience sitting round it?—If the public security could be well provided for, we should offer no objection.

2219. That is all you care for?—Take care of the public, and they may act on a house-top if they like.

2221. Lord Ernest Bruce.] For how long have you been Examiner?—I began to act as Deputy Examiner in August 1849.

2222. You were appointed by Mr. John Mitchell Kemble?—Yes; I was proposed by Mr. John Mitchell Kemble, and accepted by the Lord Chamberlain then in office.

2223. He succeeded his father, Charles Kemble?—Yes.

2224. Charles Kemble, I believe, never did the duties of the office?—He did duty for a little more than a year.

2225. He returned to the stage, and that was considered objectionable?—Only for 12 nights; I believe there was an objection raised by Mr. Bunn, of the Theatre Royal, Drury-lane, to Mr. Kemble's appointment.

2226. During the time that Charles Kemble was the Examiner of Plays, his son John used to act for him very much?—Charles Kemble went abroad very soon after his appointment, and then his son acted for him for a time, and then the examinership was conferred on his son.

2227. John Kemble told me that his father said he did not think that he read five plays after he was appointed, but in the latter part of

W. B. Donne, Esq.

20 April, 1866.

John Kemble holding office you aided him?—Yes.

2228. That was your introduction to the office?—Yes.

2230. And on his death you got that appointment?—Yes.

2231. Since you have held the office from the year 1857 to the present time, as many as 1,800 plays or more have passed through your hands?—Yes.

2232. That must consume an immense number of hours of your time?—It takes up a good deal of time certainly; but you get into the habit of it; I can take in every word and yet read very quickly; many of the manuscripts are very short.

2233. They are in full, I suppose?—Yes, every word is put down; a manuscript from the Britannia Theatre, for example, is very short, and may be read in a quarter of an hour.

2234. But to read 1,800 plays must have taken up a good deal of your time?—Yes.

2235. You have nobody to help you?—Nobody.

2239. In addition to that, there is paid to you a fee?—Yes, there are fees according to the number of acts in the play.

2240. That fee never exceeds 2 l. 2 s.?—No.

2241. It is 2 l. 2 s. for five acts?—It is 2 l. 2*s.* for three acts and over; under three acts it is 1 l. 1 s.

2242. Would one song be 1 l. 1 s.?—No, 5 s.

2243. Is that the law?—No, that is only a rule which I found existing.

2244. But as I know you are a generous man, do you not have some difficulty in getting those fees?—Never.

2245. Mr. John Kemble, who was an old schoolfellow of mine, told me that the fees were paid irregularly?—Sometimes I have not been able to get them, but that is now so seldom the case that it is hardly the exception that proves the rule.

2246. Those fees you receive from the managers when you return the manuscript, I suppose?—They are generally sent with the manuscript.

2248. You do not let them remain in arrears; because John Kemble said to me that he had had enough by letting them go on tick?—The managers pay punctually and honourably; I have no arrears.

2250. You very often refer a matter to the Lord Chamberlain himself?—In case I think a license should be refused, I always send the manuscript with a request that the Lord Chamberlain should look it over himself; but I have rarely occasion to do so.

2251. Sometimes he gives his own opinion, and sometimes he abides by your decision?—Yes.

2252. Would it not be far more agreeable to you to have no fees at all, and to be paid by a regular and increased salary?—My relations with the managers are so satisfactory that I do not know that it would be more agreeable, or work better than it does now

2253. They pay no fee for a rejected play, do they?—Yes; the fee is paid, not for licensing, but for reading. A rejected play gives more trouble, because it takes a longer time to consider whether it should be rejected or not, than a licensed one.

2254. Now, from the number of plays that you have examined, would you say that there is, on the whole, a higher style of writing and less occasion for you to perform the very disagreeable duty of refusing a play than there was formerly?—I think there has been within the last ten years a very remarkable improvement in the authorship of plays.

2255. In some years you have rejected none?—None.

2257. That probably arises from the fact that the audience do not approve of anything that is objectionable?—Certainly; that is one of the causes.

2258. You have mentioned the plays that you have rejected; of course you did not mention the plays where you merely made corrections?—There are comparatively very few of such corrections now.

2259. You draw the pen through anything in the shape of an oath?—Yes, always.

2260. Anything that turns religion into ridicule?—Yes.

2261. And any political joke is objected to?—Yes.

2263. The Lord Chamberlain is not a public prosecutor?—No.

2264. Are you ever informed of those cases?—Sometimes, and then, of course, I execute justice at once.

2265. Mr. Locke.] How do you execute justice?—By telling the manager that he must either withdraw the play or mind what I say to him.

2266. Lord Ernest Bruce.] If those words are left out by your direction and are put in again, do you hear of it?—Sometimes I do; perhaps not in all cases.

2267. Do you report that to the Lord Chamberlain?—Yes.

2268. And is notice taken of it?—Yes, directly, if it is proved.

2270. Is a pantomime submitted to you?—Yes.

2271. I think you have expressed your opinion that it was rather difficult to understand the plot of a ballet?—Yes.

2272. Is it not far more difficult to understand the plot of a pantomime?—No; the whole of the plot of a pantomime is written down.

2273. Are you aware that there is a practice in all theatres of what actors commonly call "gag"?—Yes, I am perfectly aware of that.

2274. That "gag" is not written down?—No, it cannot be.

2275. There is nothing to prevent a clown or pantaloon making use of words that you have never seen?—Nothing whatever.

2276. That is generally done?—Yes; at least often.

2277. Has it lately been ordered by the Lord Chamberlain that political squibs should be omitted in pantomimes?—They never were permitted.

2278. If a clown desires to raise a laugh or create a sensation when any particular persons are present whom he wishes to draw attention to he can do it; there is nothing to prevent his putting in such words, except that it is illegal?—That is all, you cannot stop "gag."

2279. For instance, political gag, jokes about the state of affairs in Europe, say Denmark, or any other question of that kind; you are aware that that is repeatedly done?—Yes.

2280. Some years ago, during the time you were Examiner "La Dame aux Camelias" was rejected. I can quite understand your objection to that, but then on what ground was "La Traviata" allowed?—That was not done by the same Examiner who refused to license "La Dame aux Camelias," and Mr. John Kemble thought differently and passed "La Traviata," 2281. But you rejected "La Dame aux Camelias"?—Yes.

2282. There was another play that was rejected, a French play, "Le Verre d'Eau," at the time Lord Delawarre was Chamberlain, a story of the time of Queen Anne?—Those specified in that list are the rejected plays since March 1857.—(Vide Appendix.)

2283. That play is not in the list; was that before your time?—I think so. The Verre d'Eau was not examined by me.

2284. Have you a feeling that there is not so much mischief likely to be done at a French or Italian theatre as would be done if a play was performed in English in all the theatres round London?—I think that if there is a musical version of a piece, it makes a difference, for the story is then subsidiary to the music and singing.

2285. You have acted on that opinion?—Yes.

2286. No play has ever been stopped that has once been licensed, with the exception of "Jack Sheppard"?—"Oliver Twist" and "Jack Sheppard."

2287. Those were stopped by Lord Delawarre, in consequence of representations from the different parishes in which the plays took place?—Yes.

2288. You have had plays altered since the prohibition of the performance of "Oliver Twist" and "Jack Sheppard," but those were the only two that were stopped?—Yes.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE GEORGE JOACHIM GOSCHEN, IN THE CHAIR.

W. B. Donne, Esq.

23 April 1866.

WILLIAM BODHAM DONNE, Esq., recalled; and further Examined.

2289. Mr. O'Beirne.] WITH regard to the system which you adopt in licensing plays, do you make any difference between plays and operas in your licenses?—None whatever.

2290. They are all referred to you, are they not?—They are all referred to me.

2291. And in the list furnished by Mr. Ponsonby, the rejected plays or any operas rejected appear, if any?—Yes, if there are any.

2292. Have you rejected, at any time, any opera that you can remember?—No.

2293. You, of course, are familiar with the plots of the operas that are played?—Yes.

2294. Many of them had been licensed before the period of time at which you took the charge?—Yes, long before that time.

2295. Can you remember any of them that have been licensed since that time?—"Fra Diavolo," "Martha," "Dinora," "Ballo in Maschere," "Faust," "Il Trovatore."

2296. And "La Favorita"?—No.

2297. And "The Huguenots"?—No, that was before my time; and "I Puritani" was before my time.

2298. You have no power when once a license is given by the Lord Chamberlain, under your advice, to revoke that license, have you?—I should have power if alterations were made in the licensed copy of a play. I now produce the form of license (producing the same). If they made any additions that had not been licensed, then the Lord Chamberlain might withdraw his license.

2299. On the question of the morality of the story involved in the plays licensed, there appears to be a large difference between the system adopted with regard to operas and the system adopted with regard to plays?—I am not aware that there is any difference. Can you give me a case?

2300. Take the story of "Norma;" it is directly immoral in its tendency, is it not?—I do not think that it can be said to be more immoral than in any acting plays.

2301. Which are licensed?—Yes; which are licensed; particularly the old comedies.

2302. But suppose the opera of "Norma" was submitted to you now, or "The Huguenots," or "La Favorita," or "Faust;" do you think there is any immoral tendency in the opera of "Faust"?—I think it would reduce the limits of dramatic representation very much indeed if those operas were objected to.

2303. You would license such a subject as "Faust" in the drama?—Yes.

2304. I merely wish to ascertain the principle upon which you act?—Just so. "Faust" is a European story; there may be portions of the story which it would be advisable to cut out for stage representation, but the story is common property.

2305. But the story of "La Dame aux Camelias" is also common property, is it not?—I should hardly say that it was as common property as Faust. Of course there is this difference to be observed, the drama must deal with the exhibition of human passion, and when that passion is represented as leading to evil or to good consequences, that is a legitimate object; but in cases where it is insinuated that, after all, wrong may be right, or, after all, not so very wrong; that becomes a far more serious question.

2306. Do you make any difference with regard to the stringency of your supervision in the case of a play as distinguished from the case of an opera, or between language spoken and sung?—My business is not with the music of an opera, but with the libretto.

2307. In discharging your duty as Inspector of Theatres, as preliminary to granting a license when you make your inspection of the plans, you consider the site, I suppose?—Yes, I go and visit the site.

2308. You keep in view the site with regard to public policy as well as public safety?—Yes.

2309. When you apply to the parishioners for their consent, to whom do you apply?—We do not apply to the parishioners for their consent, but it is the business of the person who applies for a license to build a theatre to ascertain whether there is any direct opposition in the neighbourhood.

2310. What evidence do you require?—He produces vouchers for the assent from people in the district.

2311. You always require that?—Yes, we always require that.

2312. Your principal object is to see that the safety and convenience of the public are attended to?—

to?—Yes; in all cases, both of theatres proposed and existing theatres, the public safety regulates all our proceedings.

2313. With regard to the licenses granted under the Lord Chamberlain for theatres, those licenses are subject to certain restrictions made by the Chamberlain, are they not?—Yes, they are subject to restrictions.

2314. And in all new theatres those rules of the Chamberlain are strictly enforced?—Yes, those rules are strictly enforced.

2315. You have said that in one or two of the theatres there is a drinking place or bar at the back of the pit?—Yes.

2316. Is that because there is no other convenient place?—Generally, in such cases, they are old theatres, and of course we cannot pull them about as we can a new building.

2317. But the permission to have a bar in such a place is exceptional, is it not?—Yes, it is exceptional; if the building admits of its being put in a more convenient place, apart from the auditorium, it is done.

2318. You would not allow it in the pit, if it could be placed elsewhere?—Certainly not.

2319. As a consequence of the bar being in the pit, is drinking or smoking permitted?—Certainly not smoking. In some instances there are printed notices in the theatre of prohibition of smoking.

2320. Is drinking allowed in the body of the pit, or must people go to the bar?—They ought in all cases to go to the bar, but I know that that most inconvenient practice still prevails, of carrying round baskets in some of the theatres.

2321. Will you tell me whether you consider that Mr. Woodin's performances at the Egyptian Hall fall within the title of dramatic performances?—I think not.

2322. Do you consider that that performance is an infringement of the Act?—No; Mr. Woodin some years ago had a sort of quasi-theatrical license; he was threatened by the informers, but he had no occasion to be afraid, for his entertainment consists of monologues, which are not mentioned in the interpretation clause.

2323. Do you remember a performance at the Egyptian Hall between Miss Grace Egerton and her husband, in which he and she changed character very frequently?—I remember hearing of it.

2324. Then two persons may perform small plays provided a third is not introduced?—At present the word "duologue" is not in the interpretation clause. Mr. and Mrs. Drayton went round with their "duologue;" they came to the Adelphi Theatre one season, and they were then licensed, not because there was any alteration in the duologue, but because coming into a theatre it became a drama for the time being. Such was the practice at the time. On reconsideration, however, of the Interpretation Clause, I am disposed to think that the practice was wrong, and that duologues, though not specified in that clause, are as much an entertainment of the stage as tragedy, comedy, farce, &c. Many names are now given to theatrical pieces, which were either unknown or not in use at the time of passing the Act for the Better Regulation of Theatres; such as comedietta, petite comedy, &c., &c.; but it is not pretended that these are not entertainments of the stage.

2325. Then those performances are not within the meaning of the interpretation clause?—As far as the practice of the time went, they not considered as being so. On weighing the matter, I believe such performances to have been within the meaning of the clause, and that the practice was erroneous.

W. B. Donne, Esq.
23 April 1866.

2326. With regard to the refusal of a license to the Alhambra Music Hall, the license was refused on Mr. E. T. Smith's application, was it not?—Originally it was.

2327. The license was refused because the galleries were not safe, was it not?—The professional surveyor who generally accompanies me did not consider that the Alhambra was at that time in a proper condition for a theatre.

2328. When Mr. Strange renewed the application, did he forward to you any evidence as to having altered the house to agree with the report of the surveyor?—I do not remember his having done so; but it did not come directly before me.

2329. But if it had been altered so as to secure the safety of the public, should you have licensed it?—It would not have been for me to determine; if I had been directed, I should have gone to examine it, but there was no order for me to do so.

2330. But if you had been requested by the Lord Chamberlain to examine the Alhambra with the view of granting a license to it as a theatre, and the result of your examination was that the safety of the public would not be endangered in case of accident or a great crowd in the galleries, should you have objected to report that it was a fit house for a theatre?—Each case stands on its own merits.

2331. You gave as the reason for refusing the license, that the galleries were not constructed with sufficient regard to the security of the public?—Yes.

2332. Supposing that point settled, should you in such case apply yourself to any other circumstances in the case, except those that touch the safety of the public?—If the Alhambra were subject to all the conditions of a theatre with regard to its structure, that case then would rest on its own merits; but I can hardly take upon myself to say what the Lord Chamberlain would do; supposing the cases were exactly similar, I suppose the result would be similar.

2333. But should you make any objection in reporting upon a building because it was not built with galleries, boxes, and stalls?—Certainly not. I think I have already said that there is no adherence to any particular form of building.

2334. The safety of the public is what you look to?—Yes, that is the be-all and end-all.

2335. Mr. Lusk.] You have had a good deal of experience in all matters connected with theatres and places of amusement, I suppose?—I have had a good deal of experience of theatres, but not much of other places of public entertainment.

2336. You have had a good deal of acquaintance with the theatrical part of literature?—Yes.

2337. Therefore I suppose you have considerable knowledge of the tastes of the public with regard to those matters?—I hardly know that; I am not a frequent playgoer; I do not watch the currents of public taste very closely.

2338. Looking at all things together, do you think it is necessary that places of amusement, such as theatres and so on, should be licensed?—I think they should be licensed; but that is rather an awkward question for me to answer.

2339. But I ask you, because you have a good deal of special knowledge; you think that the proprietors of those establishments should not be left to do as other people are left to do, trusting to their merits for success, as booksellers and music publishers do?—No; I think, from my practical knowledge, that it is a wholesome check, and not a check to which they object themselves. But you will get better answers to that question from the managers who will come before you. I am rather judging other people, if I offer an opinion. It would be unfair in me to give my judgment, because it is not within my knowledge; but I think, generally, that the licensing system is a wholesome system.

W. B. Donne, Esq.

23 April 1866.

2340. Who appoints you to your office?—The Lord Chamberlain for the time being.

2341. Who appoints the Lord Chamberlain?—I do not know; I suppose it is the Minister for the time being.

2342. Or is it the Queen?—I am sure I do not know.

2343. Is that office of the Lord Chamberlain's a political office or a civil office?—I do not know.

2344. You do not know who appoints him?—I cannot say that I know; I have a supposition, but I do not know.

2345. Suppose a man had a grievance against you, to whom would he appeal for redress?—To the Lord Chamberlain.

2346. Suppose the Lord Chamberlain would not give much attention to the matter, to whom should he appeal then?—I have never known an instance in which any Lord Chamberlain has not given his attention to every case brought before him by me; I can hardly imagine a Lord Chamberlain who would not hear an appeal attentively.

2347. Suppose we have a grievance even against a magistrate or against a judge, we can appeal to the Home Office, can we not?—I believe there is an appeal in all cases, up to the very highest, in political and legal affairs.

2348. Would there be an appeal to Parliament then, if there was a grievance against you or your office, by that class of men who have to live by the stage?—The appeal from my decision is to the Lord Chamberlain; I do not know whether there is any mode of appeal from his decision.

2349. Do you think that those who issue licenses should be responsible to the press or to Parliament?—The present system, as far as I know, works tolerably well, to the content of all parties; I do not see why there should be a higher court of appeal, more particularly as the press exercises a very strong influence over such matters.

2350. Do you think that all licenses to all places of entertainment, should be granted by one authority?—It would tend to simplify the action very much, if they were granted in a uniform way; at present the Acts with regard to public houses and theatres, may lead to conflict of jurisdiction occasionally.

2351. You think that one authority would be, all things considered, the best to issue all those licenses?—I hardly know that I am competent to answer that question, because I do not know the general working of the magisterial authority.

2352. I suppose, first of all, with regard to the mere place where the amusement is to be performed, you do not think there would be any difficulty in getting doors of the right size, precautions against fire, and so on, do you?—The conditions for safety in public buildings are various; at some of them there is merely lighting by gas, but no performances in which fire is used, and therefore fewer precautions would there be required; in other cases, there would not be so much space necessary for egress. As I said on Friday, the circumstances of each case are seldom alike.

2353. But there is no difficulty on that point?—No, I never found any, but there might be in untried cases.

2354. An architect or a surveyor could easily say if a place was safe?—Yes, but I should like him to be in the Lord Chamberlain's employ.

2355. But how would you deal with the mode or manner of acting, who would judge there; would you have the police, or a staff from your place to overlook that?—If all places of public entertainment are to be inspected before they are licensed, there must be not only an inspector, but he must have some sort of staff to assist him.

2356. You think it would be necessary to have some person from your office to inspect those things?—By some means or other there should be a very strict inspection; quite as strict as that now exercised over some of the theatres.

2357. You would have somebody to look after the character of the pieces put on the stage, to give them, so to speak, the hall stamp?—Yes.

2358. Have you a staff for all those things at present?—For the whole of the duties of inspecting every public place of amusement, it is but a small staff; so far as reading the manuscripts goes, I have said that I, or at least the examiner of plays could undertake to do that.

2359. Would all that cause much expense?—To "inspect" effectually it must be made worth one man's while to give a great deal of his time to it, and therefore he must be well paid.

2360. How could you then get the expense paid?—I cannot say.

2361. Would it be by a tax on those institutions?—They might object to pay what they conceive to be a tax on themselves.

2362. Would you make any distinction between the drama and a musical entertainment, in the license given for music and dancing?—In case they all required some license, there might be a difference necessary in the form of license; they might be licensed to perform so and so according to the proposed nature of the performances.

2363. But why should there be any difference between what the two kinds of places performed, supposing it were moral and decorous, and everything that is proper?—One very good reason there is; it would tend to a classification of the theatres; audiences would then go to one house for some things, and to another house for other things.

2364. But when a man is in the market we do not interfere with him; we do not want a classification of books; is there any reason why there should be a distinction between the two things?—I think in the practical working a good many things might be done in places of public entertainment, which are now pretty generally kept out of them, by reason of there being somebody who inspects them.

2365. But why should the drama, any more than painting or music, be under trammels of any kind?—I think some sort of revision is necessary before hand, for the acted drama.

2366. Supposing we have agreed that there is a reason for a license, why should a man not be left to perform what he likes, just as a man may paint what he likes?—I think it would be rather difficult to say off-hand, but we are now going into general principles, which are of all things the most most difficult to deal with in such cases; you might come to a general principle that every man should be exempt from a great many things that he is now subject to; every man is born free by nature, but may men pay taxes, though it might be thought a hardship to make any man pay taxes for some, to him, remote and perhaps unintelligibe purpose.

2367. But is this protective system any advantage to the public?—I think, as I have said already, it acts wholesomely on dramatic art.

2368. But why should you protect one class or occupation, and not another?—I think that the two businesses of theatres and music halls, apart from the question of morality, are quite different; there is plenty of room for both, provided they do not cross their respective businesses.

2369. But has the Legislature any right to interfere with people in their businesses?—It very often does; whether it should or not.

2370. Do you think it desirable that the Government should be a sort of father to any business or not?—That depends very much on the character of the son.

2371. Do you think that the Government should act paternally towards the theatres?—I again say I think that the system of restriction works wholesomely for the theatres.

2372. Sir Arthur Buller.] You say that it would be practicable for the Lord Chamberlain's office to exercise the same supervision over the music halls which it does over the theatres?—Certainly.

2373. Very likely that would involve a larger staff?—What I said the other day on that question regarded entirely the reading and licensing of manuscripts.

2374. With regard to reading the pieces, you say you could manage that?—I am sure I, or any examiner of plays, could manage that.

2375. Then supposing the Lord Chamberlain's office, or any other office in fact, was to undertake the supervision or censorship, and a music hall performed mere pantomime or ballet, there would be no possibility of exercising a preliminary supervision over that; all you could do would be occasionally to watch it to see that nothing indecent went on?—Yes; in the case of ballets, there formerly used to be printed with the libretto the plot of the ballet; a ballet can be examined beforehand as to the mere framework of the story.

2376. But in the ballet the angle of the leg is the language with which they speak, and that cannot be conveyed in the plot?—Yes, just so.

2377. You agree that it would be for the advantage of the audiences which attend the music halls, as well in the way of amusement as refinement, if the character of the performances were raised?—Yes.

2378. If instead of tumblers and pseudo niggers they could have pretty scenery and good dancing, pantomimes with characteristic costumes and light operettas and vaudevilles?—If it did tend to the elevation of the morals of the audience, certainly it would be an improvement.

2379. I am always supposing that those things are subject to the supervision of the Lord Chamberlain, or some other authority; but in that case it would be an improvement so far?—There is no doubt about it.

2380. Mr. Strange says that he would gladly substitute a much higher kind of entertainment if the law allowed him; do you not think it is hard upon the managers and the audiences that any law should step in to prevent such an improvement, always supposing that a supervision takes place?—Of course, I think it desirable that the character of any audience, or any performance should be raised, but I think we must be very careful when raising the character of the performances at the music halls, that we do not, in proportion lower the character of the performances at the theatres, because if we take away from the theatres one-third at least of their paying audience and throw it into music halls, we shall either make the theatres shut up altogether, or drive them to the alternative of giving performances like those at the music halls, so that as we raise the lever at one end, we may depress it at the other. I can conceive that many theatres under a new system may find it convenient, if not necessary, to become music halls. I am not so sure of the converse.

2381. That is rather trenching on the doctrine of monopoly, is it not; do you really think that the mere fact of tables being placed within the auditorium as at the Alhambra, and the people quietly enjoying their grog, should be a reason why the advantages of improved performances should be withheld from such establishments?—I doubt very much when what accompanies the tables is going on, whether very improved classes of drama can be introduced to any purpose or profit to any one.

2382. But I started from the supposition that they did not dream of producing heavy plays, but took light vaudevilles?—Yes, that might be so, but I think that they would find themselves much better paid by mere spectacular performances, rather by what can be seen than by what requires to be heard also.

2383. But there are many things which the present law will not allow them to perform?—Yes.

2384. To that extent it would be desirable that the law should be modified, would it not?—I think it might be very desirable to improve the performances, but I still think that there would be some adjustment wanted as to the theatres; the vaudeville is becoming very attractive in theatres, and the old farce has gone out.

2385. Do you think that you could draw such a distinction between what is called the legitimate drama and those semi-dramatic performances as would enable you to give licenses to the music halls for the latter class and keep the others to the theatres?—It would require much consideration, but I think it could be done.

2386. Then if it could be done there would be no difficulty in extending the privilege of the music halls to that lighter class of performances?—It could, in my opinion, be done most efficiently by an agreement come to between the lessees of the different places; for as they have conflicting interests, it would be very difficult for other persons, however experienced, to do anything without their concurrence and assent.

2387. Now, with regard to the safety of the buildings, and so on. Supposing that the Lord Chamberlain had the supervision of those music halls as well as of the theatres, you would apply the same principle in both cases, would you not?—Yes.

2388. If 3,000 persons can be contained in the Alhambra,

W.B.Donne, Esq.

23 April 1866.

Alhambra, it does not matter whether they are looking at a ballet or at Shakespere?—If they were equally secure from accidents the objection would be removed; the form of the building has nothing to do with it.

2389. Chairman.] I see by the form of the license which is given by the Lord Chamberlain that security is given by the managers against transgression of any of the regulations?—Yes.

2390. Do you know of any case where that security has been forfeited?—No, I do not. There was, I think, one case, in which the question arose, but the house to which the case applied, went into other hands, and there was no occasion for enforcing the claim on the sureties.

2391. Is the sum always the same for this security?—That does not properly fall within my department, but I believe that the sum is always the same. When there were saloons (which have recently become theatres) there was a difference in the security, but there are no saloons left now under the Lord Chamberlain's jurisdiction.

2392. I understood you to say that you make no difference with regard to the plot in the licensing of operas and plays?—None whatever.

2393. You take into consideration the music of an opera as the vehicle of the story?—Yes; in reading an opera my business is simply with the plot and words of the libretto.

2394. You are as stringent with regard to the plot as if it were a drama?—Yes, quite.

2395. If it were sung in Italian, would that be so?—Quite so, or in French or German also.

2397. Do you think the number of the pieces would be greatly increased if the monopolies of the theatres were removed?—I doubt whether it would be increased so much as seems to be expected, what are now music halls, would probably adhere to pantomimes, and their vaudevilles would be very short; of course, their expenses for authorship and acting would be more, and they would accordingly do with as few as they could.

2398. Do you think that, practically, the existing system is a check on dramatic authorship?—I can hardly see how that can be so, when there are 24 theatres in the metropolis not to mention those in the provinces, playing at the same time.

2399. But at some of the theatres they play the same piece for a long time?—Yes, sometimes for more than a year, and even longer.

2400. So that the number of new pieces produced is comparatively small?—It is comparatively small; taking a period of 20 years, they are very much less; there was a time when, at the Surrey, alone, seven or eight new pieces were produced every quarter of a year, or even more run.

2401. But does the idea that they are going to pass under a license hamper dramatic authors?—I think not at all.

2402. It seldom occurs that you have refused to license pieces?—Yes; from 1857 to 1865 only seven pieces were refused a license.

2403. Do you often strike out passages?—I used to do so formerly much more frequently than now; I believe that the excisions in the whole course of 1865 would hardly cover a sheet of paper.

2404. Do you believe that the pieces would be more immoral if the censorship were removed?—I think it would be so in some cases.

2405. You think there would be a demand for pieces less moral?—Yes; I think in consequence of the excisions which were made some years ago, the excisions are fewer at the present time.

2406. Do you know anything of the system in France?—I know that it is rather more severe than our own with regard to the performances. In France the Censor attends the last three rehearsals as well as examines the manuscripts.

2407. The censorship is more severe?—It is politically so, but I think not in other respects.

2408. Have you ever cut out political allusions?—Frequently, but not many lately; it depends very much on the particular times or circumstances. A political allusion at one time would be very harmless, but under other circumstances might prove very far from harmless.

2409. Do you cut out religious allusions?—Yes.

2410. Have the excisions which you have alluded to interfered much with religious subjects?—Occasionally they have, but not very much; both as a matter of morality, and as a matter of taste, I never allow any association with scripture or theology to be introduced into a play.

2411. I suppose that dramatic authors by this time are generally acquainted with your system?—I believe that they are perfectly so.

2412. If the licensing system did not exist at all, do you think you could measure, by the excisions which you have made, what pieces might have offended against morality if there had been no licensing system at all?—I think I can see that if those pieces required such excisions, and there had been no censorship, there might have been more of such cases; some plays may have been put in tentatively, if a piece were successful in virtue of what I should cut out, the next piece with a little more to be cut out might be still more successful.

2413. You do not, then, think it fair to say that if you have only rejected seven pieces, if there had been no censorship there would only have been seven?—I think there might have been many more; sometimes I have been asked the question beforehand, "Will you admit so and so," and I have said, "Certainly not;" and if I have come to any knowledge beforehand of a piece not likely to be passed, I have, when possible, said to the author, "Do not send it to me since you must in that case pay me for the trouble of reading it."

2414. But might not the public taste exercise the same kind of censorship that you do, even if your censorship were withdrawn?—I should be very sorry to say that my individual taste was superior to the whole of the public taste.

2415. But do you think objectionable pieces would be condemned by public opinion?—It would, in some measure, depend on where they were represented; this question comprises the whole of Great Britain, and one can hardly tell what pieces would be most popular in some places.

2416. Have you found that pieces are particularly popular among the lower classes which are founded on burglaries and robberies?—Yes; and the results have been that two or three pieces of

of that order have not been allowed to be performed. "Oliver Twist" was one; it had a bad influence, and the Lord Chamberlain had a great many letters from parents and masters requesting that such pieces should not be exhibited, because they had an ill effect on their sons and apprentices. New plays turning on such plots are now not recommended for license.

2417. Would the play, however, have a worse effect on them than reading the books?—No doubt there is that difficulty, that you may buy for 6 d. at a railway stall what you may see for 3 d. at a theatre. But it is to be remembered that representation of a story appeals much more strongly than merely reading one, to the senses of an audience.

2418. Mr. Locke.] You have stated that you consider that the word "monologue" does not come within the interpretation clause of 6th and 7th Vict. sec. 23. Has that ever been decided by any court of competent authority, or is it merely your own opinion?—I am not aware that it has been decided.

2419. Will you state the reason why you consider the word "monologue" does not come within the 23d Section of the 6th & 7th Vict. c. 68?—Because the entertainments "of the stage" are therein specified by name; and that is not one of them; I am again speaking to the practice formerly, I have already said that the practice I now think to have been erroneous.

2420. Let me call your attention to four words in that section, "or any part thereof;" the words that precede that are, "stage play shall be taken to include tragedy, comedy, farce, opera, burletta, interlude, melodrama, pantomime, or any performance of the stage." Now, taking those words altogether, and coupling the words, "or any part thereof" with, we will say, a tragedy, do you not consider that a person delivering the soliloquy in "Hamlet" on a stage would come within the meaning of the Act? The soliloquy in "Hamlet" is a part of the tragedy of "Hamlet," and therefore if any man were to declaim that on a stage where persons paid money to see the performance, would not that be a breach of the provisions of this 6th & 7th Vict., whereby a person is precluded from giving any "performance of the stage" (unless licensed by the Lord Chamberlain), "or any part thereof?"—I think, if that case were referred to any authority, he would at once say that the soliloquy in "Hamlet," although it was in one sense a monologue, was not a monologue within the sense of the legal definitions.

2421. A monologue is a man speaking by himself?—Yes.

2422. A monologue would be the same thing as a soliloquy then? Does not the Act go to this extent, that any play whatever, "or any part" of any play, cannot be performed without the license of the Lord Chamberlain, where persons pay to see the performance?—That is a question for a court of law to decide.

2423. It never has been decided by a court of law, has it?—No; at least, not to my knowledge.

2424. Then how do you draw the distinction? Do you recollect the late Mr. Albert Smith's performance at the Egyptian Hall?—Yes.

2425. Was that a dramatic performance?—It was once, because Mr. Albert Smith had a license.

2426. It was licensed by the Lord Chamberlain?—He and Mr. Woodin both fled for refuge to the Lord Chamberlain.

2427. They both delivered monologues?—Yes, both Mr. Albert Smith and Mr. Woodin.

2428. Did you draw any distinction between Mr. Albert Smith's performance and Mr. Woodin's?—The informers were upon them, and both of them came for a quasi theatrical license; but those were the only cases in which it was granted.

2429. But if Mr. Woodin's performance did not come within the provisions of the Act, why was it necessary to give him a license?—I told him at the time I did not think he was in danger; we only gave it out of benevolence.

2430. But Mr. Woodin thought that he was in danger?—Yes, he thought that he was in danger, and so did Mr. Albert Smith.

2431. Having looked at this section again, do you really think he was in danger?—I believe that my opinion, though in accordance with practice, was wrong, and that they were in danger.

2432. What was the cost of the license that was given to Mr. Woodin?—I suppose he paid the usual 7 s. a month.

2433. What would that 7 s. be for?—For the license.

2434. For the place?—Yes; then, having got a theatrical license, it became necessary for him to send me the libretto of his performance.

2435. But there has been no decision on this point?—No.

2436. Mr. Woodin had a license, but is there anybody who has performed monologues that you know of who has not had a license?—There may be many whom I have not heard of. Mr. David Fisher had a license for a monologue, because he intended to produce it in theatres; he performed it in St. James's Hall, but there the license was not then considered to be necessary.

2437. He wished to establish in London that it was a theatrical performance, so that theatrical managers might permit him to act it in the country, I suppose?—It was merely to guard himself against inconvenience.

2438. You stated on Friday that religion, politics, and morality, were the three subjects to which you chiefly brought your attention in licensing a play?—They are.

2439. I suppose you cannot lay down any distinct rule with regard to your licensing any of those three subjects; take first of all religion, do you think that at the present time, supposing the play of "The Hypocrite," which was adapted from "Tartuffe," were to be sent to you, you would license that play?—Not without great excisions. The subject of "Tartuffe" is a perfectly legitimate dramatic subject. But there are passages in "The Hypocrite" which are very offensive.

2440. Would you leave out Mawworm?—I should cut him very short.

2441. Mawworm as performed by Liston was the very soul of the piece?—Yes.

2442. It filled the house?—Yes.

2443. You recollect that George IV., who had not been to a theatre for many years, when he did condescend to go to the theatre, ordered this play of "The Hypocrite" to be performed?—I have heard so.

2444. Do you recollect that caused great offence to a certain class of people?—No doubt.

W. B. Donne, Esq.

23 April 1866.

2445. Do you know the play called "The Way to Keep Him"?—Yes.

2446. In which there is a direction given by a sanctified master of a shop to water the vinegar, sand the sugar, and come to prayers. If that had come before you, would it have been struck out?—I think in "The Way to Keep Him" the scene is all laid in high life.

2447. You recollect, at all events, that passage in some comedy or other; would you have struck it out if the comedy had come before you to license?—It would depend very much on the character of the grocer into whose mouth the words were put.

2448. It was not merely because he was a grocer that he was held up to ridicule?—No; he might be a grocer and a villain, of course.

2449. However quâ grocer he was made to speak those words, would you have struck them out?—No; I should not have struck them out; but much depends on the context; the context might make such a passage highly objectionable, or it might be perfectly harmless.

2450. Probably, if you had been Licenser in France at the time "Tartuffe" was produced, you would not have allowed it to go on the stage?—I do not think I could have helped it, inasmuch as that comedy had the express approbation of Louis the Fourteenth.

2451. The Crown came in to the rescue of the author; but supposing you had been the licenser pure and simple, and had acted on your own principle at that time, I suppose "Tartuffe" would never have been acted on any stage, and I presume that, upon the same supposition, we should have had very few, if any, of Shakespeare's plays, and certainly none of them in their integrity?—The licenser was very strict in those days—I mean the Master of the Revels—and it must be remembered that a great many words have now lost the meaning which they had in Shakespeare's time, and have become mere expressions. Sir Thomas Herbert struck out such words as "zounds," "bodikins," and so on, because in Shakespeare's time they contained a very solemn meaning, and excisions of that kind were proper at the time, though they would be meaningless or pedantic now.

2452. It would be very interesting to know the principle on which the Master of the Revels acted in those days, considering on the one hand what he left in, and on the other, that you seem to think he was so very severe; but at all events, you do not think he would have cut such a character as Mawworm very short, do you?—No, I think he would not; there was a strong feeling at that time against the Brownists and Puritans.

2453. But I thought I understood you to say that the existence of an immediate political or religious application was one of your reasons for not allowing some things to be put upon the stage?—There is another thing which must be allowed some weight with reference to Mawworm, the sermon is not in the original play.

2454. You mean where he gets up behind the screen?—Yes.

2455. At all events, the dramatic licenser in those days allowed it?—The play was merely "The Nonjuror" recast.

2456. Do you not, in great measure, attribute the inferiority of dramatic authorship in modern times, compared with what it was in former days, to the influence of the modern censorship, at least in great part?—Before I can answer that question, I must be permitted to say that I am not quite certain that I can agree with you as to the inferiority of modern dramatic authorship; for example, looking at Genest's History of the Stage, and referring to the list of plays that were acted in 1765, and then turning to the list of plays that were acted in 1865, I think I am entitled to say that there has been a great improvement in dramatic authorship. It must be remembered that in looking back we see the top of the mountain only, the two or three good plays which have lived, but not the masses of rubbish that were acted in those days, and have since sunk out of sight and mind.

2457. Can you mention many plays brought out during this century which are likely to remain visible in the shape of mountain tops for our posterity?—I regard "Virginius," "Ion," "The Patrician's Daughter," "Still Waters Run Deep," "The Ticket-of-Leave Man," "Arrah na Pogue," "The Colleen Bawn," and some others, as likely to survive, and certainly far more deserving of surviving than two-thirds of the plays of the last century and a half.

2458. Mr. Walpole.] And, probably, you would include "Richelieu"?—Yes, certainly, and perhaps also the "Lady of Lyons." Some of the modern comedies are very good; of course I do not mean to say equal to "The School for Scandal."

2459. Mr. Locke.] Do you think we have anything equal to Goldsmith?—Yes.

2460. You do not despair of dramatic authorship?—Far from it.

2461. But do you not think that if they had greater scope, dramatic authors would produce better plays?—I do not think any restrictions are put upon them which can or at least ought to cramp any man's powers.

2463. Religion, from a theologian's point of view, is not permitted in the dramas of the present day, nor would I suggest that it should be, but do you not think that dramatic writing as well as acting, must decline in energy in proportion as we exclude some topics of broad and living interest which a too-nice censorship might find "political" or "religious"?—I have never said that I would entirely interdict religious subjects in a drama. You gave me the particular case of "The Hypocrite," but perhaps it will be some guide if I mention that I did recommend for license "Polyeucte," which had always been prohibited till I did so. I saw no reason why a religious drama of that kind should not be represented, nor do I, provided it is not doctrinal.

2464. Did you license "Moses in Egypt"?—No.

2465. That was produced at Covent-garden theatre. I forget whose version it was, whether it was that of Rossini or Mozart?—I think it was played by a different name, "Nino," but it was long before my time.

2466. The plagues of Egypt were introduced on the stage in that case, were they not?—I dare say, but I was not then examiner.

2467. In any case, performances of that kind were quite common in England, in former times, were they not?—Yes.

2468. In fact, they were the staple commodity of the theatre formerly?—Yes, and they are so in the Spanish theatre to this day; even in England "Joseph and his Brethen" has been performed within the last 25 years.

2469. In character?—No, not in character.

2470. You mean the oratorio where the words are merely sung, but the "Moses in Egypt," to which I refer was performed in character on the stage of Covent-garden?—It must have been previous to 1849.

2471. At all events, that species of performance has been discontinued, has it not?—Yes, I had an application to license a drama founded on the story of Joseph and his Brethen, but I refused it because it was almost the Scriptural story; offers were made to alter it, but it was impossible to unscripturalise the plot.

2472. When "Moses in Egypt" is put upon the stage in Paris, it is not at all the story of the Pentateuch, because the tables are carried about before the Israelities had crossed the Red Sea?—I never saw it performed. There was another instance, that of "The Prodigal Son," which was performed in this country.

2473. When was that?—That must have been in 1850 or 1851, and there was a great controversy about it, but I defended it; for the plot of many comedies may really be said to be the story of a prodigal son.

2474. Now with respect to vaudevilles, can you define exactly what a vaudeville is?—It is a very short, light farce, but what is the meaning of the word vaudeville, I cannot say.

2475. It is a French word, and it means a light farce, interspersed with songs perhaps?—No doubt there might be a vaudeville without songs, but they generally have songs in vaudevilles.

2476. And usually very much out of tune?—A light farce with songs would scarcely be the precise definition of vaudeville.

2477. I understood you to say that the modern farce is going out of fashion, and that the vaudeville is being introduced instead of it. You must have had some kind of precise idea of what was substituted for the thing which is being rejected?—Yes; a vaudeville may generally be said to be of a much lighter texture than a farce. The term "farce" is very seldom used in the manuscripts which are sent to me. They now-a-days call such things comediettas or vaudevilles, or petite comedies.

2479. What was it called in France, before it came over here?—I do not know.

2480. Could you give us a statement of the number of original pieces, if any, on our stage which have been submitted to you. I mean the number of pieces which have not been adaptations from the French?—I should be unable to answer that question; but a good many of the melodramas produced at the East end are taken from the novels which run through the cheap newspapers.

2481. Do you consider the "Ticket-of-Leave Man," to which you have referred, an original play?—Originally it was French, but it is completely altered to suit English ground.

2482. However, you think that that quasi-French piece will be a mountain peak for posterity?—In any case it is an excellent play. Dramatists have always borrowed in that way. Many of Dryden's plays are Spanish in their origin.

2483. We do not often go to see a play of Dryden in these days?—They did in his days, and long afterwards.

2484. How many of them have survived?—"Don Sebastian," "All for Love," may, perhaps, be said to have stood their ground.

2485. However, you do not at all inquire into the origin of the plays that are submitted to you for licensing?—No.

2486. Still, you can tell when the play is of French origin, I suppose?—Yes, in many cases.

2487. The French manners show through the English workmanship?—Yes; and that is generally at the root of much that is improbable in modern comedy; the importation of foreign manners not according with our own.

2488. Probably you may recollect an article in the "Revue des deux Mondes" on that subject, which attributed the falling off in the English stage to the fact that it did not represent English manners?—Yes.

2489. Lord Eustace Cecil.] With regard to the licensing of operas, do I understand you to say that you proceed upon the same principle as in licensing plays?—Precisely so, attending to the story. It is the libretto entirely that I look at.

2490. The words would be the principle on which you would exclude an opera, rather than the moral which might be supposed to be contained in the story?—If I thought an opera was decidedly immoral, I should object to it, just as I should object to a play.

2491. Can you mention any operas now performed that are not immoral?—The application of such a rule as that would exclude an enormous number of plays and operas from the stage.

2492. Take Gounod's opera of "Faust and Marguerite," do you consider that immoral?—Do I understand you to ask me if the story of "Faust" is immoral? The story is a world-story. It was played at Drury-lane 30 years ago; the subject is hackneyed on the stage.

2493. You recollect there is a church brought on the stage in that play?—Yes.

2494. Would you consider that the mere representation of a church on the stage was immoral?—Certainly not, the mere representation of it; it is necessary for the purposes of the scene. It is the established custom of the stage from time immemorial to introduce such scenes.

2495. It is not your practice to go very strictly into the morality of an opera?—It must be something almost of a scandalous character to warrant interference. If you sift the matter to the very dross in this way, two-thirds of the plays of any period in the history of the stage must be condemned. Where there is an obvious intention or a very strong suspicion of an intention to make wrong appear right, or right appear wrong, those are the cases in which I interfere; or those in which there is any open scandal, or any inducement to do wrong is offered, but stage "morality" is————the morality of the stage, and generally quite as good as the morality of the literature of fiction.

2496. If there were a large number of what are called double entendres, would pay any attention to that?—That is a species of wit which is very nearly extinct; but if I see a real double entendre, entendre, I always cut it out, and mention the fact on the back of the license; our books would show that, because the excisions are all copied.

W. B. Donne, Esq.

23 April 1866.

2497. Mr. Miller.] Our great object is to ascertain whether the theatres and music and dancing places can be so licensed and brought under control, that they may amuse the public without conducing to immorality; are you of opinion from the experience that you have had, that licenses might be granted to music halls of a character that would enable them to go on with their performances without any serious detriment to the audience?—That is, licenses for the entertainment and not the buildings?

2498. Not the buildings?—Yes, undoubtedly, because supposing every one of the present music halls were converted into a theatre, they would of course come under inspection, therefore what would be possible in the one case is possible if they remain music halls.

2499. If they were brought under the management of some competent authority, do you think they might exist to the extent that they do now, and contribute to the public amusement, without interfering more with the morals of the people than the ordinary theatres do?—If they were subject to the same regulations, and if the same care were taken in reading what they would send for license.

2500. Can you suggest to the Committee the particular authority, and the particular license that you would grant to such places?—No; that is a point to be settled between the managers of the theatres and the managers of music halls. No one person could do it to the satisfaction of either party.

2501. If that were done, to what extent would you allow the music and dancing halls to go in the way of dramatic performance?—That would be settled between the two contracting parties. "We will undertake only to do this;" and "We will let you do this."

2502. Whatever they determine on, you would embody in the Act?—Yes. There is a great deal of capital embarked in all those places; in music halls as well as theatres. That is a commercial question.

2503. Do you think that there is good feeling enough between those parties to enable them to come to some arrangement?—I think there has been for the last two or three years a good deal of angry feeling between them; but I suppose they would act like sensible men with a common interest, so that the feud should not continue.

2504. You have stated, that before a person began to erect a theatre, he applied for a license, and he showed you his plan?—Yes, he sends in his plan; the first step would be to say, "I have an intention to put a building on such and such a ground, is there any preliminary objection?"

2505. Is that made necessary by law?—The Lord Chamberlain has power to make bye-laws for that and other purposes.

2506. That application must be made before the building is commenced, must it not?—That application must be made before the building is commenced.

2507. Do you insist upon the stage lights being guarded?—Yes.

2508. You have spoken of certain arrangements that you thought necessary for the egress of people in the event of accident; we have all read of the dreadful accident which occurred at the Haymarket Theatre, when George the Third and the Queen attended there. That accident was occasioned by the accumulation of the people outside the building, and the same thing occurred at Santiago?—Yes.

2509. Do you require that there should be any given number of policemen outside the building in order that the street may be clear in case of accident?—No, we do not require that. But at the time when the Prince of Wales was married, and when the theatres were thrown open to the public, Sir Richard Mayne was requested to add to the police for the purpose of keeping a clear passage.

2510. Seeing that the passage, ways, and exits would be really useless unless the outside were kept clear, would not that be important to attend to?—I have never seen such a crowd on ordinary nights as to suggest the difficulty.

2511. I speak of cases of accident; exceptional cases?—A crowd rushing out of a theatre would necessarily force its way through any ordinary crowd on the outside, but the subject is well worth thinking of.

2512. Take the case of Covent Garden or of Drury Lane; what time would it take, in the event of an accident, for the audience to get out of the building?—The question of "clearance" is constantly asked on the inspection of a theatre. I should say that you might clear either of those theatres in 12 minutes.

2513. That is to say, if the crowd outside permitted the people to disperse?—In case of fire there would, no doubt, be a block by the crowd, but there could be no permanent arrangement made for occasional casualties of the kind.

2514. Is there any room in the great theatres which may be called a canteen, or a large room for the ballet girls to assemble in between the performances?—There are always rooms for the ballet girls to dress in.

2515. Are men permitted to go into that room?—Certainly not.

2516. Do you lay down any rule for that?—No.

2517. Do you know the earliest age at which ballet girls are permitted to commence their operations?—In pantomimes there are children three years old.

2518. But I mean ordinary ballet girls?—No, I do not know.

2520. The vestry of St. James has made great efforts of that kind?—Yes.

2521. So that they would be rather entitled to consideration on that account, more perhaps than any other locality?—I do not know to more, for every locality should have its proper consideration.

2522. In judging of the propriety of allowing any performance like that of "Mawworm" and similar things, would you not be regulated by the circumstances, political or otherwise, prevailing at the time?—Decidedly.

2523. If,

2523. If, owing to those circumstances, the play should appear to be personally, political, or religious, you would object to it?—Yes.

2524. But supposing there was nothing in the terms to give the facts such a significance, you would not object?—I should not.

2525. On the contrary, are not such characters as "Mawworm" rather calculated to do good by bringing the vice of which he was guilty, under public contempt?—When I said that "Mawworm" would not be allowed now, I referred to the whole of the part, as it is usually performed; in fact, most of the profanity of "Mawworm" is not in the real play at all.

2526. Take the "School for Scandal"; is it not the case that sometimes when a hypocrite is exposed on the stage, it does public good?—Of course, that is the very essence of the drama, but it is a matter that will so much depend on the circumstances of the times, that to lay down general rules would be next to impossible.

2528. He goes on to say, "Because he and his officers, in consequence of their long connection with the theatrical managers, have become strong partizans in the theatrical interest"; do you admit all that?—I deny altogether, that I come here as the partizan of anybody; I am happy to say that the managers and myself are upon good terms with one another, but I do not come here as their or anyone's partizan.

2529. If it were decided that the place for licensing was in your office, that would involve the necessity of a considerable extension of your officers?—So far as the inspection of buildings is concerned it would; but, with regard to the examination of theatrical manuscripts, it would not.

2530. The inspection would require an increase in the number of officers?—Certainly, the inspection of buildings.

2531. Supposing your office undertook the licensing, could you separate the two things into two departments; that is to say, the theatres and the music halls, and have a separate branch for each?—Yes, it would be very possible; it would be very desirable to have a set of rules laid down for the inspection of all public buildings under the Lord Chamberlain's jurisdiction, and a similar set of rules for the new circumstances that might arise with regard to manuscripts.

2532. Therefore, even if there should be any prejudice existing (I am far from saying that there is) in your present officers, they would not extend to the new circumstances of the department?—There must be new officers if the new buildings are to be under the Lord Chamberlain's jurisdiction; and, for there to be a really good inspection, it must be repeated when any alterations are made; the real thing would be for the theatres to be frequently under supervision; that would occupy one man's time, with perhaps that of two or three people under him, multiplied as the places of public entertainment would be.

2533. You think it practicable for the Lord Chamberlain to undertake the licensing of the whole of the music halls throughout the country?—Quite practicable with an additional staff.

2534. Mr. Clive.] You drew a distinction, and very properly, between such plays as "Tartuffe," or "The Hypocrite," where vice is portrayed to be condemned, and the more naked production of vice?—Yes.

2535. The one you think is necessary, and the other to be prevented?—Yes.

2536. In this document put in by Mr. Stanley he says, "Public feeling is against anything immoral or indecent being placed upon a stage; anything of the kind would be hissed off the stage"; could you not trust to that without any superintendence at all?—I think not in all places.

2537. Mr. Stanley also says, "The proprietors therefore desire the right to perform small pieces, limiting the number of performers, say, to five or six persons, say, operas, operettas, pantomimes, burlesques, interludes, farces, ballets, or by whatever name they may be called." Suppose that to be allowed, would it be possible to keep up any distinction after that between music halls and theatres?—No, because five or six persons is a company, and all such pieces are entertainments of the stage.

2538. You have stated that you knew of no instance of a license being refused; was one refused to Canterbury Hall?—I think Canterbury Hall applied once, but I am not quite certain. St. James's Hall, the Alhambra, and Canterbury Hall are on similar ground. There were many applications, and the ground of refusal was, "You are not a theatre, and therefore we cannot give you either a theatrical or a quasi theatrical license."

2539. There is no distinction between Canterbury Hall and the others?—None at all, they all had the same answer.

2540. Mr. Locke.] Was not that application from Canterbury Hall after the decision in the Court of Common Pleas?—I think it was after the first or second hearing in the Marylebone Police Court, but I am not certain about that.

2541. After the decision in the Court of Common Pleas, was there not an application to the Lord Chamberlain from the managers of Canterbury Hall for a theatrical license, which was refused?—It would not come before me, but I think that was so.

2542. Chairman.] In reply to a question put to you, I think you stated that the Lord Chamberlain had no power to order the withdrawal of a play that had once been licensed?—I must qualify that answer, it is correct, but it is not quite explicit enough. I was going to speak of the withdrawal of the play of "King Lear," during the malady of King George the Third for 13 years. If additions were made that altered the character of the play, of course the Lord Chamberlain would have the power of withdrawing it. Circumstances might again arise which might make a play very dangerous at a particular time.

2543. The Lord Chamberlain has that power, in fact?—Yes, he has that power.

2544. "Jack Sheppard" was prohibited at all the theatres in 1859, I believe?—Yes.

W. B. Donne, Esq.
23 April 1866.

2545. It had been acted for some time?—Yes; it had been acted for some time; it was replaced on the stage again, and at length it was withdrawn. But, under very special circumstances, it has been allowed to be acted for benefits.

2546. Then the Lord Chamberlain not only has that power, he exercises it?—Yes.

2547. You have spoken of a license given to Mr. David Fisher to go into the country; have you got two classes of licenses?—The license must be to a theatre; there is no personal license.

2548. Were the theatres specified to which he might go?—In the form of the license you will see the name of the theatre is put down, but that is good for Great Britain after being once granted. Mr. Fisher took out his license in case he might find the rooms unavailable in the country and have to go to a theatre.

2549. Do you exercise supervision with regard to the country?—With regard to the manuscripts, I do.

2550. Do many escape?—I think not many. I have sent me for reading between 20 and 30 every year from provincial managers.

2551. Sir Arthur Buller.] I have just had two papers put into my hands which suggest a question or two. The Lord Chamberlain has the supervision over all the theatres in the country?—So far as regards manuscripts he has.

2552. How does he manage with regard to the building of a theatre in the country?—He has nothing to do with that beyond the Metropolitan district: the magistrates have the sole power over the country districts in respect of the buildings. The Windsor Theatre is the only one in addition to the Metropolitan theatres that is under the Lord Chamberlain's jurisdiction.

2553. Now, supposing the privilege to give dramatic or semi-dramatic entertainments was extended to the country in the same way as it would be in London if it included the music halls, do you think it would be so large an extension as to make it impossible for the Lord Chamberlain's Office to exercise the supervision?—No, I think not; they generally would take the London pieces.

2554. Are you at all aware of the general feeling of dramatic authors on the question of the present state of the law of theatres?—No.

2555. Have any representations been made to you upon that subject?—None.

2556. I suppose you never heard of this petition from dramatic authors in support of an immediate alteration and enlargement of the present theatrical and musical licensing system: "That your petitioners have found that the existing legislation concerning theatres operates as a restriction upon their industry, while it has not in any manner supported or elevated dramatic literature; that the lower middle class and working class have of late years developed a large appetite for intellectual amusement, which the number of theatres and the present construction of theatres (which give no comfortable or proper accommodation for these classes) have failed to satisfy; your petitioners therefore pray your Honourable House to pass the second reading of the Theatres, &c. Bill, which measure, in your petitioners' belief, is sufficient to remedy the evil of which they complain." The gentlemen who sign this petition are "Charles Reade, Bayle Bernard, Robert Bell, George W. Lovell, R. B. Knowles, Dion Boucicault, John Oxenford, Palgrave Simpson, J. A. Heraud, F. G. Tomlins, E. L. Blanchard, Henry T. Craven, Arthur Sketchley, John Brougham, F. C. Burnand, Andrew Halliday, W. Sawyer, Edmund Yates, Howard Paul, N. H. Harrington, and J. Hollingshead." Those are well known names in dramatic literature, are they not?—Yes; that petition could not be better signed; many of them are very distinguished names; I have conversed on the subject of the petition with two or three of those gentlemen who have signed it; some of them I am intimately acquainted with.

2557. Chairman.] This petition has not come to your knowledge?—No, it has not.

2558. Have you anything to add to your evidence?—No, I think not.

FREDERICK STANLEY, Esq., called in; and Examined.

F. Stanley, Esq.

2559. Chairman.] You are Solicitor on behalf of the London Music Hall Proprietors' Protection Association?—Yes.

2560. You yourself have had an interest in music halls?—Yes; I have been interested in two music halls: the Oxford and Canterbury Halls.

2561. You have prepared a paper with regard to your views on the question of theatrical licenses?—Facts and views.

2562. Will you hand in that paper as part of your evidence to the Committee?—Yes. (The Witness handed in the same.—Vide Appendix.)

2563. Do you think that the present system is too restrictive with regard to music halls?—Yes, I think so.

2564. And that there should be more freedom of licensing?—Yes.

2565. Do I understand you to think that licenses should be removed altogether?—Not altogether.

2566. In what cases would you retain them?—I would retain them with regard to theatres; I think that the music halls should only have a limited license, because they are only constructed to perform limited pieces.

2567. Do you think that the pieces performed at the music halls should be licensed?—I think not; I think there is no use in it.

2568. Do you think that the pieces acted at the theatres ought to be licensed?—I do not see any necessity for licenses for pieces anywhere.

2569. With regard to the localities, do you think that the system of licensing should be kept up; would you license particular places for the performance of particular pieces?—I think that the places of entertainment should be limited; I think you should only supply the demand of the neighbourhood.

2570. You are not in favour of open competition?—Not entirely.

2571. Do you wish the present restrictive system to be removed from the theatres, so that the present music halls may have a more unrestricted license?—Slightly.

2572. But you do not wish it to be thrown so open that there should be additional music halls?—I simply say that the present music halls are not not constructed so as to enable the proprietors to perform heavy dramatic pieces; it might be dangerous if they were allowed to do so.

2573. But you think that the licenser ought to consider the demand in particular localities?—Yes.

2574. You would not give too many licenses in any neighbourhood?—Not in any neighbourhood.

2575. Why not leave it to demand and supply?—Because they would degenerate with too much competition, you must make a place pay, and then the proprietor will have a good entertainment and conduct his place properly.

2576. You are aware that that is part of the argument of the managers of the theatres against music halls?—I was not aware that that was their argument; I thought their argument was, that too much competition might lower the standard of the drama; I am speaking only of the places, the music halls, not the pieces played in them.

2577. But if the argument of the managers of the theatres is that the restriction should be kept up, because too much competition would make the drama degenerate, you hold a similar view with regard to the music halls?—I do not think that too much competition would make the drama itself degenerate.

2578. But the places would degenerate, in your opinion?—If you did not enable the proprietor to make his place pay it would be so.

2579. In what way would they degenerate?—They might become vulgar, perhaps; they might descend to low means to make their places pay.

2580. Do you say that as the representative of the Association for the Protection of Music Halls?—No, that is my own opinion.

2581. Which of the music halls do you represent?—The whole of the music halls, except the Alhambra; I think I may say all the principal music halls.

2582. What would you consider would be the vulgar means to which they might resort?—I think that the supply of good professionals is not sufficient if you have extreme competition.

2583. Then would these "vulgar means" make a place pay better than the higher means?—No; but they would endeavour to get the public in by any means.

2584. Does not it come to this, that you think if it were more vulgar it would pay better?—No, they would not succeed in making it pay.

2585. What means would they resort to?—That case has not happened yet.

2586. Suppose you had a music hall, and you found that it was degenerating, and would not pay, what would you do?—I should leave it.

2587. Then is not it the proper way to leave all this to supply and demand; would not the places be shut up if there was no demand?—That may be so.

2588. But you still maintain that there should be a certain number of music halls, and that no further licenses should be given, and all in order that their high character should be kept up?—It is not a useful thing to have two music halls in one street, certainly.

2589. Does not competition generally improve everything?—Generally, so long as the supply of the material is continued.

2590. Would not it make the music halls exert themselves more if there was competition?—There has been competition, and what did they resort to? gymnastic exercises, Leotard, and such things.

2591. That is a matter of regret, you think?—Yes, because one or two of those people nearly broke their necks.

2592. Did those entertainments pay better than the entertainments which they supplanted?—Yes, certainly; people wanted excitement.

2593. Are you thinking more of musical performances or of small stage plays, with regard to this question of competition; when you say that you would fix a limit, do you mean as to the places themselves?—I mean places of entertainment generally; theatres as well as music halls.

2594. You are in favour of the restrictive system, then?—I say that the tribunal for granting licenses should have regard to the requirements of the neighbourhood, the character of the person applying, and the nature of the place; I think that those should be the leading points to consider in granting a new license.

2595. You say in your paper, that "public feeling is against anything immoral or indecent being placed on the stage; anything of the kind would be hissed off the stage;" that is the result of your experience?—Yes.

2596. Are you speaking of all entertainments?—Yes; I think that anything of that kind would be hissed.

2597. In supper-rooms, where comic songs are sung, is anything indecent hissed off the stage?—They do not exist now, but I think they would be.

2598. There is no occasion for any supervision at all, you think?—There has not been any occasion in the music halls; there have never been any complaints of immoralities for the last 18 years.

2599. You say in your paper that "it would be extremely difficult, almost impossible, for proprietors of music halls to submit their entertainments for approval;" do you think that there should be any difficulty in submitting the longer pieces for approval?—No, it is more a question of time; I mean a song, or a very short entertainment; it would not be impossible to submit pieces of any length.

2600. Would it be difficult to submit all the songs and pieces represented?—If you mean the whole of the entertainments, it would not be impossible, but it would be an immense thing to do.

2601. Do you not keep up the same thing many nights in succession?—No.

2602. Do you change the songs every night?—Yes; the programme is not arranged beforehand; it is arranged as the evening proceeds.

2603. But is there not a general selection of songs that are taken and sung at the music halls?—No, there is an immense variety.

2604. Who composes these songs and pieces?—The authors.

2605. There would be no difficulty in submitting them for approval, then?—No more difficulty than there would be in submitting every play or every book for approval, but there would be that kind of difficulty.

2606. I see you are of opinion "that a new tribunal should be appointed for the purpose of granting licenses for music halls, and that theatres and music halls should not be under the same authority?"—I think so; I think they should be kept distinct.

2607. What is the distinction between the two?—The smoking, principally.

F. Stanley, Esq.

23 April 1866.

2608. Then a music hall where there was no smoking would be a theatre?—No, not necessarily, except as every place of entertainment is a theatre.

2609. Then if they were to smoke in a theatre it would become a music hall?—It would be very much like one; the fusion of the two things would not be useful; there are certain persons who desire to take their families to places of entertainment, who object to the inconvenience of smoke.

2610. You would have a different tribunal to grant licenses for the two things?—Yes.

2611. Then places where they smoke must have licenses from one authority, and places where there is none from another authority?—There is a distinction now between the music halls and theatres, and it is as well to keep it up.

2612. But is there no distinction between the character of the performances?—Yes, there is a great distinction.

2613. Are the Committee to understand that you would wish to remove that restriction to some extent?—To a very limited extent; the music halls do not ask the right to perform heavy pieces.

2614. They ask to be allowed to perform pieces in which five or six persons could play?—Yes, or even less, if that is thought too great a number.

2615. You are not connected with the Alhambra now in any way?—No.

2616. But those pieces which you would propose to perform would be stage plays, I suppose?—I do not know what is not a stage play.

2618. Pecuniary security?—Yes.

2619. You say that it would be desirable to proceed by steps, and that the restriction should only be partially removed; why do you suggest that?—To see how it would work. It would not be well to turn all the theatres into music halls and all the music halls into theatres.

2620. If there were no distinction, against whose interest would that be?—The interest of the public, that portion of the public who desire to go to the theatres to see heavy plays, and sit still for hours without smoking, would suffer, because there would be no place where they could go to, with the exception of one or two of the principal theatres.

2621. Do you think, then, that the managers of theatres would even now allow smoking if it were not for that prohibition of the Lord Chamberlain?—Yes, in all but a few theatres I think they would; they do allow smoking at the back of the pit and boxes.

2622. You think that the character of the theatres is kept up rather by the present system?—I do not say that it lowers the character of the theatre if you have smoking. I simply say that you do not give those persons who desire it an opportunity of going to a place where they can see a performance without being annoyed by smoking, and I think that it is advisable to have those two kinds of places.

2623. At all events smoking lowers the character of an entertainment, I suppose, if the people do not sit still while a piece is being performed?—No, it does not lower the character of the entertainment, the entertainment is the same whether the people stop or not.

2624. Do you consider that the little farces performed at music halls are of the same character as Shakesperian pieces?—Certainly not of the same character.

2625. Mr. Locke.] What precise places do you represent?—The Oxford and Canterbury Hall.

2626. They are under the same company, are they not?—Yes; I also represent the Metropolitan, in the Edgware-road; the Regent, at Westminster; Wilton's, in Wellclose-square; the Philharmonic, at Islington; Weston's, in Holborn; the Cambridge Music Hall, at Shoreditch; the Winchester, in Southwark Bridge-road; the Lord Raglan, in Theobald's-road; the Middlesex, in Drury-lane; the London Pavilion, in Coventry-street; the South London, in the London-road; the Marylebone, the Bedford, at Camden-town; Deacon's, at Clerkenwell; the Sun, at Knightsbridge; those are all I recollect.

2627. Some of them are very small places, are they not?—Two or three of them are.

2628. The Oxford is a large one, I believe?—Yes.

2629. Is it capable of playing a ballet?—Yes, they have played one.

2630. Have they played a ballet at the Canterbury?—Yes, and they are playing a ballet now.

2631. Do you think that a ballet is an advantageous thing to play?—Do you mean an advantageous thing to the proprietors?

2632. Yes.—It depends on circumstances.

2633. Does it draw?—Not always.

2634. If you had a very bad one it would not draw, would it?—It would depend on the locality.

2635. Does the ballet draw at the Canterbury?—I am not the proprietor, therefore I cannot tell you.

2636. Are they acting a ballet at the Canterbury now?—Yes, but I have not asked them whether it draws.

2637. They play a ballet, I suppose, for the purpose of it drawing; it is not merely to amuse the proprietors?—No, certainly not; that would be rather expensive amusement.

2638. At the Oxford you say they had a ballet, but are they performing it at the Oxford now?—I have not been there for a long time to stay throughout the evening; there are two selections from operas; there are some persons who dance, some comic singing, solo singing, solos on the piano, and solos on the flute. I do not remember anything particularly beyond that.

2639. Do you think that if the performances were improved, so that they were enabled to enact a short vaudeville, it would be an advantage, or not?—It is rather difficult to provide an entertainment for the public now; and, therefore, the music hall proprietors want an extension of the privilege.

2640. What sort of extension do you mean?—To enable authors to write something for the music halls; it is very difficult to do that when you are only allowed to have one person on the stage.

2641. Would it be an advantage to enable authors to write pieces for the music halls by enabling enabling the music halls to perform light pieces?—Yes, I think it would.

2642. You think it would be an advantage that the music halls should have the privilege of performing stage plays within the definition of the 6th and 7th of Victoria?—No, they are not fit for the performance of heavy pieces, and therefore they should be limited.

2643. It would be utterly impossible for them to act Shakspeare, and therefore you think it is necessary to prohibit it?—I think it is advisable to let them give such an entertainment as they can, and not one that they cannot.

2644. Do you not think that they would find out what they could not do as well as what they could?—Yes, and then they would pull their places down, or they would all become theatres.

2645. Do you think that the Alhambra has done that?—I think that the Alhambra is a theatre, and should have a theatrical license; it is not a music hall, it was never built for a music hall.

2646. But why do you think that the Oxford, for instance, ought not to have a theatrical license?—Simply because they do not require it; they would rather be without it.

2647. But you cannot now perform any description of stage play at the Oxford, can you?—No.

2648. But you think that they ought to be enabled to do so?—They ought to be able to represent duologues, at all events.

2649. But you spoke of six persons?—Yes, that is the outside number which I think they ought to have; but the proprietors would be quite content if you limited it to four persons.

2650. If you gave them an opportunity of having larger performances, you think that some of the music halls would give larger performances, and that would interfere with those that only give the smaller ones?—No, you would alter the places; they would all have to be altered.

2651. If they made the places better they would have better performances, is that what you mean?—They would all become theatres.

2652. And that would be better?—No, it would not be better; they would all become theatres, and then they would cease to pay, and that is why they do not desire to have the right to ruin themselves. When one does a thing, another is forced to do it to keep pace with the first.

2653. According to your theory, if any one was desirous of getting rid of music halls altogether, the best plan would be to let them turn themselves into theatres, and then they would go to utter ruin?—It is not my theory; it is the theory of all the music hall proprietors in London, except Mr. Strange.

2654. But you want something, do you not?—Yes, we want the line drawn between a theatrical entertainment and a musical entertainment.

2655. What would you suggest for that purpose?—I can quote the language of the resolution of the proprietors.

2656. First of all, will you tell us who the proprietors are who came to that resolution?—Nearly all of them; that was in April 1865.

2657. Who are they?—Mr. Morton and others.

2658. Does it not include every one of the houses in your list?—Yes.

2659. Were they all represented at that meeting?—At the various meetings they were; this was not the result of one discussion; Mr. Strange at first agreed, but he afterwards altered his views. I do not know that he attended that meeting. He afterwards said he should like free trade. These are the words of the resolution: "Songs or selections from operas, the performers being in evening costune. Any entertainment consisting of dancing, singing, or dialogue, in or out of costume, where not more than five or six persons are engaged therein, without change of scene during such entertainment, and all Ethiopian entertainments."

2660. You considered that that entertainment, including "all Ethiopian entertainments," would be a very distinguished performance, I suppose?—I do not think so; but the public may.

2661. What makes you say that?—Because they come to see it.

2662. And because the Alhambra is full of people?—That is by reason of the ballet.

2663. That is not an Ethiopian performance, is it?—No.

2664. What is an Ethiopian performance; a man blacks his face and sings a comic song, is that it?—No; say 18 men black their faces and sing choruses.

2665. It is only when there are as many as 18 men with blackened faces that the entertainment is Ethiopian?—No; but we had 18 with a full band and chorus; their performances were followed by some comic songs, supposed to be a representation of the Negro character.

2666. But you do not want 18 people on the stage, unless they were Ethiopians?—No; only five or six persons where you have acting; the Ethiopians do not act.

2667. The only case in which more than six people would come on the stage would be where they blacked their faces, and represented an Ethiopian performance? — I do not limit the number except you have acting, because you must then have scenery, which makes it a theatre.

2668. That resolution to which you have referred was come to by those gentlemen at a time when they thought if they asked for a little they might get it, but if they asked for too much they would get nothing; was not it the ground of that resolution, that they thought it was probable, by coming for that modest proposal for an Ethiopian performance, they might get something?—No; they came to this resolution with a view to meet the views of the theatrical managers; we had a meeting to endeavour to settle the question, so as not to interfere with them.

2669. Were not the theatrical managers desirous of giving you as little as they could?—They said that they did not require the law to be altered.

2670. They said, did they not, that they would not agree to 18 Ethiopians, or anything else; that they would make no concession, but the law must take its course?—They said so; and they said, moreover, that if the proprietors had comic songs in character, they should prosecute them.

2671. That resolution was come to for the purpose of getting what you could?—That resolution was come to for the purpose of getting what they wanted, not what they could.

2672. But you have said that you could not get what you wanted then?—That is the reason we are now trying for this Bill.

2673. Therefore you ask for that and nothing else,

T. Stanley, Esq.

23 April 1866.

else, and if you cannot get that, you will have nothing?—I do not say that; if we do not have that, I think we shall have everything.

2674. And you are afraid of having everything?—Yes.

2675. Because somebody else might compete with you, and do the things better than you?—No, because then the music halls would all be turned into theatres.

2676. Suppose they were, what then?—I think I have already given you the reason against that.

2677. What is that reason?—That they would not pay.

2678. Some of them would be given up, and others that were not given up would pay; is not that the case with regard to all other things in the world?—They would close, I think.

2679. And some of them would open again, I suppose?—Yes; I think as they closed and opened they would ruin each proprietor, as the theatres do.

2680. According to that, it is a very odd thing that you can get your tea and sugar at all; some of the shops open and close very often?—Yes.

2681. A man does not keep up a shop unless it pays?—But he does something besides selling tea and sugar. Grocers lose by their sugar, and make their tea pay; they make something pay. But if you make this number of theatres they will not pay.

2682. I suppose they would become that which the public wants demanded?—Some persons want to go to a theatre where there is neither eating, drinking, or smoking.

2683. That would be furnished for them according to the law of supply and demand, I suppose?—No doubt.

2684. Why should that place shut because another place where they have eating, and drinking, and smoking, is open; the person who frequents one requires what the person who frequents the other does not; why should they all be shut up?—There is no doubt that the rule of demand and supply might regulate those matters, but the music hall proprietors do not require it.

2685. You mean those whom you represent?—I represent all of them but one.

2686. You said that when that resolution was come to it was to please the theatrical managers, whom you could not please, and now you cannot please yourselves?—No, it is to please the music hall proprietors they ask for this extension, and not the public. I do not know that Parliament is called upon to give them more than they ask for.

2687. You think that the public do not ask for it?—No, certainly not; the music hall proprietors ask for it.

2688. Then they should have nothing but what they ask for, you think?—That is for Parliament to decide.

2689. Have not those of the public who require music hall entertainments become much more numerous since the performances have improved?—They have become much more numerous in consequence of the great number of music halls; the music halls create a public.

2690. They create a public, at all events, which wants to go there; it is no use your creating any other public, is it?—I suppose they want to go.

2691. They do go, do they not?—Yes.

2692. Large numbers do, in fact, go since the performances have been of an improved character?—I am not aware that they have been improved during some years; they cannot improve them owing to the law.

2693. But certain things have been done which are not according to the law; for instance, ballet?—There is only one music hall that does that.

2694. I thought you said that the Oxford and Canterbury Hall had ballets?—Yes; but I do not say that it is an improvement.

2696. Have not the number of persons who visit those places increased considerably since that improvement began?—I cannot say that they have.

2697. You say, in your paper, that "Many new operas, composed abroad, have been produced at the Oxford for the first time in this country, and have been subsequently produced at the opera houses;" is not that an improvement on Ethiopian entertainments?—Yes.

2698. Well, has that paid; have people gone to hear it?—Yet, it has paid.

2699. Then, if that be so, I suppose the public do not go there because they do not want that kind of performance, but because they do?—Most likely.

2700. You cater for the wants of the public in making that improvement?—Yes; but I cannot say that the ballet draws the public.

2701. I see you make a suggestion at the end of your paper with regard to what the performances should be. On page 12, you say, "The proprietors therefore desire the right to perform small pieces, limiting the number of performers, say to five or six persons; say operas, operettas, pantomimes, burlesques, interludes, farces, ballets, or by whatever name they may be called"?—Yes.

2702. Do you wish to include anything whatever, then, by whatever name it may be called?—With that limit as to the number of persons appearing.

2703. But your description includes everything, apparently?—No; the gist of the sentence is the limit with regard to the number.

2704. Was your reason for fixing on six that it would otherwise become a theatrical entertainment?—That is the reason of the proprietors, it is not my reason.

2705. That resolution was drawn up when the music hall proprietors were in antagonism with the managers of the theatres, was it not?—They are in antagonism now.

2706. But it was drawn out in that way with a view of making an arrangement between themselves and the managers of the theatres, was it not?—No; it was for the purpose of getting the law altered.

2707. They thought they might get that if the managers were willing that they should do so?—Yes; they say, "That is what we ask, and we do not want any more."

2708. Because they could not get any more?—No, they do not want any more.

2709. When did you see them all last?—Since this Committee has been sitting.

2710. How long ago?—About a fortnight ago.

2711. Was there a meeting?—Yes.

2712. Where was it held?—At the Oxford Music Hall.

2713. Were there many of those proprietors there?—Yes, a great many.

2714. And did they authorise you to make this statement?—Yes, they authorised me to represent the facts to this Committee.

2715. Were there any facts agreed on by them?—Yes, there were certain facts.

2716. Was there any meeting at which this paper was approved of?—No, I only prepared it on Friday last.

2717. This paper has not been submitted to the managers since you prepared it?—No, not since I prepared it; but the facts are facts extending over my experience of 18 years; the music halls were not in existence during the period of some of the facts contained in that paper.

2718. But this paper, whatever it represents, is a paper which you drew out last Friday, and which has not been submitted for the approval of the persons who are interested in the music halls?—But I submitted the main points to them.

2719. Was that before or since you wrote out this paper?—Before.

2720. What did you submit?—That part with regard to the limit of five or six persons; the advisability of the Lord Chamberlain having control; the new tribunal, and police supervision; I think all the suggestions for a new law were submitted.

2721. You drew up a Bill in 1860, did you not?—Yes.

2722. You have got it there, perhaps?—Yes.

2723. What became of this Bill; was it ever introduced into Parliament?—No; the late Sir George Cornewall Lewis told me that he approved of the principle, and he said that if I could get a Member to introduce it to the House, he would support it.

2724. That he would support its principle?—Yes, he would support its principle because he approved of the Bill. Then, afterwards, Sir George Lewis went to the War Department, and I wrote to Sir George Grey on the subject. I have his reply: "I am directed by Secretary Sir George Grey to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 5th instant, and to inform you that he has not seen the Bill relating to music halls to which you refer, and that he can give no assurance of the Government supporting it."

2725. What is the date of that letter?—The 9th of August 1861.

2726. Chairman.] You submitted the Bill to Sir George Cornewall Lewis, and he said, that if a private Member introduced the Bill, he would not withhold his approval of the principle?—Yes, I drew it at his suggestion.

2727. And then Sir George Lewis went to the War Office and Sir George Grey wrote that letter in which he says that he could give no pledge on the part of the Government?—Yes, because he had not seen it. I have subsequently addressed Sir George Grey upon the subject, and I have here this letter of 22d of April 1865: "I am directed by Secretary Sir George Grey to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 19th instant enclosing a copy of the Bill to amend the Acts concerning places of amusement, which you drew at the suggestion of the late Sir G. C. Lewis."

2728. Mr. Locke.] That was last year?—Yes.

2729. After I had brought in my Bill, you went to the Home Office?—Yes.

2730. That occurred in consequence of your visit to the Home Office; did you give Sir George Grey a copy of your own Bill which you drew in 1861?—Yes.

2731. This Bill was drawn out at the suggestion of Sir George Lewis, you say?—Yes.

2732. In what way was that suggestion made; did you call on him or ask him anything about the matter?—I applied to him to receive a deputation from the music-hall proprietors, and he consented to receive that deputation.

2733. When was that?—I think it was in 1860; however, it was just before Sir George Lewis went to the War Department.

2734. Just before that he was at the Home Office, and you called on him and asked him, as I understand you, to receive a deputation?—I wrote to him to ask him to receive a deputation from the music-hall proprietors, and having received his assent to that, I saw Mr. Clive, and asked him whether he did not think it would be better that, instead of bringing a great many people, I should attend alone on behalf of the proprietors. I had two or three interviews with Sir George Cornewall Lewis, and I pointed out the defects of the Act with regard to stage plays, and asked that some line should be drawn. We had a good deal of discussion on the subject, and he said that it would be very difficult to draw the line in any Act. I suggested I might be able to to draw a Bill, whereupon he wished me to do so. I prepared that Bill and took it to Sir George Lewis; he read it, and said he thought it would meet the difficulty. In substance he said that he approved of the principle, and he also said, "If you can get a Member of the House to introduce the Bill, I will support the principle." He did not pledge himself to the language. After that I saw the late Mr. Duncombe, who agreed to apply for leave to bring in the Bill. Whilst we were about it, Sir George Lewis went to the War Department. I then applied to Sir George Grey to ascertain whether he would take it up, but he not having seen anything of the Bill declined to interfere; then the theatrical performers were quiet for a year or two, and we thought it unnecessary to do more for the present.

2735. The principle of the Bill is contained in the one section, is it not?—Yes.

2736. The previous part is a mere recital of the different Acts of Parliament?—Yes, and then it goes on to say, "Whereas it is expedient that the two last-mentioned Acts should be amended, Be it further enacted," and so on." Then it proceeds, "The Acts of the second and third year of Her Majesty, chapter 47, and the sixth and seventh year of Her Majesty, chapter 68, shall not be construed to prevent or prohibit any person using or keeping any concert room or public garden for the performance or representation of the music of any opera, operetta, burlesque, or other piece, or for the performance or representation (without acting or change of scene) of the music of any opera, operetta, burlesque, or other piece, or for the performance or representation of dancing on a platform or stage, or for the performance or representation (without change of scene) of any entertainment consisting of dancing, singing, or dialogue, by not more than persons, or for the performance or representation of any negro or Ethiopian entertainment: Provided always, that nothing in this Act shall be construed to render it unnecessary to obtain a license from the said justices pursuant to the said Act of the 23d year of King George the Second, chapter 26."

2737. You have always been in favour of the blacks, I see?—I have not; perhaps the proprietors have, because many people like them.

2738. At that time the theatres had begun to interfere with you, had they not?—Yes, they had.

2739. I believe that some steps were then being taken by the managers of the theatres against the music halls?—Yes.

2740. What were the steps that were taken then by the theatrical managers?—The music hall proprietors were summoned before the magistrates for performing stage plays; the first case was the case at Canterbury Hall.

2741. When was that?—In 1860, I think.

2742. The Canterbury Hall proprietor was summoned; what was the performance then?—It was at Christmas time; two persons came on the stage and represented a kind of pantomime; they played various characters, 17 or 18 I think; the great point of the entertainment was the quick change of dress; the performers simply passed round and came on in different characters; we were summoned before a magistrate, and I think he gave his decision that it was a pantomime simply because it was called so in our bills.

2743. But the magistrate's decision was against you?—Yes his decision was against us, and we were fined 5 l.

2744. Was that the only case, then?—No, there were some other cases.

2745. Against the Canterbury Hall?—No, against other music-hall proprietors, there was a general attack.

2746. Was that in 1860?—Yes, about that time.

2747. Do you know the reason of that attack, particularly in 1860?—It was a combination of the theatrical managers.

2748. But was there any particular entertainment that was given which led to that, or what did they allege as their reason for interfering?—They alleged that the music-hall proprietors were encroaching on stage plays.

2749. After you had had your interview with Sir George Lewis, and prepared that Bill, were there any other attacks made?—Not for some time afterwards.

2750. Until when?—I should say a couple of years; it was a considerable time.

2751. Were the attacks numerous then?—Yes, they were numerous.

2752. And did they continue from the date when they recommenced their attacks down to last year?—Yes, they attacked almost everything, even the optical illusion, called the "Ghost entertainment," at the Canterbury Hall, and the combination extended to Birmingham.

2753. That at Canterbury Hall was the one which Mr. Norton has spoken to, called "Hodge Podge"?—Yes.

2754. And Mr. Norton suggested an application for a license to the Lord Chamberlain?—Yes.

2755. And that license was refused?—Yes.

2756. On what ground was it refused?—I do not know; I do not think that any ground was alleged; I think the Lord Chamberlain said, "If we give you a license we must give them all one." I think Mr. Morton told me that.

2757. If the Lord Chamberlain had given you that license, you would have had the privilege of performing every description of stage play contained within the provisions of the 6th and 7th Victoria, would you not?—No, I think the application was to license "Hodge Podge," but I am not quite sure.

2758. But I presume that you would not have refused to take a full license?—Mr. Morton would not, I dare say.

2759. Seeing that if he got this license "Hodge Podge" would have been included?—I cannot say whether he would have refused it or not.

2760. You have never heard Mr. Morton say that he would?—I never heard him say anything about it; Mr. Norton suggested that application.

2761. Chairman.] You applied for a license under the recommendation of Mr. Norton, limited to that play?—That is my impression.

2762. Mr. Locke.] The object was to get a license, and then "Hodge Podge" would thereby be licensed?—I will not be certain, but I think it was to license that piece, and not the place.

2763. Are they playing a ballet at Canterbury Hall?—Yes.

2764. Does it tell a story?—It does tell a story of some kind, but it is difficult to get at the story of a ballet; there is a story now and then, but it goes and comes again.

2765. But it is not what is commonly called a ballet d'action, is it?—I do not know.

2766. Are there dances?—Yes, and a good deal of acting in it.

2767. I will not ask you if they are liable to a penalty for that?—I have no hesitation in saying that they are liable.

2769. Was it on the decision of the Court of Common Pleas with regard to the Alhambra ballet?—They have not done anything since that.

2770. Then they are waiting, like yourself, for legislation upon the subject?—I do not know what they are waiting for; I do not know whether they are waiting, or whether they are too busy to attend to it.

2771. They have not attempted to molest you with regard to this ballet, which you say comes within the definition of the 6th & 7th Victoria as a performance of the stage?—No.

2772. Lord Eustace Cecil.] I see you say in one clause of your paper, "The music-hall proprietors have frequently urged the theatrical managers to come to an agreement upon the question by defining the line," alluding to the difference between theatres and music halls; now how do you define the line?—The only way we could define it would be by restricting the number of performers; we thought by having a small number of persons on the stage, which would would not so much affect the theatrical managers, they would not object to it.

2773. You do not attempt to settle the matter by defining the difference between what are called light and what are called heavy pieces?—No; but so small a number of persons must necessarily play something light.

2774. Was that plan approved of at this meeting of the music-hall proprietors?—Yes, it has been approved of at their meetings during the past three years.

2775. I mean that limitation with regard to the number?—Yes, that was the only plan which we could adopt.

2776. You say, in another clause, that you believe Mr. Strange is the only person who permits any of the public to go behind his stage?—I ought to say that it is not behind the stage. I do not think that his place has any connection with the stage; but I do not think that any other music-hall proprietor allows any person to go into any place that is at all private.

2777. But Mr. Strange does occasionally admit the public?—Yes, but not behind the stage itself.

2778. Therefore that is a little incorrectly stated in your papers?—I only mean the canteen; it is a separate refreshment room, it is not among the scenes. I might mention that I spoke to Mr. Strange on this subject on Saturday last, and he said that if it was against public opinion he would be the last man in the world to insist upon it; that he has done so simply because he wishes to prove that there is no harm in it, but he will give it up if necessary.

2779. You say in another clause, "It has been stated in evidence that the system of the music halls is that persons paying at the doors receive the value of the admission money in drink. This is not the case; there is a distinct price for admission to the performance, and the public are not required or called upon to have any refreshment at all unless they please;" is that the case in all the music halls?—Yes.

2780. At all events all that you represent?—Yes, and I represent all of them.

2781. You mean with the exception of the Alhambra?—Yes, and they are not required to drink there.

2783. But you say in the preceding clause that the profit on refreshments is certainly not the primary object of the music halls; I suppose the primary object is profit?—No doubt.

2784. And the refreshments are really the only chief source of profit you say, do you not?—No; the profit is the balance received from both of those sources, the admission and the price of the refreshments sold.

2785. If there was the admission only without anything from the sale of spirits, would it pay, do you think?—Not unless you raised the prices and made the places into theatres.

2786. The refreshments make them pay, then?—You may put it so, but it is both the things, and the profit is the balance.

2787. Mr. Miller.] I find here you say, speaking of the mode of granting licenses at present, that the present system of licensing is bad?—Yes.

2788. And then you say, "I think the tribunal for granting music and dancing licenses is unsatisfactory; it is composed of a vast number of gentlemen who are appointed magistrates by political influence." Have you ever known a case in which political influence was exercised in the granting of a music and dancing license?—No; I say that the magistrates are appointed by political influence, and that they are a constantly changing body.

2789. Yes, I understand that; but have you ever known a case in which political influence was exercised in the granting of a music and dancing license?—No, I do not believe that political influence has anything to do with it.

2790. So that although the magistrates may be appointed by political influence, they do not exercise any such influence in granting or refusing a license?—No, I think not; but I think that they exercise private influence sometimes.

2791. In one paragraph of your statement you say that private influence is used in matters of licensing; can you give us any instances in which that private influence has been exercised in preventing the getting of a license?—I would rather not give instances.

2792. But it is a serious imputation, and I think you ought to give all the instances you can?—I will give you one in which I myself was interested; it was an instance of an application for the renewal of a license for the Oxford Music Hall. I had information that one magistrate, who was interested in another music hall (not personally interested, but interested in the welfare of another proprietor, was exercising his influence in order to get this license refused. He is now dead; I had very strong evidence to satisfy me that he tried to use some influence by getting magistrates to attend to refuse the continuance of the license. I brought some influence to bear, and succeeded in getting about 70 members on the Bench with a view to overwhelming the opposition; that was the case which Mr. Pownall refers to in his evidence.

2793. Can you state any other case?—Not that I know of my own knowledge; but I do not doubt that magistrates have been asked to come and vote for certain licenses. I have been told so by the solicitors.

2794. But you do not know it of your own knowledge; you have only heard that?—I only state that I believe private influence is brought to bear; that is my opinion from what I observe, and what I have been told.

F. Stanley, Esq.

2795. Now will you look at the bottom of page 7, where you say, "I have never heard a complaint by the neighbours of a music hall, as to its being a nuisance, or in any way an annoyance to them, and I believe none such have ever been made;" do you not think we may take that as some evidence that licenses have been granted with some judgment, discretion, and impartiality?—I do not say that they have not been granted with discretion, but I do say that it is an improper tribunal; they may have gone right, but there is a possibility of their going wrong.

2796. Admitting that there is a possibility of their going wrong, has not that improper tribunal been sufficient hitherto for the granting of very proper licenses by your own admission?—Yes, but they are not always so correct in refusing. I can mention another case of the Oxford, when I applied last year for a dancing license to be added to that of music.

2797. But ultimately you succeeded in getting your license, did you not?—No, the Alhambra has a dancing license; the Metropolitan in the Edgware-road holds a dancing license, and the Canterbury Hall in Surrey holds a dancing license; and I applied, as solicitor, on behalf of Mr. Morton, to add to the license for music that of dancing for the Oxford Music Hall, which was refused, and the reason urged by some of the magistrates, was that Mr. Morton might turn it into a casino. I think that was a very improper judgment, because the Bench knew very well that he had held that license for the Canterbury for 18 years, and had never broken his pledge there; it was a very bad reason to urge, whilst his neighbours had a license at the Alhambra and at the Metropolitan.

2798. In that case your objection merely comes to this, that their judgment did not agree with yours?—That their judgment differed from the judgment of the press; and that they are not consistent in their refusal of licenses.

2799. I am not asking about their consistency in refusing licenses; in that one particular license, your judgment differed from their judgment?—I thought it ought to have been granted certainly.

2800. There the magistrates happened to differ with you in opinion, and you think that necessarily they must be wrong?—I do not know that they are wrong.

2801. In plain terms, do you attribute to them any venality in their judgment?—No.

2802. It is an error in judgment that you blame them for; for, in fact, differing with you?—Not with me alone, but with the public, and I hope the majority of the Members of the House of Commons.

2803. You have stated that to prevent too much competition, you would not allow a license to be granted to two music halls contiguous to each other?—I do not think it is advisable.

2804. To whom would you leave the discretion for the time being in questions of that kind?—To the tribunal of new judges, whoever they are to be.

2805. Suppose there is no alteration in the mode of granting licenses, would you leave it to the present tribunal?—Yes.

2806. Do you think that they have judgment enough to decide questions of that kind?—I do not think it would be advisable to let any person have entertainments, without some kind of supervision or license.

2807. Speaking of Mr. Strange's canteen, have you ever been into it?—Yes.

2808. At night?—Yes, I was there about 11 o'clock on Saturday evening.

2809. Were the ballet girls there?—No.

2810. Have you been into that canteen when the ballet girls were there?—No, there were none there; it was just previous to the ballet going on.

2811. Then when you say that you believe that no immorality goes on there, you have no means of knowing so from your own inspection, have you?—I have heard a good deal about it, and I know pretty well what does go on; it is merely the sale of refreshments; it is too public to be very immoral; it is an ordinary bar and room. I could judge for myself, and I saw that it was an ordinary refreshment room with tables round it, and a bar with persons behind the bar, and persons round it; it is well lighted.

2813. Then as, after all, you have no great complaint to make of the manner in which the licenses are granted, do you not think you should have been a little more careful in referring to that subject in your paper?—They cannot do it much more carefully; but I may refer to Mr. Pownall's evidence, in which he says there is a great deal of private influence, and he referred to the Oxford case.

2814. Lord Ernest Bruce.] You have said something about private influence being used very often for the purpose of preventing a man getting a license?—Yes.

2815. Are you aware that private influence is quite as much used in favour of granting a license?—Yes, and that is my objection to the tribunal; I think that private influence is more often used in favour of granting a license than against it.

2816. You think that no private influence should be used at all?—Yes, certainly.

2817. With regard to political influence, you mean that the Lord Lieutenant might have political leanings, and that he would probably appoint a magistrate of his own way of thinking?—I think it is so. I have always understood that they are appointed in that way. I simply say that there is a good deal of private influence used in matters of license. I do not mean on both sides, because I never heard of private influence being used against a license except in that one case; but I believe it is the fact that persons who seek to get a license, do try to get some assistance among their friends who have influence with the magistrates; and I think that it should be left entirely to the new tribunal to decide impartially.

2818. Have you ever taken any part on behalf of the Argyll Rooms?—No.

2819. You are not aware that the proprietor canvassed every racing man in London to give him a vote?—No, I am not aware of that.

2820. The Argyll Rooms are very well conducted, are they not?—Yes, they are very well conducted.

2821. You say, on page 7, "I have never heard of of a complaint by the neighbours of a music hall as to its being a nuisance, or in any way an annoyance to them; and I believe none such have ever been made"; but you are aware that the Argyll Rooms were closed for 12 months in consequence of the complaints of the neighbourhood, are you not?—That is not a music hall.

2822. You only refer to music halls?—That is all.

2823. What is the largest number of persons that have ever attended the Oxford or Canterbury Hall during any one performance?—About 2,000.

2824. You say here that you think no more police supervision is necessary: but would you have 2,000 or 3,000 people in a great building like the Oxford or Canterbury, and no police supervision whatever?—I think it is not necessary; they have never had any police there, and they have averaged 8,239 people per week for two years.

2825. You have officers of your own, I suppose?—We have one officer, and waiters; that is quite sufficient.

2326. You think that it is quite sufficient to call in the police if required?—Just so; our man was a policeman who has been pensioned.

2828. In case of disturbance you would call in the police?—Yes, if necessary.

2829. You have stated that you have been to the Alhambra. I went there the night before last, and I never saw a more orderly audience, but there were policemen, and men in livery who were acting as policemen?—Yes, that is a very large place.

2830. Would you not think it necessary, in a building with 2,000 people, to have some supervision of that kind?—No; for the Oxford has gone on for several years without a policeman, and that is very strong evidence that they are not required.

2831. You have never had any disturbance at the Oxford?—Never.

2832. And you never heard of any one having his pockets picked?—I never heard of such a thing.

2833. Mr. Clay.] You are opposed to open competition in the dramatic profession; you understand, when I speak of open competition, I mean, of course, that there are certain police regulations applicable to all of them, the only object of which should be to secure peace and safety, and decent order in the audience; taking it in that sense, I understand you to say that you are opposed to open competition?—I am not opposed to it, but the proprietors say that they do not require it.

2834. The gentlemen whom you represent are opposed to open competition?—They say that they would rather be without it.

2835. They think there should be a distinction drawn between the legitimate theatres and music halls?—Yes.

2836. Do you not think that any distinction which you might make of that kind would be certain to end in dispute similar to that which has been going on for some time between the theatres and music halls, the latter supposed to be trenching on the business of the legitimate theatres, and the legitimate theatres being anxious to restrict them within the narrow words of the Act?—I think not, because they say, "Decide it according to the number of persons who perform."

2837. We will suppose that your definition of what the music halls should be allowed to do is, that they might perform any piece, or part of a piece, which could be represented by six people; is it not within the bounds of probability that the music halls might wish to represent the most telling scenes from the legitimate drama; you might have some lady of great dramatic talent, and you might like to represent the screen scene in the "School for Scandal," for which only four performers would suffice?—Yes.

2838. Do you recollect when Mr. Macready brought out "Henry VIII."?—No.

2839. There was a very beautiful scene there, representing the death of Queen Catherine, which depended not merely on the rendering of Shakspeare, but on some extraordinary effects of light thrown on the dying Queen; angels flying in the air, and so on; is it not possible, with six performers, that you might represent something of that kind; and if that were so, would not the legitimate theatres have cause to complain, and would you not have a recurrence of this old dispute?—No; the music halls would have the right to do that according to the definition, and if they had the right the theatrical proprietors could not complain.

2840. You think that if the music halls laid down their own definition, they might represent anything of that kind that could be done by six people, and even represent a scene, or perhaps a whole act, from a legitimate tragedy or comedy, and that then the proprietors of the theatres would not complain of their thus picking out the plums?—I daresay they might complain, but if that became law I do not think they would be heeded; that limitation is all that the proprietors ask for; they now complain without reason.

2841. But if they complain without reason now, they might equally complain without reason under the new system?—Yes, no doubt.

2842. It appears, then, to be perfectly clear that there is no line that you can draw which will not cause hard cases occasionally on each side of the line; if you draw any line whatever between music halls and theatres you will have cases: on one side, of which it would be a hard case for the music halls to be restricted; and on the other side, a hard case for the theatres to have their privileges trenched on?—If you have any line drawn, you must go close to one side or the other; many of these observations would even apply to mere readings from plays.

2845. It was given in evidence by one witness that it would be very much to the advantage of music halls, that instead of being confined to selections they should have the right of performing operas and burlettas?—Yes.

F. Stanley, Esq.

23 April 1866.

2846. Do you think so?—The proprietors would perform light operas if they had the opportunity.

2847. You have heard of Offenbach's comic operas, of course?—Yes, I have heard selections from them.

2848. Do you agree with another witness, that it would be advantageous to give that kind of thing as a stage performance at music halls?—I think it would be advantageous to give the lower classes good music, and to perform such operas in music halls.

2849. You know that the comic music of Offenbach is that which has now the greatest celebrity; would it in your opinion be an advantage to give such music, instead of mere selections such as you now give?—Yes, it would be an advantage to enable them to do that.

2850. But you could not do that with six performers, for you must have a chorus; you might, perhaps, do with a chorus of six or eight, but you could not do with less, could you, and even that would very much cramp you for purposes of musical effect?—Perhaps, when the number was finally put into the Bill, it would require a little consideration.

2851. The only change that would be left open to you would be to change the six to 20, would it not?—No; my definition is that only that number should act; a chorus is another thing; it is not acting.

2852. I understood you to say that you thought entirely open competition would tend to lower the character of the music halls, and to introduce vulgar performances?—If you have too many places there would be too much competition.

2853. If you throw it entirely open, and leave it to the law of supply and demand, I understood you to say you thought it would tend to vulgarise the performances?—I think that the places would degenerate if you have a supply which is greater than the demand.

2854. But surely, if the supply is greater than the demand, the supply ceases?—Yes, that is what I say; and I would not suggest any legislation which could lead to that result.

2855. In fact, what you want is protection for the music halls?—No, not protection for the music halls—protection for the theatres; and I think that is the best protection that the music halls can have.

2856. But surely you want protection for the music halls, because you say that you do not want too many of them; that is asking for protection, is it not?—No; I say, leave it to the new tribunal to judge of that question of number.

2857. But I am supposing that licenses are got rid of altogether, and that anybody may open a music hall next door to you if he pleases; that you object to, do you not?—I do not think that would do good to anybody.

2858. You objected, I think I heard you say, to the performance of Leotard, which I have always understood was a remarkable exhibition of grace and vigour, as a vulgarising performance?—I did not say Leotard was vulgar, but he could not perform in every place; then imitations sprang up, which were vulgar and were dangerous exhibitions.

2859. But the police can stop a dangerous exhibition, can they not?—I think not.

2860. You have given two opinions that appears to me to be difficult to reconcile; one being that unrestricted competition would lead to the vulgarising of the performances, and the other that it would lead to all the music halls becoming theatres, and their playing heavy pieces, the last being "The Road to Ruin"?—It would be one or the other.

2861. But which would it be?—I do not know; some would go one way, and some the other.

2862. But whatever the result is, you are convinced that it would be a very mischievous one?—I think so; it might lead to half the music halls going one way, and half the other.

2863. And there being no good performance left in the country?—I do not say that.

2864. Mr. Lusk.] Do you represent your own opinions, or the opinions of the proprietors?—Both.

2865. Because you appear to me to shift from one to the other in your phraseology?—I am ready to indicate any particular point where I agree with the proprietors.

2866. Do you think that any change is necessary in the present state of the law?—Yes, I do, in order to get rid of the present disputes.

2867. Have you ever considered the interest of the public in this matter?—If you make a law which would enable the proprietors to give good entertainments, then I do consider the public as well; if it is a good intellectual entertainment I am taking the public into consideration.

2868. You say that the old plan of entertainment used to be a "free and easy;" and that Mr. Morton created taste for better music in certain classes of the people?—Yes.

2869. And the character of these entertainments is still improving, you think?—Yes.

2870. And the old public-house free and easies have ceased to exist, you say?—Yes.

2871. Do you think that that is an advantage to the public?—Yes.

2872. Do you not think, then, that even the present state of things may be improved?—Yes, by letting the music halls give a more intellectual entertainment; by giving them a little more liberty.

2873. What do you mean by giving them a a little more liberty?—Allowing them to do small light pieces.

2874. Supposing they wanted to perform heavy pieces, what would you say to that?—Then, I would say, "Do not let them;" they do not want it; they had better not do it; it would not pay.

2875. You are not considering the public in that case?—Except that if you enable the proprietor to earn enough money to give a good entertainment, you are, in fact, considering the public.

2876. Sir Arthur Buller.] You say that those establishments to which you refer, only want six persons to be on the stage at once?—Not more than six.

2877. But suppose the managers of the Alhambra wished to have more, why should they not have more?—I do not say that it is either right or wrong; I say that is what my clients desire; it is the desire of 20 against one.

2878. But the music halls, considered as buildings, are very different in themselves, are they not?—Yes; the Alhambra was never built for a music hall.

2879. The Alhambra is capable of having 20 persons on the stage at once if they please?—Yes.

2880. Suppose

2880. Suppose the proprietor, or any other proprietor in similar cases, wishes to have 20 people on the stage at once, if it is for his advantage, and if the audience who attend there also like it, why should it not be done?—There is no reason why he should not do so; only let him get a Lord Chamberlain's license, and make it a theatre.

2881. You have offered another definition of a theatre in saying there should be no smoking there?—Yes, I think there should not.

2882. Then if the Alhambra chose to improve its performances, and to have 10 actors instead of six, you would say "You shall not smoke here, because it is a theatre," I suppose?—If you let that one place do it they would all do it. There would be theatrical entertainments in all the music halls, and there would be no distinction between them and theatres.

2883. And what would be the harm of that?—It would be all smoking then.

2884. If the Alhambra is allowed to have this liberty, you think that the audience at all the theatres would smoke too?—I think that at all but one or two of the principal theatres they would, and I think that in fact they would all become music halls.

2885. Mr. Lusk.] If people liked it what would there be to complain of?—I think that you might complain yourself if there were only two theatres in London to which you could go without finding smoking going on there.

2886. I am not forced to go unless I like?—Just so, but you might desire to go to a place where there was no smoking.

2887. Sir Arthur Buller.] You seem to think that acting even by five or six people only, where people smoked would withdraw people from going to theatres where there was no smoking?—I do not think that the music halls have taken people from the theatres.

2888. But you must surely be taken to mean that the extension of the powers of these music halls, so that they could give dramatic entertainments, would have that effect?—Not a slight extension, but it would if you threw it all open, I think.

2889. And you draw the line at five or six performers?—They do.

2890. Mr. O'Beirne.] You say, however, that there is a difference between the audiences that go to the theatres and the audiences that go to the music halls, do you not?—There is a difference, but perhaps some of the same audience might go to both; one night to a music hall and another night to a theatre; but they would not go two nights in succession to either, I think.

FREDERICK STANLEY, Esq., called; and further Examined.

F. Stanley, Esq.

27 April 1866.

2891. Chairman.] You wish to put in a paper, do you not?—I will put in an estimate showing the cost of music halls in London. (The same was handed in.—Vide Appendix.)

BENJAMIN WEBSTER, Esq., called in; and Examined.

B. Webster, Esq.

2892. Chairman.] You are Lessee of the Adelphi Theatre, are you not?—No; sole proprietor and manager.

2893. We should be glad to hear your views with regard to the licensing of theatres. Do you think that the present system of licensing theatres by the Lord Chamberlain works well?—I think so.

2894. Do you think that the censorship that at present exists over dramatic literature is injurious to the stage, or the reverse?—I think it most essential to the well-doing of the stage.

2895. Do you think that dramatic literature would at all take a different course, if there were no censorship?—Decidedly.

2896. In what direction?—In an immoral direction, and in a political direction.

2897. You think that there is a certain check put on dramatic authors with regard to the morality of their pieces, by the censorship?—Certainly.

2898. Could not that check be exercised as strongly by the opinion of the public alone?—No, certainly not.

2899. You think that immoral pieces would be able to keep their hold on the stage, if introduced?—Certain political and immoral expressions would creep in, and that would gradually advance.

2900. I do not know whether you have seen any portion of the evidence already given before this Committee, but we have heard that very few pieces are condemned by the Lord Chamberlain. Do you think, if there were no censorship, that such pieces as are condemned by him would be increased much?—Yes.

2901. You are not of opinion that the taste of the public would be a sufficient check?—I do not think so; the public is too mixed for that.

2902. What effect has the present system of licensing theatres, and refusing licenses to music halls, on dramatic literature generally?—I think it is injurious to dramatic literature to allow theatrical performances in music halls, and also to the drama as an art.

2903. Must it not create more competition for pieces fit to be acted?—I think not.

2904. But at the theatres pieces have such a long run that all the theatres do not produce many new pieces in the year; is not that so?—That is an extraordinary event rather than otherwise, which does not occur often in the history of the drama.

2905. Could you say off-hand how many new pieces you put on the stage at the Adelphi in the course of the year?—It depends on the run and success of the piece; in the case of the "Colleen Bawn," and "Rip Van Winkle," there was an exceptional run; but, perhaps, we produce at the Adelphi ten or a dozen new pieces, and, perhaps, 20 in the course of a year.

2906. Is it frequently the case that the same piece is acted at different theatres?—In what we call the old drama, it is so; not in the new drama, unless they are taken from the French; it is open to all the managers to avail themselves of French pieces.

2907. Do you think that the drama would suffer by the music halls being allowed to represent stage pieces?—Most decidedly.

2908. Can you state in general terms what you think would be the effect of music halls being allowed to represent stage pieces?—I think it would be the destruction of the art of acting; even now we experience great difficulty in supplying the stage with actors, which, I believe, is entirely consequent on the music hall system of rivalry.

2909. Would not competition create in the profession of acting a larger number of actors?—No; because actors before they arrive at anything like a knowledge of the profession, are snapped up by the music halls, and consequently they cease to have the ability to take a high position; their style is vitiated by the very applause which they receive from the class of persons they act to.

2910. Do you know how the salaries paid by music hall proprietors compare with the salaries paid paid by the theatrical managers?—There is a different system in the two places; in the music halls they are allowed to have what are called turns, that is to say, they can perform at two or three music halls in a night, by which they can make a very large sum per week; in theatres it is almost impossible to do that, and we do not permit it.

2911. Is it not the case that actors, on the whole, can make more money at music halls than at theatres?—Yes, by that system.

2912. Do you not think that it is interfering with the actor's profession if the Legislature confines him to certain theatres?—I do not think so. I think that if men enter the profession with a love of the art, they should look to the high bearing of it, and not to the mere money getting principle on which those actors at music halls are proceeding.

2913. Are not actors like nearly every other profession in that respect, that they go on the stage for a livelihood as much as from love of the art?—Then they never make great actors. I never knew a great actor who merely looked at pounds, shillings, and pence, in the first course of his education.

2914. Take the art of painting; would not it be hard on a painter if you were to say that he should paint pictures of a certain kind because it would vitiate his taste to paint bad pictures?—Yes, but the two things do not go together; for if a painter takes the lowest order of subjects when he paints, they may still be conducive to a high development of the art; but that is not the case with actors in the same position.

2915. Suppose a painter found that there was a demand for daubs instead of fine pictures, would you say you must not paint daubs?—No, certainly not; nor would I confine an actor so long as he remained in a theatre. Many actors begin with tragedy and end with comedy, while others begin with comedy and end with tragedy.

2916. But by not permitting stage plays at music halls, you confine them to a certain class of acting which is not so remunerative as the other, do you not?—That would depend on what the music halls would attempt to do.

2917. But an actor would be able to make more money at the music halls than at the theatres?—Yes, by those turns he would; but he would not advance in professional reputation.

2918. Have salaries increased much to actors since the music halls have come into vogue?—No, I think not, particularly; they have always been very well paid. I have paid as much as 40*l.* a night to actors.

2919. For how many months in a year?—For nearly the whole season.

2920. Do you know the views of the actors with regard to the music halls?—All actors that have anything like ambition are opposed to them; they would consider it a degradation to act in music halls.

2921. Do you think they would not go there if the music halls were allowed to act stage plays?—Not the higher order of actors.

2922. You think that it would be the lower order of actors who would go there?—It would be the unfledged actors. Before they have learned sufficient of their profession they are tempted to come to London to these music halls, while if they remained in the country studying they might become good actors, to supply the place of those who are gone, which we cannot do now.

2923. You think that the present system of confining acting to theatres is of practical use to the art of acting?—Yes. The school of acting was formerly in the country, and an actor remained there until there was a chance for his talent of an opening in London.

2924. Where is the school now?—It is destroyed in consequence of free trade in the drama; there is no school now.

2925. But have we got free trade in the drama?—Decidedly, great free trade; I took the chair to get free trade for the drama, and I have repented it ever since.

2926. In what way have you got free trade in the drama?—Formerly the patent theatres and the Haymarket were the only theatres that could act the legitimate drama; that was thrown open. I was ambitious and young, and thought I should like a chance of playing a high character of drama, and I took the chair for that object; but experience has taught me that I was wrong.

2927. You think that the fact of there being so many theatres has rather damaged the character of the acting, do you?—No; I do not care how many theatres there are if they are theatres.

2928. But are there theatres in London now which are not theatres?—At times the representation at those music halls approaches theatrical representation; in fact, it is positively theatrical representation.

2929. Has that been going on long enough to have any effect yet?—Yes; good comic actors are taken away and induced to become comic singers; they do those dialogues and speaking songs, which destroys their style, and ultimately they cannot take a position in high comedy or high tragedy in London.

2930. Do you not think that the school of acting in France is fully equal to that in this country?—I think it is very superior.

2931. They have a good many more theatres in Paris than in London, have they not?—I think not; the liberty of theatres does not seem to be understood here at all; that is not in France half what it is in this country; no dramatic representation can take place, nor can a dress be assumed out of a theatre, and I am quite willing to have that same system here.

2932. Do you know how many theatres there are in Paris?—I do not think it is quite as many as we have here.

2933. Colonel Sturt.] Are there more in Paris than in London in proportion to the population?—No; I think not; some of them are exceedingly small; the Bouffes Parisiennes is exceedingly small, and the large theatres are not many.

2934. But would not the existence of a number of small theatres with corresponding performances tend to destroy the character of the acting as much as the music halls?—No; because the same audiences would not go to them; they have not the temptation of drinking and smoking; they endure under that temptation things which they would not otherwise endure.

2935. Do you think that the taste of the public is not at fault quite as much as the music halls if your view is correct?—No; I do not think that the taste of the public generally is at fault at all.

2936. With regard to this inferior kind of acting, if the public disliked it the music hall proprietors would not engage such actors, would they?—I do not know that, but I think that very bad acting and very improper singing is tolerated in in music halls which would not be tolerated in theatres.

B. Webster, Esq.

27 April 1866.

2937. Would the same class of individuals tolerate a thing at a music hall that they would not at a theatre?—I do not think that they have the same publics, exactly.

2938. You think that there is something so special about the drama that it is wise not to leave it to simple supply and demand, like anything else?—I look on the drama as a matter of high art, and I think its development is a great benefit to the public, lifting them far above the usual routine of their lives.

2939. But is there anything special about acting that should induce us to treat it differently from any other art?—I think so; it is composed of a very few members; there are not 2,000 actors in the United Kingdom owing to the difficulty of attaining success. There are very few who attain the first rank; it requires the greatest study, the greatest observation, and the greatest practical illustration; there is no art that requires so much devotion from a man as the art of acting.

2940. If there were no legislation at all about it, do you think that the art of acting would perish altogether?—I think that if there were only one theatre in London it would not answer.

2941. But what I mean is, if there were no legislation at all about it, would the art degenerate?—I do not think it would be right to let any person open a theatre without a guarantee first, with regard to money. In France you must prove that you are capable of conducting the theatre with propriety, or else the Legislature will not grant it to you.

2942. What I mean is this, do you not think that the taste of the public, without any interference of Parliament, would settle the question between good and bad acting?—No, I think that the censorship is quite necessary.

2943. I understood you to say that a certain monopoly must be continued in favour of theatres?—That is impossible now, but if it had never been destroyed I think we should have had much higher acting.

2944. You think we may help to produce high acting by a system of monopoly?—Yes, certainly, because then those who have ambition remain in the country until they can come to fill a proper position in London.

2945. You do not think it is from the deficiency of talent?—Yes, from the deficiency of practised talent.

2946. It comes to this, that you think the drama wants a little nursing?—Yes.

2947. You think that you cannot leave it alone to grow naturally, like other things?—No, it requires great care.

2948. With regard to music halls, you think they would tolerate inferior preformances, because people can smoke and drink there?—Yes.

2949. Is there much more drinking at the music halls than at the theatres?—Yes, certainly. I do not believe in drinking at the theatres; especially with regard to my own, or at Mr. Buckstone's, or at the Olympic, the drinking there is excessively small.

2950. The proportion of your receipts, or rather your profits from that source is small?—Yes, it is not worth the gas that we burn.

2951. If it were necessary would the theatres be willing to give it up?—I have not the slightest objection; it is necessary in case of illness and things of that kind, but beyond that I do not care about it.

2952. Would the music halls be willing to give up the sale of drink on their premises?—I think if it is to elevate the public the sale of drink on the premises should be done away with in music halls.

2953. Do you think it is the province of Parliament to attempt to elevate the public by this sort of artificial measure?—I do not believe in the elevation of the public by music halls.

2954. Have you ever gone into the proportion of profits of either music halls or theatres from the sale of liquor?—I am not cognizant of the profits of music halls, but I have heard that there is a great profit from the sale of drink.

2955. Mr. Locke.] I should like to ask you whether you have changed your opinion since I last had the pleasure of seeing you, and whether you are now prepared to say what, if any, addition you would make to the privileges of music halls, with regard to their performances?—I would keep everything like pieces of theatrical representation from music halls.

2956. What would you restrict them to?—To music and singing, which I think would be more profitable in the end than the style of thing which they now try for.

2957. Do you not think that those persons who keep music halls are the best judges of what is profitable to them?—That may be; but the object of their establishments is the sale of drink, therefore they do not look at the thing as a matter of art.

2958. People would not go there to take refreshments unless there were amusements offered to them, would they?—I think they will go to see good amusements anywhere without any other temptation.

2959. The better the amusement then, the more the public would go?—Yes; but I do not think that dramatic representation is a better amusement for those places.

2960. But why is not a dramatic entertainment a better amusement; is it not the fact that more people go in consequence?—I do not believe so. I believe that the entire temptation is eating, drinking, and smoking, with the amusement of singing.

2961. You think that the music halls, in desiring to give dramatic entertainments, wish to do that which would not be a benefit, but a harm to them?—I think that it would not be a benefit to them, but that it would be a great injury to the drama.

2963. But suppose the music hall proprietors imagine that more people would go to their places if dramatic performances were given?—I do not believe it.

2964. If that were so do you not think that the music hall proprietors, in their own interest, without looking at the public at all, would discontinue dramatic performance necessarily if they found it did not pay?—I think that they are looking at present gain, and not to ultimate results.

2965. What do you mean by that?—I mean that in course of time it would be injurious to them in a pecuniary point of view.

2966. If that were so their producing dramatic performances would be a benefit to the theatres in point of receipts, would it not?—Yes.

2967. Then

2967. Then, upon what principle is it that you object to it?—I do not think that the drama should be degraded by being acted before smoking and drinking in any establishment.

2968. That is simply your reason?—Yes.

2969. The degradation of the drama?—Yes.

2970. So far, the evidence you have given to-day is much the same as was given by Charles Kemble and others, before, I think, the first Committee on dramatic literature, when the distinction between the patent theatres and minor theatres was got rid of?—I never read that evidence, and I never heard it.

2971. But, however, you have heard that there was a struggle then between the minor theatres and the proprietors or managers of Covent Garden, Drury-lane, and the Haymarket Theatres?—I never mixed up in that, for I took the chair to throw open the drama to the minor theatres.

2972. But you never read the report?—Never.

2973. You were instrumental in getting rid of the privileges of the patent theatres?—Yes.

2974. Do you repent of that?—I do, most sincerely.

2975. You think it would have been better if Covent Garden and Drury-lane had been continued as they were?—We should have had a higher order of acting and a higher order of writing.

2976. But we having established free trade to that extent, do you think it is possible to stop?—No, I think not. I think it is impossible to stop with regard to theatres, but there it ought to stop.

2977. Is there any charm in the word theatre; is not any building, properly erected and arranged for the accommodation of the public with regard to their safety and comfort, a theatre; do you see any reason why one building more than another should have the privilege of performing plays, if the people wish to go there, and see them?—Provided that all exclusion of drinking and smoking was carried with it, I see no objection.

2978. But why exclude drinking and smoking?—Because I think it is degrading to act before such a class of people as prefer drinking and smoking to the intellectual amusement of the drama.

2979. But if men like to do it, why should there be a law to hinder it?—The drama would become less and less an art, and less and less an edification.

2980. Do you recollect the late Mr. Robson?—Yes.

2981. Where did he commence his career?—I have heard that Mr. Robson commenced his career at the Grecian; then he went to Dublin to refine himself, and he became an actor.

2982. Was he not an actor at the Grecian?—Not a great actor; he learned his profession more when he went to Dublin.

2983. But still his success had gone to that extent at the Grecian that he obtained an engagement in Dublin?—Yes, at a small salary; not more, I believe, than he had at the Grecian.

2984. But did he not learn to act at the Grecian, in the first instance?—I do not know. The first knowledge that I had of him was at the Grecian, but I should think that he had acted before.

2985. How long was he at the Grecian?—I do not know, but I should think that he had acted before he went there.

2986. But he was there for a considerable time, was he not?—I am told so.

2987. And then he went to Dublin?—Yes.

2988. And then he became one of the most successful actors who ever appeared on the stage?—Yes; he was seen by the late Mr. Farren, who engaged him for the Olympic.

2989. Probably if Mr. Farren had taken the trouble to go to the Grecian he would have taken him from there?—I cannot speak upon probabilities.

2990. We can, at all events, in a great measure attribute the enjoyment which we have obtained from the acting of Mr. Robson to his having been an actor at the Grecian?—All actors have commenced in a humble way. I began in a barn, and Elliston and Kemble did the same; in fact Elliston looked on barns as the hot-beds of genius.

2991. You would not give the music halls the chance of being the hot-beds of genius?—I think talent there would retrograde; but a barn is another thing; the gentlemen and the ladies of the neighbourhood patronise them.

2992. Do not ladies and gentlemen go to music halls?—I should not term them so; I think they are very doubtful people.

2993. Do you think that a person must lose cast by going to a music hall?—Yes; even if my son went there I should not like it; and as to taking my wife and family there I should think I was a scandalous person if I did so.

2994. Why do you think so?—Because a music hall is an immoral place.

2995. If so, is not a theatre immoral too?—No; we exclude all immoral characters; we are bound to do so.

2996. So are the music halls, are they not?—No, they are not, I believe; we cannot admit them, even if we are inclined, and I have not been inclined for the last 30 years.

2997. Are there no immoral characters in your theatre?—None who are known.

2998. Supposing they conduct themselves with propriety; how would you get rid of them?—It is not difficult.

2999. How would you do it?—By detectives.

3000. How do the detectives act?—The detective acts by pointing out when they come to pay that they are immoral characters, and their money is not taken.

3001. Colonel Sturt.] You mean notoriously bad characters?—Not so notoriously bad altogether; but I am bound to do what I cannot explain here.

3002. Mr. Locke.] You never interfere with any lady or gentleman going into a private box, I suppose?—I should do so if they were improper characters.

3003. But you would not inquire into what conduct they pursued in the box?—It must get to the knowledge of the people in the theatre if there was anything improper, and they would be turned out.

3004. Even when the blinds are down?—There are no blinds.

3005. Are there no blinds in the boxes—I mean curtains?—There are curtains, but they are not drawn.

3006. That is at the pleasure of the person who is there, I suppose?—No, most of them are fastened.

3007. But they draw halfway across, do they not?

B. Webster, Esq.

27 April 1866.

not?—If you know better than I do, of course I cannot tell the Committee anything.

3008. Your theatre is differently planned from others?—I think at the Haymarket and at the Olympic there are not drawing curtains, nor is there any respectable theatre would dream of such a thing; there are none at mine.

3009. How many pieces do you say you have produced during a year?—It depends on the run of the pieces.

3010. How many nights did the "Colleen Bawn" run?—Nearly 300, I think, but not consecutive nights.

3011. What breaks were there?—There was one break at Easter, when Mr. Boucicault and his wife went to Dublin for a month; and there was a break after that.

3012. And you played the "Dead Heart" in the breaks?—Yes; I played the "Dead Heart" and "Janet Pride."

3013. How many nights did the "Dead Heart" run?—For 70 nights the first time, and nearly as many on its revival.

3014. There was no new piece performed at your theatre while the "Colleen Bawn" was being acted, was there?—Yes, many.

3015. Small pieces, I suppose?—Yes, small pieces. A good farce will draw a good deal of money; sometimes more than a play.

3016. You perform two or three pieces a night, do you not?—Yes, three pieces.

3017. There is always one piece, I suppose, which you try to make run as long as you can?—No; it depends on the public; we cannot make it run.

3018. But you look forward to its doing so?—Yes.

3019. I believe that the Adelphi has been as successful as any theatre in London in having a long run for its pieces?—Yes.

3020. Going back to "Tom and Jerry" even?—That ran a good many nights, but we had only a six months' license then.

3021. It ran for six months?—Yes; and there was "Black-eyed Susan."

3022. And "Victorine"?—That ran a long time.

3023. The Right Honourable Chairman asked you whether or not, when pieces ran for an immense time at the theatres, it was not injurious to dramatic authors, there being a limited number of theatres, and those theatres being taken up with one particular performance, the dramatic authors have no opportunity of writing for the stage while that is going on, have they?—Other theatres do not have those runs; they have other theatres to turn to; they are not obliged to bring all their pieces to the Adelphi.

3024. Take the Princess's again?—That has been unprecedented.

3025. Take the "Ticket-of-Leave Man" at the Olympic?—Yes, that is another case; those are exceptional cases.

3026. But all those were running together?—Yes.

3027. There are three favourite theatres well occupied?—Yes; and 23 theatres not so occupied.

3028. But there are pieces running at most of those too?—No, I think not.

3029. There was "Ixion" at the Royalty?—That ran for a long time, but that is a one-act piece.

3030. But that was the attraction of the evening; it began at eight o'clock?—But you underrated those small pieces when I spoke of them at the Adelphi, and now you put them against high class plays.

3031. But the performance at the New Royalty is not so long as it is at the Adelphi?—It is just the same number of hours, I think.

3032. It does not begin so soon, and ends sooner, surely?—I think not.

3033. Take the Strand Theatre again?—In those places they bring out a variety of pieces; that success is again only a one-act piece; what are there chief attractions would be my afterpieces.

3034. At the Strand Theatre they have a piece which has a good run, and then they play "Deaf as a Post" (not a great novelty, for I recollect Liston in it) and "Frightened to Death," another old piece, one before and the other after the chief attraction. What chance is there at the Strand Theatre for any other dramatic author than Mr. Burnand who wrote that piece; there is no opportunity given to any other author of exercising his talent, is there?—If they brought a manager as good a piece as "Deaf as a Post" they would get it acted in any theatre in London.

3035. Would the manager be disposed to pay for any other piece if he could fill the house without it?—We must supply fresh entertainments. When the "Colleen Bawn" was drawing crowded houses every night I was forced to give new pieces, and to pay for them.

3036. The house would not have filled without, I suppose?—I could not tell, but you must make the whole entertainment as agreeable as possible.

3037. But if you found that acting a new piece and an old farce would fill a house to suffocation, you would not get a new piece, would you?—Yes, I would.

3038. For the glory of the drama?—I do not know whether I should study the glory of the drama; I should study the excellence of the piece. I do not consider farces the glory of the drama.

3039. But why would you bring out a new piece if your house filled?—Because novelty is agreeable to the public.

3040. Why overload it?—We do overload it; it may be an indiscretion, but we do it, and we think it is right.

3041. What are you doing now?—"Through Fire and Water," "Crying Jenny and Laughing Johnny," and "The Wreck Ashore."

3042. Which is the new piece there?—"Through Fire and Water" "Crying Jenny and Laughing Johnny."

3043. Those are two new pieces?—Yes.

3044. The "Wreck Ashore" is very old, is it not?—Yes.

3045. Is the new piece a long piece?—It is a long two-act piece.

3046. But neither of them has run as long as "Rip Van Winkle"?—No; but the "Wreck Ashore" is quite as important in character, and "Through Fire and Water" is the same.

3047. The two new pieces are about the same length as "Rip Van Winkle" I suppose?—Yes; about the same length.

3048. In fact, you have two new pieces equal together in length to "Rip Van Winkle," and besides that, you have the "Wreck Ashore"?—Yes; but those two separate new pieces will cost more than one piece of three acts; we have two distinct authors to pay, of course.

3049. You

3049. You say that the actors at those music halls have turns?—Yes.

3050. That has been the case sometimes at theatres has it not?—Never.

3051. Not when the same manager has had two theatres?—We do not call those turns, because we are not paid extra; we have to work double and get no extra pay.

3052. Is not that liked among actors?—I think not; it caused a great deal of illness running from one place to the other.

3053. But at the music halls the performance is so short that it does not injure the actor?—No; they keep their broughams.

3054. Do you not think that if we were to introduce a law which would prevent men keeping their broughams, it would be rather a harsh law?—I do not object to men keeping broughams.

3055. But they would not be able to keep broughams if they were not permitted to give these performances?—Certainly; so must I give up my dinner if I give up acting.

3056. But is it not very hard to say that a man shall not have a performance of a kind which will enable him to keep his brougham?—I do not say so.

3057. But you propose that the legislation should be such as to prevent these people from acting in those music halls?—Decidedly.

3058. Must he give up these "turns" which enable him to keep a brougham?—No; one man who never acted at all but sang nigger songs has made his fortune. I do not object to that.

3059. Is the reason why you object to throwing the thing open that it is degrading to the drama to be performed where there is eating, drinking, and smoking?—Yes, it is degrading the art, and I would sooner starve than do it.

3060. But if other people would rather not starve than do it, why should they not please themselves?—Then they have no proper ambition in their profession.

3061. Why should everybody be ambitious?—Such a man can never rise to the head of his profession.

3062. Suppose he likes to live comfortably at the tail of his profession?—It was never intended that the drama should be in that position. We should never have had Shakspere or Sheridan if such a state of things had existed.

3063. How do you know the state of things in the time of Shakspere?—Smoking, eating, and drinking, were not in vogue then.

3064. But they ate and drank in those times, did they not?—Not in the auditorium of the theatre.

3065. But the theatres then were very different from what they are now?—I do not think so.

3066. The love for the stage was much greater, was it not?—In Sheridan's time and in Shakspere's time of course there was some difference.

3067. They always had their performances in the afternoon?—Yes; meals were taken at a different time then; the dinner-hour was one o'clock and supper at eight; now the dinner is at eight o'clock and the supper I do not know when.

3068. You have spoken about the liberty of the theatre in France; are you conversant with the regulations of the drama in France?—Yes, pretty well; I believe very well.

3069. Will you tell us what those regulations are, and what change there has been since the liberty of the theatre has been introduced?—The liberty of the theatre consists in being enabled to represent Molière, or Racine, or Corneille, at any theatre.

3070. That is much the same as what once took place over here?—Almost precisely the same.

3071. Did you see a piece at the Variétés last year called "La Liberté des Théâtres"?—Yes.

3072. Do you recollect a scene in that piece where they represented a place very similar indeed to a music hall where people were dining at tables, and while the performance is going on upon the stage, one of the actors gets hungry and they hand him up a goose?—No; I did not see that.

3073. Apropos of what was that scene, unless the liberty of the theatre extended beyond what you imagine?—If they did a thing of that kind, they could have no dramatic representation.

3074. You would imagine from that that the license granted by the new law extended to performances in music halls, or, at all events, to places where refreshments are taken in the auditorium, would you not?—They have no costume whatever out of the theatres.

3075. You do not mean to say that a performer at a café chantant does not come on dressed?—Only in evening costume; it is contrary to the law.

3076. Did you never see a comic singer come on dressed?—Never in anything but an evening dress; he may put his hat on in any way, or button up his coat awry, or pull up his collar; the ladies sit round on the stage in full evening costume.

3077. But on the Boulevards I thought I had seen comic singers come on dressed?—No; they are more strict now than they were before the liberty of the theatre was granted, and, in fact, they had to stop some of the music halls doing things of that kind; the Liberty of the Theatre Law has defined more strongly the difference between theatres, cafés chantants, and music halls; Theresa sings in "Les Déesses du Bœuf gras," and in "La Femme à Barbe," in evening costume only.

3078. My impression was, that in many of those places some of the comic singers were dressed?—No; they dress in evening costume which they disturb occasionally, but still it is obliged to be evening costume; since the passing of this Act for the liberty of the theatre the thing has been more strictly defined than before.

3079. That is in consequence of the license which has been given to all the theatres?—Yes.

3080. But probably another alteration may take place in France; they have always been very strict with the theatres?—Yes.

3081. Confining each theatre to a particular species of performance?—For many years that has been rather passed over, because the Gymnase has been treading close on to the Théâtre Français with regard to comedy, and has done so for many years.

3082. They could not have acted Molière, for instance, could they?—They never acted Molière; they found their own pieces more profitable; they tried it at the Porte Saint Martin, but they could not represent it; the actors were not up to the work which they had to accomplish; they had not been trained to it.

B. Webster, Esq.

27 April 1866.

3083. When did they try Molière?—Within 12 months since the liberty of the theatres was granted.

3084. But previous to that they could not have tried it even?—No.

3085. Each theatre was confined to a particular class of performance?—No; they were not strictly confined. The Ambigu, and the Porte Saint Martin found it their interest to give strong drames, or pieces of show and spectacle.

3086. Is not it becoming pretty much the same thing now in England?—It is much the same thing with regard to the theatres in both places; I mean with regard to the available talent.

3087. But in Paris they do restrict those music halls, you say?—Out of theatres no costume is allowed.

3088. That does not, however, appear to have improved the condition of the theatres in France?—The condition of the theatres is exceedingly profitable, but they want actors.

3089. But no acting at music halls has been able to degrade the drama in France, and yet there are no actors, you say?—Not of such a high order as there were formerly for plays which require to be represented with completeness and perfection.

3090. But, at all events, in spite of the restriction put upon the music halls, things have fallen off as much in France as you say they have in England?—With respect to the talent.

3091. In one country there are no performances of the stage allowed in music halls, and in the other there are, and yet the result has been precisely the same?—Not precisely the same.

3092. But you say that the available talent has fallen off in both countries?—Yes.

3093. Then that result being the same under different conditions as to the music halls, how can the music halls be having any effect on the matter?—They are taking every chance of future talent away; they may rise in Paris, they may improve in consequence of their strictness, but we shall go the other way.

3094. But that strictness always existed in Paris with regard to music halls, did it not?—No, the great strictness was after the passing of the Act for the liberty of the theatres. You might have seen such a thing as you referred to before the passing of that Act. They attempted to get into "duologues" precisely the same as they do at our music halls, but they were stopped by the Legislature. They said that the public had not theatres enough to go to, and then the Legislature said, "Build theatres, but you must not have theatrical performances out of theatres."

3095. Your great objection is to the eating, drinking, and smoking in those music halls; apart from that, you would have no objection to the Lord Chamberlain licensing performances in any place?—Not with regard to theatres.

3096. You would not object to as many theatres as anybody pleased?—No; you may have as many theatres as you please.

3097. Do you know such a place as the Beaumont Institution, in the Mile End-road?—No.

3098. Do you know the place where Mr. and Mrs. German Reed are in Regent-street?—Yes, the Gallery of Illustration.

3099. Do you see any objection to their giving dramatic performances in places of that description?—No.

3100. The Gallery of Illustration is under the Lord Chamberlain's license, is it not?—Yes, it has the same license that we have.

3101. Do you see any objection to a theatrical license being given to places, such as the Beaumont Institution and St. James's Hall?—Excluding eating, drinking, and smoking, I have no objection.

3102. You think they might act plays anywhere?—Yes, anywhere in a theatre.

3103. Your objections to the eating, drinking, and smoking is that it is too attractive, I suppose?—It is degrading to the art; it is the chief attraction to the people who visit music halls; the other thing is merely an accessory.

3104. But if that accessory was properly regulated and conducted, what is your objection to it?—I object to a theatrical performance in any music hall or place that is not a theatre proper.

3105. Mr. Du Cane.] How do you account for the decline of good acting talent in France?—It is not fairly accounted for, they have much more facility for educating actors than we have; they have the Conservatoire for teaching; but there is a dearth of first rate talent. For instance, they have no Talma, and no Samson; but they have very good actors, and, perhaps, taking the whole run of actors, they have a better class than we have.

3106. You would consider that there are a greater number of first rate actors in France than in England?—Yes.

3107. Have you ever personally visited any of the music halls?—I went to the Alhambra once, and once to the Canterbury Hall; that is all I know of them.

3108. What kind of performances did you see there?—On the stage or in the audience part? because in the audience part the performances are rather disgraceful. I saw a ballet on the stage.

3109. Do you consider that the performance which you saw there came under the definition of acting?—It was a stage representation.

3110. In your experience have you ever known any instance of a music hall turning out a good actor?—Never.

3111. You have never known any instance of an actor getting his education as an actor at a music hall?—Certainly not; in fact, they have not existed long enough for that.

3112. You do not regard them in the same light as the "barns"?—No, because barns were confined to theatrical representations, and there were old actors who taught the young actors.

3113. Take the case of Mr. Robson. You consider that he had learned a great deal before he went to the Grecian?—Very likely, I do not know.

3114. At all events, he had to unlearn what he had learnt at the Grecian, you think?—I cannot say that, because I had not seen him; the Grecian was as a theatre when he acted there; it had been a saloon previously.

3115. I suppose it is a great object to you, as a manager, to get a piece that will give you a long run?—Yes.

3116. Should you consider that the long run of a piece acts as a check in any way to the production of dramatic literature?—I think not; it is rather encouraging than otherwise; it holds out such a hope to authors.

3117. Have dramatic authors in the present day, with the existing number of theatres in London, any difficulty in getting their pieces performed?

performed?—I think not, when they are clever, for there is room for them; many clever pieces are not produced in consequence of the want of an opening, no doubt; but that has been the case from time immemorial. In the olden times, to produce one or two pieces at Drury-lane in the course of an entire season was called a great achievement; we are more rapid now. At Bath, which was the most polished school for acting, to produce two pieces in a season was considered a great event.

3118. If an author writes a good piece, it is sure to be put on the stage at one theatre or another, you think?—I should say so. I should say that good pieces are not so numerous that the 26 theatres in London cannot give them all a chance.

3119. You have never, in any way, at the Adelphi, encouraged any performances of a similar character to those that are given at music halls, such as negro singing or acrobatic performances?—No; I have done ballets, of course; that every theatre does.

3120. I suppose that no negro singer or acrobatic performer of the first class ever reaches the salary that you would give a good actor?—I cannot tell. The one I spoke of, who keeps a brougham, is Mr. Mackney; he is entirely a negro singer; he stuck to it, and he has made a large sum of money; and, I believe, if the music halls were to stick to that class of entertainment they would do the same.

3121. Mr. Locke.] Did he not give Irish songs?—I believe not; I think he was never seen without a blacked face.

3122. Mr. Du Cane.] What sort of audience did you find collected at the Alhambra?—A very mixed audience.

3123. Was it generally inferior to what it is at your own theatre?—Yes.

3124. You have stated already that you are very careful about excluding all immoral characters from your audience?—Yes.

3125. Did you see many women of that class at the Alhambra?—I saw a vast quantity; and a vast quantity of men who are known by the police to be improper characters.

3126. Were they conducting themselves in an orderly manner?—They were not; not on the staircase there.

3127. Do I understand you to say that you exclude immoral women from your theatre, whether they conduct themselves properly or not?—Yes, if we know them. We have detectives; all the theatres I believe have detectives as well as regular police.

3128. Colonel Sturt.] I suppose that you and other proprietors of theatres would not have invested capital in your theatres if you had contemplated the law being altered in favour of music halls?—No.

3129. Do you think that that would be an injustice to you now?—Yes. My theatre is my own freehold, and that would be very injurious to my property. I believe Mr. Buckstone will tell you that his second price is so entirely destroyed by the music halls that he is about to withdraw it altogether. I have taken 40 l. a night second price at one time when I was playing farces only; I do not think now that he takes 40 s. a night.

3130. Have you ever had any occasion to complain of the way in which the Lord Chamberlain has conducted the censorship?—No.

3131. You can suggest no improvement in the present system?—No; it is very good. I have been manager now of the Haymarket and Adelphi Theatres for 30 years, and I have no complaint to make.

3132. You would not wish for any change in that system?—No, I should not. If the music halls were placed under a censorship, it would be to the advantage of the public, the songs particularly, because some of those songs are not fit for modest ears.

3133. You would not object to the music halls being licensed by the Lord Chamberlain if smoking and drinking were done away with?—If they are turned into theatres I have no objection to all the music halls being licensed, provided they exclude drinking, eating, and smoking, and improper characters, as we are bound to do.

3135. Colonel Sturt.] You say that you saw disorderly conduct going on at the Alhambra or the Canterbury Hall?—Yes; it was a long time ago when I was at the Canterbury Hall.

3136. Did you observe disorderly conduct then?—Not that night.

3137. At some time you observed disorderly conduct on some "staircase," I think you said?—Yes, certainly, in the Alhambra; I should say most disorderly conduct.

3138. Was it an actual row?—No, it was an exhibition of persons that was quite of an ad libitum kind.

3140. Mr. Locke.] Women do not bet, do they?—I dare say they do; I have heard that women of easy virtue do so.

3141. Lord Eustace Cecil.] Can you tell me what are the regulations with regard to eating and drinking at the cafés chantants in Paris?—I have never seen any eating there.

3142. Nor drinking?—Yes, but it is mostly coffee.

3143. Is it allowed in front of the stage?—It is all in the open air.

3144. But there is a stage on a structure in the open air?—It is in front entirely; it is a sort of garden.

3145. Eating and drinking is allowed in front of the stage, is it not?—I have never seen any eating; it is coffee and beer principally.

3146. But no spirits or wine?—The French do not take much spirits.

3147. But they take beer?—Yes; they take a great deal of beer.

3148. That is allowed?—Yes; and in all the theatres you may get spirits or wine, or anything you please, except for eating.

3149. Of course beer, under certain circumstances, if it is well adulterated, is often just as much intoxicating as spirituous liquors?—Yes.

3150. Mr. Du Cane.] It is Strasburg beer, I suppose?—Strasburg beer and Bock-bier, which is not very intoxicating; it is like drinking water mixed with sugar.

B. Webster, Esq.

27 April 1866.

3151. Lord Eustace Cecil.] It is the practice, is it not, to supply beer in the theatres, in the body of the house?—Not in the body of the house, but in the saloons they do.

3152. Is it restricted to oranges and ginger-beer?—Nothing is carried round the theatre that I have, nor in any respectable theatre that I know of.

3153. You have no reason to believe that it is done at any theatre at the West-end?—No. I cannot speak with regard to the East-end.

3154. Is there a refreshment bar in the pit at the Adelphi?—Yes, at the back of the pit.

3155. Not in the body of the house?—Not in the body of the house.

3156. At the side, I suppose?—Yes; it is the extra building of the house.

3157. Mr. Locke.] Is it just at the back of the seats?—Yes; but it is not within the walls of the theatre.

3158. Mr. Du Cane.] To put it short, can those who are at the bar see the performance?—No, they cannot; the door is closed. At times they are all in the dark. There are scenes where we require the lights to be turned down, just as we do on the stage. There are hardly any spirits consumed in the Adelphi; the great articles consumed are ices, coffee, ginger-beer, and lemonade.

3159. Lord Eustace Cecil.] But neither spirits nor beer?—Not in any considerable proportion.

3160. Beer is consumed, I suppose?—Yes, but they go out for it; the chief part of the audience go out for it.

3161. But still they can get it inside the house?—Yes, ladies cannot go out of the theatre, and when we were not allowed to sell spirits we were continually being informed against. I have every now and then had to bribe persons not to inform, because the refreshment room keeper would sell spirits.

3162. If a lady felt faint in the body of the house could she get a glass of hot brandy and water?—Yes, and so she could, if it were not sold there, from the next tavern.

3163. There is no absolute prohibition against carrying spirits into the body of the theatre, is there?—Not into the private boxes. I should not allow it in the pit or dress circle, because it would interrupt the performance, but private boxes are different; ladies, who are ladies, do not like to go into the saloons or to mix in the body of the audience.

3164. There has been no case of drunkenness that you can remember from that practice?—No, I do not know of any, the person would be immediately turned out by the police, and so they would in any theatre in the East-end.

3165. There has been a good deal said before this Committee about the admission of strangers behind the scenes, is that ever the practice in the theatres?—No, I have been always strongly opposed to that, and I have seen it opposed in every theatre. One Royal Duke said that he would take a private box for the whole of the year if I allowed him a key to go behind the scenes, and I told him that I would not do so if he took the whole theatre.

3166. You know of no such case at the West-end?—I believe that gentlemen are allowed to go behind at the Italian theatres, but they are not associated with us at all.

3167. You mean the Italian Opera?—Yes.

3168. Used that to be the practice in former years?—Not within my knowledge. I have heard that Mr. E. T. Smith admitted gentlemen behind the scenes if they took a stall for the year, but that has never been done by any dramatic manager in my time that I know of, and indeed that is only hearsay.

3169. You have no positive evidence about that?—No.

3170. You do not believe that it is the fact now?—It is not so in any theatre that I have been in.

3171. Lord Ernest Bruce.] During the great number of years that you have been manager the number of theatrical houses has been very much increased?—Yes.

3172. I think you are about one of the oldest managers that we have?—Yes.

3173. When you first took the management of a theatre there were not then so many theatres open under the license of the Lord Chamberlain as there are now?—No.

3174. There are now 25 theatres, without the Windsor theatre?—Yes.

3175. Do you think that that increase has been an advantage to the higher class of drama, and that it has encouraged it, or do you think it has lowered its character?—I do not think that the absolute opening of more theatres has done so; but I think the freedom given to the theatres has caused a deterioration of the drama.

3176. Now in consequence of the number of theatres which are now open the difficulty is very much increased of giving a play in the manner in which you would like to do it?—Yes.

3177. Especially with regard to the old comedies, or to Shakespear's plays?—Yes.

3178. Take the "School for Scandal," or the "Rivals," or say any of Shakespear's comedies, in consequence of the number of theatres open you cannot get a good company to act all the minor parts, I suppose?—No.

3179. You get two or three good ones, and the rest you are forced to fill up as well as you can?—Yes; because the freedom of the theatres has dispersed the talent. A man that should be playing a walking gentleman at the Haymarket or Drury Lane, can play "Hamlet" at the East-end, and he prefers that, and he gets a larger salary for it.

3180. That, you think, is in consequence of our having free trade in the legitimate drama?—Yes.

3181. Do you find another thing against you, and that is the hours which are now kept in London for dining compared with what you and I can recollect; is not the practice of dining so extremely late, very injurious to your business?—It is not injurious in an audience point of view; the only thing is, that we are forced to commence with the chief attraction later in the evening; now we have a lever du rideau which we did not before.

3182. On the French system?—Yes, on the French system.

3183. Do you find that the old plays draw now as much as they used to do?—One of the old plays, a fine tragedy or comedy, would draw as much as ever.

3185. That

3185. That was a bad system, was it not?—Decidedly bad.

3186. You think that is going out?—Yes.

3187. Taking the Adelphi Theatre, which you have rebuilt and made much larger, what should you call a good house; I do not mean quite full; but what do you call a house that you do not lose by?—£. 150 would be a very fair business.

3188. What does it cost you to open the doors without any extraordinary attraction and without the price of the play?—You must include that.

3189. But what are your nightly expenses without the price of the play?—You must include that.

3190. You do not open your doors, I suppose, under 150 l. a night?—Yes under 100 l. 100 l. is about the average.

3191. Now what is the average price that you pay for a good comedy, or a good play to an author like Mr. Tom Taylor, or some of the best of them?—I have paid 600 l. down on the reading of a play for a comedy, and had all the risk of its success afterwards.

3192. Does that give you the copyright?—No.

3193. The author retains that?—Yes.

3194. Therefore, I suppose he is entitled to get it acted in any theatre?—Yes.

3195. Chairman.] Does the price you pay give you no kind of monopoly?—For the first three years, for that theatre, but if I were to play it in any other theatre, I should have to pay the author.

3196. You have the exclusive privilege for three years?—Yes.

3197. Lord Ernest Bruce.] You have been to Paris and seen the dancing places, and all the other things out in the open air in the Champs Elysées, those places appear to fill and yet the theatres appear to fill?—Yes.

3198. The French are a much more theatrical nation than we are?—Yes, they do not drink after dinner.

3199. You do not think that a café chantant in St. James's Park would at all damage your receipts, do you?—I do not think it would be injurious.

3200. If Theresa was to come and sing in this country, and the weather was as warm as it is to-day, she would draw very well in the open air, would she not?—She does not sing in the open air now; she sings at the Alcazar; she is in evening costume, not in dramatic costume. I do not object to anything in evening costume, except dramatic representations.

3201. What you wish is to confine theatrical performances to the theatres?—Yes.

3202. And to keep the music and dancing rooms to music and dancing?—Yes.

3203. You do not object to either in their own sphere?—No, I object to ballet being performed there.

3204. You consider ballets stage representations?—Yes, it is part of the attraction of a portion of our seasons.

3205. Now with regard to eating, drinking, and smoking in the music halls; in a theatre of course, the great object is the performance?—Yes.

3206. But persons have to eat and drink?—They do not eat in my house.

3207. There is a practice between the acts, of women going round to offer people refreshments?—That is not done in any respectable theatre; perhaps in no theatre since they are allowed to have a bar; but I am certain with regard to the West-end theatres.

3208. The practice of going round to private boxes and offering drink is quite abandoned, is it?—I do not know whether they do not go and ask between the acts if they wish to take any ice or refreshment in the private boxes, but they do not carry anything.

3209. It has been objected to very much that in the Alhambra music hall, and at other places, persons are allowed to go behind the scenes; that is a practice that is abandoned in your house, and in all theatres, is it not?—Entirely. Since I have been manager, which is now 30 years, I have never permitted such a thing.

3210. In Drury-lane and Covent-garden, in former days, the green-room was a resort where a great many persons came?—They were connected with the theatre; they were part of the committee who had a privilege by right of going in.

3211. But still, in former days, I think the green-room was a room where people did meet in that way; even formerly, members of the Royal Family used to go and see some of the great artists?—Not purposely, I think; if they were in the theatre they might do so.

3212. That is done away with?—Yes.

3213. No persons are admitted behind the scenes, or into the green-rooms, who are not either authors or artists, or persons connected with the house?—Not that I know of.

3214. That I believe is the wish of the principal performers?—Yes, decidedly.

3215. Is it not the fact that the leading artists, both ladies and gentlemen, have a very strong objection to idle people coming in?—Yes, it is an interruption, and it would be impossible to carry on the business of a theatre if that was permitted.

3216. Mr. O'Beirne.] When you spoke of free trade in theatres, I suppose you meant free trade subject to certain regulations from the Lord Chamberlain?—No, what I meant was liberty to act the legitimate drama.

3217. Yes, but do you object to the legitimate drama being performed at the music halls if they are subject to the same restrictions as the theatres?—Most decidedly. I object to the drama being performed in any place where eating, drinking, and smoking takes place.

3218. But if the music halls were subject to the same regulations as theatres, smoking, eating, and drinking could not take place in the auditorium?—If that was entirely removed from the auditorium, they may be turned into theatres if they please. I have no objection.

3219. You have no objection to competition, provided that the competition were on similar conditions for all parties?—No; every music hall may be turned into a theatre if you please, supposing the competition is fair, provided the place is a theatre proper.

3220. With regard to supervision, have you considered what class of supervision you desire should be adopted; would you desire to change the present system at all?—No; I think the present power is very good.

3221. Is it sufficient for all purposes?—Yes; and very correctly, and very ably carried out.

3222. You think it is sufficient for the safety of the public?—Yes; there is a regular examination of every theatre, which takes place by a paid surveyor before a license is granted.

B. Webster, Esq.

27 April 1866.

3223. You think that those powers are sufficient for the protection of the public with regard to the safety of the house, and also with regard to the public safety, in a moral sense?—They have no funds for prosecuting parties infringing the law. I think there ought to be some sum allowed for that purpose, and that the managers should not be brought into the unpleasant position of giving information against those things. The Lord Chamberlain ought to see the drama properly carried out in all its phases without infringement of the law.

3224. You would increase the present powers of the department?—Yes.

3225. Are there now many theatres where high-class pieces are performed?—Yes, they are performed at every theatre. At the Standard "Henry the Fourth" and "King John" are performed in good style.

3226. But I mean new pieces of a high order?—Yes, they are continually bringing out new pieces.

3227. Is there perfect facility for authors who produce good standard pieces to get them represented?—Yes, there is every facility; the only question is whether the terms meet their views.

3229. Mr. Powell.] Do you find the audience at those theatres more appreciative of really good high-class acting than the audiences at the West End?—Not more appreciative, but quite as appreciative.

3230. Mr. O'Beirne.] Can you inform the Committee, out of the 26 theatres, at how many, in your experience, say for 10 years past, high-class plays have been the rule rather than the exception?—They have been the exception rather than the rule; the legitimate drama is the exception.

3231. Can you tell us any theatre at which it has been the rule?—I do not know of any theatre where it has been the rule.

3232. By the legitimate drama you mean not only stock pieces but new ones?—Yes; new ones taking the form and character of the legitimate drama.

3233. Does that arise from the want of taste on the part of the audiences, or the want of production on the part of the authors?—I think that the taste of the audiences is quite ready to meet such a supply.

3234. You think that it is the supply that is not forthcoming?—The supply is not forthcoming.

3235. Since you took that active part in opening the theatres, you think that acting, as a profession, has not improved?—Yes, the school was lost for it.

3236. With regard to the pieces performed; have you the same opinion with regard to their decay as you have with regard to the decay of good acting?—I think that if the same amount of acting talent existed, we should have finer plays written.

3237. But they are not written now?—No; the difficulty as to the acting is so apparent, that there is not that inducement to the author to devote his time to writing plays.

3238. Have we not had some very good plays written during the last 10 years?—Yes; of course there are exceptions; and perhaps there were not more good plays produced formerly than there are now. Take Drury Lane in Garrick's time, or after it; if they produced two plays in a season at that time it was thought a great thing. I think there are more good plays produced now than in the time of Garrick.

3239. Do you think that on the whole, the productions of the authors have rather improved?—Writers are more numerous now; education has advanced so much.

3240. The Committee heard from Mr. Donne that he had a very decided opinion that authors have very much improved in the style of their pieces compared with 20 years ago?—There is an improvement; but I do not see anything so good as some pieces written 20 or 30 years ago. Take Bulwer's comedy of "Money," or the chief plays by Sheridan Knowles.

3241. Take Mr. Westland Marston's plays?—They are very good, no doubt; but take Douglas Jerrold's "Bubbles of the Day." I do not see anything so good now.

3242. You would confine your opinion, then, to the immediate present day?—That is 20 years ago, or more.

3243. In your management, when you happen to have a long run for a play, does that stop you from considering any good pieces that are sent you in the meantime?—No; it does not stop me from considering them, nor does it stop me from paying for them.

3244. You pay for a piece in anticipation of being able to produce it?—Yes; I have a supply always on hand.

3245. Now, with regard to the Grecian Saloon; do you know that the Grecian Saloon and the Eagle Tavern were separate establishments?—I think it is not called the Grecian Saloon now.

3246. But when we knew the names of the Grecian Saloon and the Eagle Tavern, were they, in fact, separate establishments, or one establishment?—One establishment, but they were detached; the theatre portion did not join the other part.

3247. That part of the building in which the performances took place was, in effect, a theatre?—Yes.

3248. And the saloon, which was quite apart, from the theatre, was the place where eating, drinking, and smoking went on?—Before they obtained a license there was drinking in the auditorium, but they did not have costumes or change of scenes, and they had a piano on the stage.

3249. Is it possible, that, in any of the private boxes at any of the better class of theatres in London, any immorality could go on?—I think not; they are so open to every person on the stage, the carpenters, and everybody else.

3250. Mr. Walpole.] I think you have stated that you consider the drama is in a bad state both here and in Paris?—Bad, compared with former times; not positively bad; we have no Kemble or Macready now.

3251. You mean, as compared with the times when Kemble, Macready, Young, Liston, Farren, and Dowton, and so on, were on the stage?—Yes; and Samson and Talma on the French stage.

3252. Can

3252. Can you trace the recent deterioration of the drama, as compared with those times, to any particular causes?—I think that free trade in the legitimate drama is the cause.

3253. On account of the diminution of the number of good actors?—The scattering of the talent.

3254. In other words, when you had only three theatres like Covent Garden, Drury Lane, and the Haymarket for the legitimate drama, you had all the companies concentrated in those three theatres, and, therefore, the talent was not dispersed?—Just so; then we had schools in the country, such as Edinburgh, Dublin, and Bath. Bath was the finishing school. Those actors who were ambitious used to hold on at those theatres until an opening offered, and then they came up to London finished actors, having associated with the best actors in the country schools; they would not go to the minor theatres at all, and, unless they could play the legitimate drama, they would not come to London.

3255. The country theatres were nurseries for the legitimate drama?—Yes. Bath was the polishing school, and that was the stepping-stone to London.

3256. I suppose that something may be attributed to the different tastes of different ages?—No, I think not. If you give a good article to the public the taste is as good as ever it was.

3258. I suppose that was chiefly from imitating French plays and customs?—Yes; many of them were translations from the Spanish and the French.

3259. You have already stated that a fine comedy or a fine tragedy would, even now, attract as much as it formerly did?—Yes; if it were put on the stage with an equal cast.

3260. You think that it is the want of a sufficient amount of talent concentrated in one place, and ready for the effective representation of high-class plays, that has altered the character of the dramas produced in recent times?—Yes. I think that the taste of the public has not altered at all; it is as good as ever it was, and perhaps better, because improved education has made more people capable of appreciation.

3261. You were comparing the present days with those days when Kemble, Macready, and Munden were on the stage; did they not act a greater variety of tragedies and comedies then, in the course of a week, than you do now?—Yes; pieces had not such runs as they have now; but they were mostly old pieces. And then there is another consideration; some of the principal actors in those plays could not stand the fatigue of acting on consecutive nights. In those days they used to play three or four nights a-week, but that was a matter of necessity; it was peremptory on the managers to do so.

3262. If you had the same number of good actors, you think that you would have a supply of pieces of equal merit, and you attribute almost everything in the deterioration of the stage to what you call free trade in the drama, and the diminished number of good actors in the separate companies?—Yes, there are many good actors spoilt; they tried to do the first characters before they are half fit for them, and the consequence is that they get into a bad style.

3263. I understood you to say that you have no objection whatever to a complete competition between different places of public representation, provided they are all licensed as theatres?—Just so.

3264. Still, even that would diminish of course the chance of concentrating the actors in one spot?—That is a fact; that is a past event that we cannot recover; if we could recover that, I should say, do so.

3265. But, in distinguishing between theatres and music halls, you would have perfect free trade and competition, but where they wanted to introduce the drama as a secondary attraction there you would draw a broad line?—Yes, I would allow nothing in the shape of a dramatic performance to be represented anywhere except in a theatre.

3266. Would you apply that to any part of a play?—Yes, to any part or portion of a play in a dramatic form. You may have as many theatres as you please, and have free trade as far as possible; in fact I have always considered that there has been free trade.

3268. Even if the proposed change were made, you must have a different thing from the mere license now taken out from the magistrates, and different regulations, if the public are to be quite secured with regard to the structure of the building and the means of ingress and egress?—If the music halls are turned into theatres, the Lord Chamberlain would give them a license as theatres, and they must succumb to the rules and regulations of the Lord Chamberlain, which I think would be perfectly correct.

3269. What you really object to is, that those music halls, the principal attractions of which are eating, drinking, and smoking, should be put into unfair competition with a licensed theatre, you, as a theatrical manager, being perfectly willing to encounter any fair competition with theatres?—Yes. The music halls have injured our receipts very much, but we do not mind the number of theatres being increased, because the best performances would, we think, be patronised.

3271. Even with regard to scenes taken out of a drama, you could not draw a line and allow those scenes to be represented so that you could make a law to distinguish between the theatres and the music halls?—No, I would not allow any portion of a drama to be represented in the music halls; that would create confusion in time. Take, for example, the screen scene in the "School for Scandal"; that is the great point of the piece, and

B. Webster, Esq.

27 April 1866.

and if you allow that to be done in the music halls you take the pith and marrow of our representation away. The music halls would, of course, take the choice bits.

3272. Are you apprehensive, then, that if the music halls were to be allowed to act any part of a play without taking out a license for the performance of the drama, the drama would still further deteriorate as compared with what it is now?—Yes, I think so, and ultimately it would crush the art.

3273. Could you "crush the art" without diminishing the inducement to good authors to write plays?—Of course not.

3274. Mr. Selwin.] You say that the music halls would naturally select the best parts of pieces to act?—Yes.

3275. But you said also that good actors, as a body, would not be found acting at those music halls?—Yes; but those good parts would be acted by inferior actors, and that makes all the difference. For example, take the "Screen scene" in the "School for Scandal;" persons who saw it exhibited in an inferior way at a music hall would have a bad opinion of the play, and would not go to see it at a theatre.

3276. Do you think that the same class of persons would frequent both places; I think you have stated that the people who frequented music halls would not be the same class of people as those who went to the theatres?—As a body they would not, but there are many people of the same class who go to music halls as well as theatres.

3277. Are there not a very large number of actors who find a difficulty in getting employment at the theatres?—I do not think so; I do not think there is any actor at all capable of performing who cannot get an engagement.

3278. Mr. Frederick Stanley said, the other day, before this Committee, that the music hall proprietors would be content, as a body, to enact small pieces with only two or three performers; do you consider that that would be a detriment to the theatres?—Yes, I do; I think that anything like a theatrical representation ought not to be presented in any building where there is eating, drinking, and smoking, going on.

3279. In regard to the Lord Chamberlain's censorship over the pieces, it was stated the other day that the number of small pieces and the number of things acted at the music halls would make it very difficult to bring them under a censorship similar to that of the theatres; do you consider that that would be the case?—I do not see why it should be so if there was a law to compel the sending in of everything.

3280. But it was suggested that the rapidity with which they have to put on fresh pieces to fill up gaps was so great that they could not keep them all under the eye of the Lord Chamberlain?—I object to their acting them at all in any shape or form; I am certain that it is an error of judgment.

3281. With regard to the Cafés Chantants, as far as regards those in Paris, there are merely stages in the open air?—Yes; they are always attached to the restaurants.

3282. Where people sit with chairs and tables and drink their coffee?—Yes.

3283. The pieces are not acted continually; half an hour or so elapses after one performance before anything else takes place?—Yes; the ladies sit on the stage, and there is an orchestra, and there are tables and chairs beyond in a sort of garden that is attached to the restaurants.

3285. You have stated that the amount of remuneration derived from the sale of refreshments in theatres was no inducement whatever to keep the sale of refreshments in existence?—Not to me, certainly.

3286. Would there be any objection if that license for the sale of spirits were done away with?—I should not raise any objection. I have already said that I was often in danger of being informed against, because people would supply spirits, and charge an enormous sum for them.

3287. Could you not by any exercise of power sufficiently check that practice?—It is impossible to check the practice if a person choses to carry it in his pocket.

3288. When you acted in theatres on the other side of the water, were you aware of refreshments being more largely distributed in the auditorium, than in the theatres at the West End?—No, I was not aware of it, and I never experienced any interruption while acting.

3289. Mr. Powell.] You have made use of a phrase which we have frequently heard here, namely, "the legitimate drama;" can you define that phrase in other words?—The legitimate drama is the class of plays that Shakespere wrote; the class of plays that Sheridan wrote, and Congreve wrote; it takes its special character from the order of the writing. It used to be considered that it must consist of only five acts; but I conceive the legitimate drama not to consist in the number of the acts, but in the order of writing and the construction, and the style of composition altogether.

3290. Should you consider the burlesques which are now so popular as belonging to the legitimate drama?—Certainly not. I think they are most injurious to the drama, because they turn the serious effects of the drama into ridicule; I think they are the bane of our art.

3291. With regard to the drinking which takes place at your theatre, or other theatres, on this side of the water, you say that it is merely taking ordinary refreshments, such as a person may naturally require during a long performance?—Yes; they do not take it in all the theatres; at the West End of London the people chiefly go out for refreshments; they fancy they get it better outside, and I think they do.

3292. You have spoken of the deterioration of the artistic talent shown on the stage in France?—Yes.

3293. I believe there can be no doubt that there are plays licensed in Paris which would not receive the license of the Lord Chamberlain, which seems to imply a degradation of the public taste. Do you think that degradation of the public taste and the permission to minister to it by the public authorities has had anything to do with the decline of talent on the stage in France?—They have a freer style of drama in France than we have in England.

3294. Do you think that the existence of that freer style of drama (to apply no stronger epithet), has had anything to do with the diminution of talent in France?—Yes, I think so; I think the "Biche aux Bois," the "Lanterne Magique," and those things, are very deteriorating.

3295. Reverting to the evidence given before a Committee of this House, in the year 1832, wherein very strong language is used with regard to the effect of throwing open theatres, I find Mr. Charles Matthews said that if the legitimate drama were to be played at other theatres beyond the patent theatres, or the Haymarket, it would brutalise the drama, and be a great injury to it; do you believe that was substantially true?—Yes.

3296. Do you think, since then, you have seen first a deterioration and then an improvement?—I have not seen any improvement in the legitimate drama.

3297. The first effect of throwing open the theatres would be to create a larger demand and an imperfect supply; a falling off in the available talent in comparison with the number of theatres opened?—The class of pieces played at theatres that were then termed minor theatres has vastly improved, but the class of pieces and acting at what were then termed legitimate theatres has not improved.

3298. Do you consider that the minor theatres in London have now become a good school for actors?—They are a very superior class of theatres to what they once were.

3299. Should you apply the same terms to the country theatres, such as Liverpool, Manchester, and those places?—I think they have all deteriorated with regard to acting, and with regard to even the class of pieces which they represent.

3300. Extending your knowledge to the provinces and not London only, do you find that young men of ability, industry, and talent are applying their minds to acting so as to afford hope that there is a rising school of promising performers?—There is no school at all. The variety of pieces that they play continually, except when they have a star there, makes it impossible for a young actor to devote his mind to his profession, because there are so many words to get into his head. I have known 18 pieces played in one week in one theatre, and the actor had to study his 18 parts; the only thing he could do was to scramble through the words in any way.

3301. You have no reason to complain of the way in which the Lord Chamberlain has exercised his authority with regard to theatres?—Not the least.

3302. He has not been slow or vexatious?—No, he has been very accommodating.

3303. Looking at the number of plays written, of course there is a limit to the number of plays which one author can write, is there not?—I do not think so; one man has more facility in the production of a play than another; it depends on the genius of the writer.

3304. Do you think that one or two writers of ability could do much towards supplying your theatre with pieces?—No, not one or two, or half-a-dozen; it would take a dozen good authors, and then perhaps they would not accomplish the feat.

3305. Are there many pieces written now that are fit for the stage, which are not presented?—There may be; that I cannot say.

3306. I speak of those pieces that are laid before the managers?—We have a vast number laid before us as managers which are destitute of composition with regard to plot, though they have fine bursts of language.

3307. I speak of pieces that are thoroughly fit for the stage?—There is always a very fair supply.

3308. Mr. Clive.] You said something about the country theatres; how do you account for the almost entire cessation of country theatres?—In every town that I know there are theatres, and more than I ever knew before.

3309. Are you acquainted with the ordinary county towns in England?—Yes.

3310. Will you mention any one of those which has a theatre open?—There is Liverpool, Bath, Exeter, Bristol, and Birmingham.

3311. These are capitals; but take towns of under 50,000 inhabitants?—They amount to hundreds; I cannot speak to them.

3312. Are there not a vast number of theatres closed in county towns?—I think not.

3313. Shrewsbury and Worcester, for example?—The Worcester theatre has been opened this year; it is never a prosperous place, but it has been opened within a month.

3314. Take Gloucester?—That theatre has been opened; Miss Menkin was there not long since, and Mr. Swanborough.

3315. How many nights did Miss Menkin play?—I cannot say.

3316. But are you not aware that that is very exceptional?—No, I do not know that they are. Formerly there were circuits for different companies; there was the York circuit and the Norwich circuit. They went round six weeks to one place and six weeks to another, and so they filled up the year. Those theatres are now opened for longer times together than they were formerly.

3317. Is there not a strong feeling about religion in county towns, which has affected the country theatres a great deal?—I think not.

3318. You have stated that you thought the representation of the screen scene from the "School for Scandal" at a music hall would essentially damage the estimation of that play?—I think so.

3319. Do you not think that the run of a sensation piece for 100 nights does more than that could do to damage the legitimate drama?—Certainly not; it does not injure the theatres, nor does it spoil the public taste.

3320. Do you not think it better that second-rate folks, if they are the class who frequent the music halls, should hear two scenes of a good play than none at all?—Yes, if they could hear it in a theatre, and would go to a theatre.

3321. Do you think that they would go?—All the respectable classes would.

3322. Do you not think that some people's minds may be the better for a little training?—Yes; but I do not think that they can be trained on gin, beer, and tobacco; it is casting pearls before swine. I do not believe in the respectability of the audiences at the music halls.

3323. Do you think that the public taste produces the acting, or the acting the taste?—I think that the public taste guides the actor greatly.

3324. Is that the way you account for the run of those sensation pieces for 100 nights?—Yes.

3325. The bad taste of the public?—I do not think it is bad taste to go and see a piece for 100 nights; sometimes it is good taste.

3326. Take a sensation drama: do you consider that the taste produces the actor, or the actor the taste?—The taste produces the actor.

B. Webster, Esq.
27 April 1866.

Sensation drama is a word which I took from the American dramatic element. But "Macbeth" is a sensation drama, and the "Tempest" is a sensation drama, for they have all sensational effects.

3327. But still you said that Shakespere was legitimate drama?—Yes, it is legitimate drama, because it is high-class acting.

3328. Do you think that the "Ticket of Leave Man" is legitimate drama?—No.

3329. But that play has had a great run, has it not?—Yes.

3330. Upwards of 100 nights?—Yes, it is a good drama and well written, but not a legitimate drama.

3331. But during all that time the public could not have heard, at the Olympic Theatre, any legitimate drama?—They had 25 other theatres to go to.

3332. Were they not all playing the pieces that paid them best?—Yes, no doubt they were trying to do that.

3333. Do not those pieces pay better than the more legitimate plays?—No, not if the latter are properly represented. I think the "Ticket of Leave Man" attained its fame from being so evenly acted and put together; if a play is completely done in all its parts it is pleasing.

3334. You think that this dramatic propriety made the "Ticket of Leave Man" so popular?—Yes, I think the way in which it was acted, down to the lowest part, was one of the charms of the piece, the ensemble was so good.

3335. Mr. Locke.] You have stated that the number of country theatres has not been diminished?—I think they have increased rather.

3336. Is it within your recollection that there was a theatre at Chelmsford?—I do not know; that was almost a village.

3337. Do you recollect a theatre at Maidstone?—There is one there now, it was built formerly as a chapel; in some places chapels have become theatres.

3338. Is not it an ordinary case that theatres are turned into chapels?—No, it is an extraordinary case. In Kent there is a feeling for turning theatres into chapels, but they have returned the compliment in other places.

3339. Can you mention any place where a chapel has been turned into a theatre?—At Margate it was so, but they have a theatre there again now.

3340. Had they a theatre before?—Yes, and it was turned into a chapel.

3341. Now they have turned it back again?—Not the same place.

3342. But they always had a theatre at Margate years ago, had they not?—Not for one or two seasons.

3343. Maidstone is shut up, is it not?—I do not know.

3344. And Lewes?—I do not know.

3345. The Guildford theatre is shut up also; that theatre now is turned into an upholsterer's shop, so that four places on the Home Circuit have had their theatres shut up?—Not all the year round, I think.

3346. Do you recollect Mr. Barnett's troupe; that is discontinued, is it not?—He is dead.

3347. Has anybody else got it?—Yes, the Reading Theatre is open, and Ryde is open.

3348. Those four theatres I have mentioned are all shut up, are they not?—Probably you know better than I do, but I believe there are theatres in those places open at some time during the year. None of those theatres were ever open above two or three months in the year, in the best of times.

3349. When the circuit went round, they always used to be open during the circuit time?—Yes, for a month or six weeks out of the year.

3350. Colonel Sturt.] You say you think that burlesque is the bane of the drama; would a good burlesque like the "Maid and the Magpie" draw better than almost anything else?—Not better.

3351. As well?—No, not as well; I think it is a great injury to the drama. My opinion is, that everything which tends to ridicule the drama must be bad.

3352. But you admit that the public are very fond of burlesques?—I think they have been taught to be fond of burlesques, and that they might be taught to be fond of other things.

3353. Mr. Du Cane.] Do you not consider that burlesques are the creation of almost the last 20 years?—No; the "Critic" and the "Rehearsal" were burlesques.

3354. But are they not a revival of the last 20 years?—There is "Bombastes Furioso," which was played 50 years ago, and the "Critic," a 100 years ago. That is as good a burlesque as ever was written, and of a very high order.

3355. But did not the modern school originate with Mr. Planché's "Fortunio and his Seven Gifted Servants," the "Fair One with the Golden Locks," "Prince Charming," and so on?—Yes.

3356. The style of burlesque has very much deteriorated within the last 20 years, has it not?—Yes.

3357. Do you consider that the music halls have had any effect in bringing about that result?—It is certainly a singular thing that the most attractive parts of those burlesques, the breakdown dances and so on, are taken from the music halls.

3358. Chairman.] I mean, as a witness before this Committee who would be able to give the best information with regard to the state of the drama in the provinces, is there any London manager who is especially connected with those provincial theatres; Mr. Buckstone has got a theatre in Bradford, has he not?—Yes; I do not know that you could get better information than from myself and Mr. Buckstone, but, of course, those small places we never go to.

3359. Mr. Powell.] Have you ever taken a theatre in Manchester or any of those large towns for a short time?—Yes; I had the Liverpool Theatre Royal.

3360. Chairman.] Have you any further evidence to offer to the Committee?—No.

JOHN BALDWIN BUCKSTONE, Esq., called in; and Examined.

J. B. Buckstone, Esq.

3361. Mr. Locke.] YOU are proprietor, I believe, of the Haymarket Theatre?—I am lessee.

3362. And manager?—Yes.

3363. Have you been so for a great many years?—This is my fourteenth year.

3364. We have met before on this subject, I believe?—Yes.

3365. Have you seen any cause to alter the opinion that you then expressed with regard to the extension of these privileges to music halls?—No;

No; I objected to the extension of the privileges then to music halls, as I do now.

3366. That is to say, to the privilege of giving performances of the stage?—Yes.

3367. What is your reason for objecting to music halls giving performances of the stage?—In the first place they are not theatres; and smoking, eating, and drinking and improper acts are admitted; therefore, the music halls under the circumstances are not the places for dramatic performances, and to allow dramatic performances at those places would be a great injury and injustice to the theatres.

3368. Is not your principal reason that you do not like competition?—I do not object to legitimate competition.

3369. Then you would call that illegitimate competition?—Yes; unfair competition.

3370. Why?—You would be granting those places privileges belonging to the theatres controlled by the Lord Chamberlain, and which obey his authority by the expulsion of women of the town. We have no drinking or tobacco smoking in the theatres, and why should the music halls be placed on the same level as the theatres that obey all those injunctions of the Lord Chamberlain.

3371. But suppose people like to go to music halls, and to be amused in that way, why should they not do it?—I do not think they would like it.

3372. Then, if they did not like, it would not take place, I suppose?—That would be at the discretion of the manager.

3373. But I suppose that no manager of either a theatre or a music hall would ever put a performance on the stage that would not pay?—I presume not; but at the music halls the chief attraction is what is drunk; they calculate their profits in that way at 50 per cent.

3374. Provided that the people did not eat and drink to excess, and that they conducted themselves with propriety, what objection is there to a man sitting at a table taking his refreshments, and at the same time being amused by the performance on the stage?—He cannot pay proper attention to the performance while he is eating.

3375. What do you call proper attention?—A man with his mouth full cannot pay proper attention to the performance.

3376. He does not eat with his ears?—But eating must interfere with listening.

3377. Suppose his mouth is full, and his ears open, does not he please himself by employing two of his senses instead of one?—Some minds may find enjoyment that way; but I think it is very sensual.

3378. But still eating and drinking is a pleasant thing?—You could not enjoy a dramatic performance at a music hall, while a row was taking place. I remember a case not long ago of a fight at the Alhambra where one of the gentlemen, whose name I have got, was so beaten that he had to be taken to Charing Cross Hospital.

3379. You have read of the O. P. riots, I suppose?—I have heard of them.

3380. They punched one another's heads in an extraordinary way, for a long time, did they not?—Yes; and so they do at the music halls.

3381. This was only one case?—My son went the other night to see Mr. Callcot's scenes; a very fine work of art: he sat with a friend near to the scene, to see its development, and they were very much annoyed by two or three women of the town; the women got fighting, and my son and his friend were so hustled that they were forced to leave the place without seeing the scene.

3382. That should be remedied by the police, should it not?—In a place where there is plenty to eat and drink, it is very easy to make the police not to see.

3383. Do you speak from experience with regard to those music halls?—No; I am not in the habit of going to music halls.

3384. In your theatre you have plenty to eat and drink, I suppose?—Very little.

3385. You have gin and brandy?—In a certain proportion.

3386. With regard to the gin that you have at the Haymarket, is it so watered that it does a man good rather than harm?—I never partook of the gin in the saloon.

3387. But other people do?—Not to any extent; it is chiefly tea and coffee.

3388. But you have a spirit license under the Lord Chamberlain?—Yes.

3389. The Lord Chamberlain's license carries a spirit and beer license with it?—Yes; but not tobacco.

3390. The distinction then is tobacco; that is the only difference with regard to the license between theatres and music halls?—That is a difference; but in music halls waiters go round for custom; at the Haymarket Theatre we have no basket-women allowed; the basket-women have been abolished for some years in the pit and galleries; they are not now allowed.

3391. Are they not allowed in the galleries?—In the dress boxes they are abolished, and in the galleries too, except between the Acts. There is a table at the back where they can go to.

3392. There is a counter at the back of the gallery?—Yes; something of that sort.

3393. For all sorts of refreshments?—Oranges and apples.

3394. And wine and spirits?—Yes.

3395. Have you a beer engine?—No, we have no beer engine in the Haymarket whatever.

3396. What beer have you?—Only bottled beer.

3397. No draught beer?—None.

3398. Where do the people in the pit get refreshments from?—They can go out into the lobby; they must leave the body of the theatre.

3399. Now, with regard to refreshments, you have reduced it to this; that the distinction between the music halls and the theatres, is that refreshments are taken in the body of the music halls, and there is smoking going on, whereas in the theatres it is not so?—We have no waiters running about for orders while a song or a ballet is going on, as at the music halls.

3400. But the style of performance at your theatre requires silence?—Yes.

3401. But if there were a style of performance that did not require silence, or so much silence, and which people liked to witness, what reason is there why they should not enjoy themselves?—I should restrict them while the performance was going on; I should not allow the popping of corks or the mixing of grog.

3402. That interferes with your actors, you think?—Yes, and with singers too.

3403. But so long as it does not interfere with the audience, and the actors choose to perform there, there, why should you prevent people enjoying themselves?—The great body of the audience do not care about the song or the actor; they care for what they can eat and drink; they go for a lounge.

27 April 1866.

3404. They have the two things at those music halls?—Yes, but their profits are derived from the sale of wines and spirits.

3405. What difference can it make to the theatres, seeing that you have got 3,000,000 of people in London, that there should be a place of amusement provided to the taste of everybody who chooses to enjoy it?—It is placing the theatres in an unfair position, because a great many people prefer tobacco and spirits to any intellectual entertainment.

3406. But still tobacco and spirits taken in moderation are not forbidden by the law of the land?—I would not allow anybody to have those things in a public place of entertainment.

3407. For what reason is it, because it is unfair to the theatres?—Yes, it is unfair to the theatres and degrading to the drama, if dramatic performances are allowed to take place while eating, drinking, and smoking goes on.

3408. But do you not think that, if the acting is good, the drama can take care of itself?—The music halls have been a great injury to the theatres, especially to the half prices. Before the music halls began, the half price was worth taking, but the music halls carried away that class of young men; so that the half price is hardly worth taking at all.

3409. When I was a young man, I recollect the Haymarket half price pretty well?—Yes, they used to take 30 l. or 40 l. a night.

3410. At that time the company was not quite select?—No; women of the town were admitted: but that has not been so for many years.

3411. Do you admit that the music halls are better conducted than the Haymarket was then?—I entirely deny that.

3412. But women of the town went there?—We have none now.

3413. But you used to have?—Yes, it used to be much about the same as the music halls, with exception of smoking and drinking.

3414. At the half price?—Yes; at that time the Haymarket saloon used to present much about the same appearance as the music halls do now.

3415. With this difference, that the ladies were very much décolletées; I mean at the Haymarket and Drury Lane saloons?—Yes.

3416. Whereas they are all dressed up to the throat now at the music halls?—Possibly.

3417. There is nothing to be seen now but their faces?—I was at a music hall some time ago, when I was followed about by some women of the town, and one of them said, "If you would let us go to your theatre, Mr. Buckstone, we would not come to a place like this."

3418. She took an interest in you; probably she knew you?—Very likely she did.

3419. But there is elbow room at the music halls; there is room for everybody?—So it appears.

3420. If a play is properly conducted, those ladies at the music halls, dressed as they are in the most decent way, cannot be an inconvenience to anybody, and probably they may be an attraction to some?—No gentleman would take his wife and family there. I saw one day, in reading Mr. Strange's examination, that the number of women of the town who went to the Alhambra did not exceed three per cent. of the audience. Take them as his own words. He confesses to accommodate 3,000 people nightly; three per cent. of ladies of the town gives you 90 of them, and that, I think, is a very fair sprinkling of temptation.

3421. But they do not ply their calling there?—They do ply their calling there; they go there for appointments and assignations; and then there is the canteen.

3422. No ladies are allowed there?—The ladies of the ballet are. Do you consider it proper that they should be brought down to associate with gentlemen under the stage where beer and champagne are being drunk, and when those gentlemen go down on purpose to get acquainted with the ladies of the ballet?

3423. Have you ever been there?—Never.

3424. You cannot say how extremely well conducted it is?—Several of my friends have been there.

3425. Your objection is really pretty much the same as Mr. Webster's?—Yes.

3426. The fact is that those music halls interfere with you?—Yes.

3427. It is a case of every one for himself?—No, I am not entirely for myself; I am for the interests of the pure drama. I think these music halls would vulgarise and injure the drama, or, to make use of the same expression as the elder Mathews did, brutalise the drama.

3428. You knew the late Mr. Robson, I suppose?—Yes.

3429. He performed at the Grecian, did he not?—I never saw him there, but I believe he did.

3430. He performed at the Grecian for a good many years?—That was 15 or 16 years ago, I think.

3431. Mr. Webster has stated that at the Grecian Theatre, at the time Mr. Robson performed there, there were no refreshments supplied in the auditorium?—I believe there was a sort of bench where you could put your glass. Mr. Rouse was the proprietor.

3432. At that time it was arranged much in the same way that the music halls are now, and the Lord Chamberlain afterwards gave his license to that place. It was formerly called the "Eagle Tavern," and then it became the Grecian, and then the tables and chairs, and so forth, to accommodate persons that took refreshments, were removed?—Yes; they were put outside the theatre.

3433. That is to say, they had tables and chairs, and so on, just outside of this place?—Yes.

3434. And persons walked in and out just as they liked?—I do not know; they have not for years had refreshments in the body of the theatre.

3435. But when Mr. Robson performed there they had?—Yes; they had refreshments when Mr. Robson performed there; but the Lord Chamberlain removed that.

3436. Can you say how long Mr. Robson performed there during the time that they had those refreshments in a similar way to the music halls?—My impression is that it was not very long; perhaps a couple of years. Mr. Robson went from there to the Dublin Theatre Royal, where he improved in his profession, and where the elder

Mr.

Mr. William Farren engaged him for the Olympic when Mr. Farren was lessee.

3437. But, however, he commenced his career at the Grecian Saloon?—He commenced his career at the Grecian Saloon and various other little places.

3438. Places of that description?—Yes; places of that description.

3439. At all events that did not prevent him from being a very eminent actor?—Yes; but that was an exception.

3440. But exceptions prove the rule sometimes?—No; this exception proves that there cannot be any rule.

3441. There being no rule, why not let people do as they like?—Not to the degradation of the drama; why should they do so?

3442. But Mr. Robson went there, and he did not degrade the drama?—But you must understand that he did not obtain his reputation at the Grecian; he was obliged to leave and go to a theatre, and at that theatre he earned a reputation which brought him to London.

3443. Now at those theatres in Dublin they smoke, do they not?—No.

3444. At some of them they smoke?—Not at the Theatre Royal.

3445. They are rather noisy there, are they not?—At the Theatre Royal I never found them so, and I was there three weeks last autumn. I had a very aristocratic audience every night, and there was no disturbance.

3446. What is the name of the other theatre in Dublin?—There is a minor theatre called The Queen's.

3447. Do they smoke there?—I never went there except once, about seven or eight years ago.

3448. Was the Theatre Royal the only place where Mr. Robson went?—No, he went to the Queen's Theatre after he had made his reputation in London.

3449. That was later on?—Yes.

3450. With regard to the country theatres, you are the manager of a country theatre, are you not?—I am one of the lessees.

3451. Which theatre is that?—The Bradford Theatre; it is a new theatre; I am one of the shareholders and one of the lessees.

3452. Was there a theatre at Bradford before?—Yes, an old theatre; there was always one, but the gentry did not go there.

3453. Do they go to the new one?—Yes.

3454. There is a large population there, is there not?—Not a large population, but if there is any attraction at this new Alexandra Theatre, the boxes are filled by the first people in Bradford and the surrounding districts.

3455. That is when the stars shine there?—Yes.

3456. Not otherwise?—Pretty well.

3457. For what period of the year is that theatre open?—It opened with the Haymarket company, the beginning of last August, and it is open now.

3458. Has it been closed at all since it was opened?—Not at all.

3459. It is a great success, I suppose?—It is a moderate success, not a great one. There are times when the entertainment is not so good, and there is not enough money taken to pay the current expenses, but there are other times when sufficient money is taken to make up for that.

3460. Is your experience great with regard to the country theatres?—I have been to a great many of them.

3461. Has your attention been called to the fact whether or not their number has increased or diminished?—They have increased in the large towns, but they have diminished in the small towns. There was at one time but two theatres in Manchester, and now there are four.

3462. The population of Manchester has increased greatly, has it not?—Yes; there is also a music-hall there; a very large one, close to the Theatre Royal.

3463. How is that licensed?—By the justices, I think. In Bradford there used to be one small insignificant theatre; there is now a handsome theatre, the Alexandra Theatre, open; the old theatre is still in existence, and also open; the justices have given a dramatic license to St. George's Hall, and it frequently happens that all those three places are giving a representation at the same time.

3464. There the competition does good?—No, not competition to that extent; when St. George's Hall and the other two theatres are open at the same time, the result is unfavourable to all.

3465. You think that the taste for the theatre in Bradford has increased in consequence of having this new theatre?—Yes.

3466. Do you recollect Barnett's troupe?—Yes, I played with them once at Reading.

3467. Do you recollect the Chelmsford Theatre?—No.

3468. Do you remember the Guildford Theatre?—No.

3469. Do you recollect the Maidstone Theatre or Lewes Theatre; are you aware that all those four theatres are closed?—I have not heard of a theatre at Maidstone for a long time; when I was young, I acted at Faversham, Hastings, and Folkestone, and, at Hastings, there is a theatre still, and there is one at Faversham; it was called then "Dowton's Circuit."

3470. The theatre at Hastings is very seldom opened is it not?—I think it is opened about four months in the year; when I played there it was in a sort of a barn, a mile and a-half up a hill, close to a public-house called the "Fox and Hounds," where I played with the elder Kean and Elliston.

3471. Has that been removed?—No; it is now a sort of stable and coal cellar.

3472. Where is the theatre now?—In the body of the town, I believe.

3473. But they do not often perform at Hastings; the Hastings people are a serious class of people, are they not?—A man of the name of Montague has the theatre, and he keeps it open three or four months in the year.

3474. The Brighton Theatre is very flourishing, is it not?—Yes.

3475. That is open great part of the year?—Yes, I was there about a year ago.

3476. Can you recollect any other small towns where the theatre has been discontinued?—No I cannot; in a great many small towns they are building theatres where they were never known before; Great Grimsby and places of that kind.

3477. But there is nothing now like the circuits which used to exist generally when the patent theatres were in full vogue?—You may attribute that to railway communication; people can come to London to see a play and get back so soon that they prefer to come to London to see good acting.

3478. That is the case with regard to other things

27 April 1866.

things as well as with regard to theatres; the people get the best article, and they come to London for it?—Yes; at the Haymarket I can always tell when a quantity of people have come from the surrounding districts; at a certain hour you can see them moving away to catch the trains to go home.

3479. Do you think it diminishes the number of theatres in small places, when people can easily come to a London theatre and go back by the last train?—Yes; the last train to Croydon from the City is a quarter past twelve at night.

3480. That would hardly apply to places at a great distance from London; say to the North of England?—They come up from Manchester and Liverpool, not purposely to go to the theatre, but if business calls them to London, many of those gentlemen do visit the theatres.

3481. They come more frequently to London than they used to do in former days?—Yes.

3482. The same necessity for theatres in their own localities does not exist?—At Manchester they have two more theatres than they used to have.

3483. Have they a theatre at Bath?— Yes, a new one; the old one was burnt down.

3484. That used to be a great theatre for rising talent?—Yes; most of the old actors used to earn their reputation at Bath.

3485. Munden came from Bath, did he not?—No; from York, I think.

3486. He commenced his career in a country theatre?—Most of the actors of great eminence have commenced their career in country theatres.

3487. They act better business, as it is called; pieces more nearly approaching the legitimate drama than the pieces performed at many of the theatres in London; for instance, they perform Sheridan's plays at the country theatres now, do they not?—Very rarely; the public would not attend; but if the Haymarket company goes to Bradford, Manchester, or Liverpool with legitimate drama, the theatre is thronged every night.

3488. But has the style of performance at country theatres altered from what it used to be?—Yes; I should say that it has, from the want of capacity in the companies, and proper discipline on the part of the management.

3489. They have not a sufficient number of actors, you think, to put the old comedies on the stage?—Not fit for the purpose.

3490. That, I believe, is a deficiency now felt throughout all the theatres; there are not enough good actors?—I cannot say that with regard to London; at the Haymarket we can play anything; we are now playing a legitimate drama, a play which requires first-class talent, "The Favourite of Fortune," by Mr. Westland Marston; it is drawing all London, and you cannot get a place without you apply a week beforehand; that shows there is no decline in the legitimate drama, if you can represent it efficiently.

3491. But you have a sufficient number of performers to play each part well?—We can play the "School for Scandal" better than most of the theatres in London.

3492. But your theatre is an exception, is it not?—It is a legitimate house; it is one of the old patent theatres; and my idea is always to sustain the character given to it by Mr. Webster, George Colman, and Foote, before him.

3493. Generally speaking, you could not find a sufficient number of actors to perform the legitimate drama at the two other patent theatres, namely, Covent Garden and Drury Lane, in the way it was formerly done, could you?—No, I think not; not enough to give the public such companies as they used to have 40 or 50 years ago.

3494. Has the taste of the public changed?—No, I think not; the quality of the performers is not good enough.

3495. How do you account for that?—There is no school for the education of actors and actresses.

3496. But was it not the taste of the public which created the school; was not it a question of supply and demand; there was a demand for that kind of acting, and the consequence was that actors were found?—The public will not go to a bad entertainment; that is clear.

3497. Then why are there not good ones?—Because you cannot get actors.

3498. Do you think that the human race has deteriorated?—No; I think the race of actors has deteriorated.

3499. At all events the human race has deteriorated in such a way that they are not fit to be actors?—Nowadays, when a young man can sing a song he will not wait to see if he can get a footing on the stage, but he goes to a music hall, and then he is not worth admitting into a theatre; his style becomes vulgar, and he is unfit for the drama.

3500. Are there any instances of that?—I have only heard so.

3501. Your experience is probably as great as anyone's in these matters, and you do not know of an instance yourself?—No; I cannot recall to mind any instance, but I daresay if I were to refer to some of the books and records of dramatic performances of late years, I could offer that evidence.

3502. But, at the present moment, you have no recollection of any instance of that kind?—No.

3503. Mr. Du Cane.] Do I understand you to say that you never heard of any other actor besides Mr. Robson who ever rose into eminence in the profession commencing at a music hall?—No, I do not know of any; I know many who have commenced in barns.

3504. You say that the business of a music hall performance is very easily learnt and picked up?—Yes; if a man can sing a comic song he can get admission to a music hall, but that would be no recommendation to a theatre.

3505. What is the average time that a clever young man, with a natural talent for acting, would take to get to any certain position in his profession?—It is almost as bad as the bar; you get grey first; I should say about 12 years, but it depends a good deal on natural talent.

3506. Do you agree with Mr Webster, that the taste for the legitimate drama has not declined of late years?—Yes. I have lived on the legitimate drama for years—Shakespere, Sheridan, Sheridan Knowles, Morton, George Colman, Farquhar, Goldsmith, and many other legitimate writers of the past and also of the present day.

3507. But the talent for the legitimate drama has declined; do you find it more difficult to put a legitimate drama on the stage with a good cast. When vacancies occur you find a difficulty in filling them up?—Not at all at the Haymarket. Mrs. Wilkins was a very fine woman, who performed parts such as Mrs. Glover used to perform, and she went went away to America. She was a very good actress indeed, but I looked about and found another and a finer woman to fill her place.

3508. At what time in the evening do you put your principal piece on the stage?—About eight o'clock.

3509. That is rather later than formerly, is it not?—Yes; that is on account of the dinner hour of the gentry.

3511. Have you ever tried the difference between commencing such a piece as the "Overland Route" or the "Unequal Marriage," at seven or eight o'clock?—I have commenced the "Overland Route" and "Unequal Marriage" at a quarter to eight; it depends on the weather; in the summer-time, when the evenings are warm, it is always to our advantage to play a light piece at seven o'clock. In the winter-time we play the principal piece at seven; in the summer evenings we play a short piece first, and then we perform the novelty; you must not begin the evening with it, because people have not settled into their seats.

3512. But having brought the commencement of your principal piece nearer to the half-price hour, you do not think that it has had any effect in making your half-price less attractive?—No.

3513. Lord Ernest Bruce.] You were mentioning that the country theatres have increased in large towns, but have rather diminished in small towns?—Yes.

3514. You mean large towns like Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, and so on?—Yes.

3515. Do you not think that the reason they have diminished so in small towns has been the railroad bringing parties up to London?—Yes.

3516. Do you think that those parties who come to London come to your theatre, or do you think they come for the Italian operas?—Both.

3517. But do you not also think that the fact of two Italian operas being now opened is very damaging to the national drama?—It does not interfere with the Haymarket at all. With regard to the two Italian operas, I think it is one too many. I consider one is necessary, but one is sufficient.

3518. But there being two Italian operas, you must think, I suppose, that it has been damaging to the interests of the English theatres?—Individually I have not experienced it, and, indeed, with regard to Her Majesty's Theatre, that is of service to the Haymarket; people who want a change go across the road and come back again, and vice versâ.

3519. We have had no French plays lately; that is rather in your favour, is it not?—French plays were never profitable in London. Mr. Mitchell never could make anything by them.

3520. The French theatre in the days of Rachel used to be opened, and very full, but since she died there has been no regular French play, I believe?—No; Mr. Mitchell has not found it profitable.

3521. My learned friend the Member for Southwark has alluded to the Irish theatres?—Yes.

3522. I understood you to say that you have acted at Dublin?—Yes.

3523. Did you ever act at Cork?—Never.

3524. There is a constant conversation which goes on between the pit and the gallery and the boxes; a sort of running conversation which makes it very disorderly. Have you ever found that to be the case in the Irish theatres generally?—No; but the only theatres I have played in have been Dublin and Belfast.

3525. You would not consider an Irish audience the most attentive one, would you?—I have always found it so.

3526. Have they not interlarded the entertainment with their jokes?—I have never heard any conversation going on.

3527. You have acted in Scotland, I suppose?—Yes, in Edinburgh and Glasgow.

3528. Is it not generally thought that the Scotch audiences are most attentive?—Yes, very.

3529. The Edinburgh audience is thought to be a very difficult audience to play before, is it not?—Yes, it is a very critical audience.

3530. With regard to the attractions at the Haymarket Theatre, of which you have been some years manager, I believe the greatest attraction lately, by which I am happy to hear that you have made a great deal of money, has been the representation of Lord Dundreary by Mr. Sothern?—Yes.

3531. Do you not find that the taste of the public is more in favour of one great actor who creates a character and draws a crowd than in favour of an old-fashioned, well-acted play?—No, I do not see that. We are now acting a play where all the characters are principal characters; they are all acted in a first-rate manner. Mr. Sothern's character is scarcely the leading character. The public prefer at the Haymarket a well-acted play, with every part well sustained.

3532. But, still, the quaintness of Mr. Sothern's acting as "Lord Dundreary" drew the public?—Yes, for some time; but it died out.

3533. The other character, "Lord Dundreary Married and Settled," has not drawn so much?—No; but that was a mere farce.

3534. How many nights was "Lord Dundreary" played?—About 300.

3535. When did he first play it?—It was before Christmas 1861. We played it for about 60 or 70 nights, with but moderate attraction. People talked of it, and that was all. I persuaded him to go away until the pantomimes were over. He objected at first, but afterwards he took my advice. When he returned, "Punch" had taken up "Lord Dundreary," and, with Leech's sketches, the public had begun to talk about it. He reappeared, and then came the Great Exhibition year, when the Haymarket was overcrowded for many months with people trying to get in to see it. But, as I said before, it did not attract to any extent at first.

3536. Is that very often the case, that a play does not all at once become very popular?—Yes, it is very frequently the case with plays. "Black-Eyed Susan" was not an attraction for the first three or four weeks. Mr. Elliston placed it at half-price, and he found the audience so increasing that he put it back again; it ran for the whole season, and he made a handsome fortune by Jerrold's "Black-Eyed Susan."

3537. But still I believe Mr. Sothern has been more more highly paid by you than any artist for many years?—Yes; he has been paid on this principle, that if he did not attract he would not get much pay. Mr. Sothern divides a certain sum after I have taken an amount towards paying the expenses of the theatre. I take a certain sum, and whatever the balance may be is divided between Mr. Sothern and me. You may judge of the attraction of Mr. Sothern at this moment, when I tell you that his share, after my share and taking a very large sum for expenses, comes to between 220 l. and 250 l. a week. I should not pay him so much at a fixed salary, but that is a share.

J. B. Buckstone, Esq.

27 April 1866.

3538. But may not the attraction of one favourite actor be much more than a well-acted play?—No, I think not. I will give you an instance to the contrary. In the play which we are now acting, Mr. Sothern is the principal actor, certainly, but there are other parts quite as good.

3539. But that great attraction must show you that the love for the old legitimate drama has very much diminished?—No; I opened with the "School for Scandal" this season, and played that alone to quite as good receipts as we now perform Mr. Westland Marston's comedy to.

3540. I asked Mr. Webster just now whether the practice did not still exist of writing for particular performers?—I may sometimes say, "I should prefer to have Mr. So-and-so in my piece."

3541. The play of "Lord Dundreary" was not written for Mr. Sothern, was it?—No; it was written for an American actor engaged by Mr. Webster; for a Mr. Silsby. Lord Dundreary was a secondary part in it; Mr. Sothern went to America and was cast for it, and played it on condition that he might do as he liked with it, and he created the part.

3542. He is a Birmingham man, is he not?—No; he is a Liverpool man.

3543. Sir Arthur Buller.] Has there been any falling off in the attendance in your pits and galleries of late years, or does the taste of those kind of people seem to be as it used to be?—In the galleries there is a great falling off.

3544. Since when?—Since the music halls have had so many privileges given them.

3545. When you have any of those attracting pieces are they not full?—I can only keep on the Haymarket as a legitimate comedy theatre; and that class of entertainment is not so suited to the galleries; our pit is full, and our boxes are full, but the galleries and slips are not so full when we have high class comedy; with Mr. Macready, or some great tragedian, the galleries will fill.

3546. The music halls do not interfere so much, then, with theatres like yours?—Yes, they interfere with the half price, and with the galleries.

3547. That is the cause of your opposition, then?—No; I have already said that it is not the cause of my opposition. I do not object to music halls, provided they are kept to their own legitimate entertainments, selections from operas, songs, and duets, but no costume, no scenery, and no ballet, because whatever people may say, those things are entertainments of the stage; and I think their persistent violations of the law have been treated with great leniency.

3548. You would prevent such places as the Alhambra from having any scenery or costume?—Yes, I would restrict them to musical entertainments.

3549. But you would not allow them to have a ballet of any kind?—No, not of any sort; it is an entertainment of the stage; there is costume, action, scenery, and story.

3550. You go (so to speak) the whole hog in opposing their case?—Yes, the whole hog.

3551. Mr. Powell.] With regard to your Bradford Theatre, the plays you perform there are licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, I suppose?—Yes.

3552. And the house is licensed by the justices?—Yes.

3553. Have you found any difficulty in Bradford from that divided jurisdiction, the stage performances being licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, and the house being licensed by the magistrates?—No; I see no difficulty in that; when that theatre was built, I was one of the original shareholders, and I am now a lessee; when the lesseeship was offered to me, there was a slight opposition to the license from the puritanical party, but the mayor not only granted me the license immediately, but paid me a very high compliment besides.

3554. Have you ever considered, from your experience in that Bradford theatre, there is any probability of a difficulty arising from having those two jurisdictions in the same theatre, namely, that of the Lord Chamberlain with regard to plays, and that of magistrates with reference to the house?—No; I should not object to the Lord Chamberlain's jurisdiction all over England; he behaves in a very indulgent way.

3555. I suppose you have been lessee of theatres during some few months in different towns in England?—No, not lessee; and I am only part lessee in Bradford.

3556. Have you ever had the management of a country theatre during some months?—No; but I have acted in country theatres often.

3557. Are you aware that in Bradford the theatre which was existing before your theatre was built, it is now proposed to convert into a Joint Stock Company's Theatre, with a new building?—I have heard that there is a movement on foot for shareholders to build another theatre in place of the old theatre, but I think that that movement has fallen through.

3558. There were some remarks made a year or two ago about the admission of gentlemen behind the scenes at the theatre, and you wrote a letter denying the existence of such things?—Yes.

3559. And you now repeat your denial?—Yes. At the Haymarket Theatre, during my predecessor's 16 years' management, and during my 14 years' management, we never had a stranger behind the scenes; hardly a friend, indeed. I once had a clergyman who asked me to let him go behind the scenes. I said, "There is nothing particular to be seen." He said, "I should like to have a peep." I took him behind the scenes; he found nothing going on in the way he expected to see, and he said, "I shall go now." I said, "You see there is nothing to be seen;" and he said, "Oh, I expected to see a sort of saturnalia here."

3560. Mr. Locke.] He went away disappointed?—Yes, he went away disappointed.

3561. Chairman.] You have written a good many plays, and are a successful dramatic author as well as actor?—Yes.

3562. Have you ever found any trouble with the the censorship of the Lord Chamberlain?—No, never.

3563. You think that it operates pretty fairly?—Yes, very fairly.

3564. Do you think that a different class of pieces would be written to what there are now if there was not that censorship?—A very different class and a very personal class, attacking public characters in politics, or the Church, or any other position.

3565. They might put public men on the stage, you think?—Yes; there was once a piece in rehearsal at the Adelphi where the House of Commons was to be represented. I was to be dressed up as Lord John Russell. The Lord Chamberlain's license was refused for that play, and it was never acted.

3566. In what year was that?—It was in Mr. Yates's time, at the Adelphi, about 20 years ago.

3567. Are you aware that the elder Mathews once represented O'Connell?—Yes.

3568. That was allowed by the Lord Chamberlain, was it not?—Yes; it was allowed by the Lord Chamberlain, because it is so exceedingly funny. I believe it was not in a play, but in one of his "At Homes."

3569. Did he see the fun before he gave his license to it?—I do not know.

3570. You think that, on the whole, the licensing of theatres operates pretty well with the Lord Chamberlain's censorship?—I should be very sorry to see a theatre without the supervision of the Lord Chamberlain.

3571. Not only as an actor but as a dramatic author, would you say that the Lord Chamberlain's supervision interferes with the freedom of authorship?—Not at all.

3572. Have you ever had pieces cut out of your plays?—Yes, I have had pieces cut out; anything that may approach profanity, or the mention of any public name, is cut out.

3573. You think that plays would be more likely to be profane and personal if they were not submitted to the Lord Chamberlain?—I am sure of it.

3574. How would the public like it?—The public who go to the music halls would perhaps like it.

3575. Do you think that the pieces acted at those music halls should be put under the supervision of his authority?—Of course they ought; but what I say is this, that they should not have any right to act any pieces of a dramatic character of any kind.

3576. You spoke of the privileges of the theatre; what did you mean by that?—I meant the privilege to represent plays—the legitimate drama.

3577. Do you think that belongs of right to the theatres?—Yes.

3578. But those rights were taken away from you when the other theatres were thrown open?—That right was not taken away exactly, for the public expect to see much the same class of entertainment at those patent theatres even now.

3579. If the music hall proprietors were allowed to give small pieces at the music halls, do you think that they would interfere with the theatres?—Yes.

3580. I mean if they were to act good small pieces?—Yes, if they acted any pieces at all; they could not act good pieces, for they could not get good actors to perform in them.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE GEORGE JOACHIM GOSCHEN, IN THE CHAIR.

WILLIAM BODHAM DONNE, Esq., called in; and further Examined.

W. B. Donne, Esq.

3581. Chairman.] YOU wish to explain your Answer to Question 2324?—I find that, in my answer on Friday last, to that Question I have given my attention solely to what the practice is; and, by inference, I have given my opinion as to what the meaning of the Interpretation Clause was. But I spoke to what was the usage only. Upon examining the Interpretation Clause further, I am inclined to think that duologue comes under that clause. I now wish to correct my answer. I consider duologue, and other titles of stage-plays, also, viz., comediettas, burlesques, extravaganzas, even the term drama itself, although not mentioned specifically in that clause, are included under the words, "or other entertainments of the stage." I should properly have given my former answer in two parts, one with regard to the practice, and the other, which I now give, with regard to the Interpretation Clause.

3582. Mr. Powell.] Can you explain how it happens that the Lord Chamberlain's license, after having been refused to the Alhambra for evening performances, was granted for morning performances? — To meet the Act, 25th of George the Second, which was never repealed, prohibiting concerts before five o'clock in the afternoon.

3583. But the license for evening performances was refused on the ground of the want of safety in the building?—The license was given to meet a difficulty of the moment, arising out of that Act. It was found that under its provisions the Hanover-square Rooms and others, could not legally give concerts before that hour. The Hanover-square Rooms and Willis's Rooms were all in it at the same time.

3584. Mr. Locke.] And now there could be no difficulty. If Mr. Strange chose he could act King Richard the Third, could he not?—No, because the Lord Chamberlain only corroborates the magistrates' license, and the magistrates' license cannot, in the metropolitan boroughs, give permission for the performance of stage plays.

3585. Can you tell the Committee exactly what the Lord Chamberlain gave Mr. Strange? —The license of the Lord Chamberlain is entirely subordinate to the magistrates' license; the Lord Chamberlain has not given a theatrical license, he has merely, for the occasion, subscribed to the magistrates' license.

3586. It is not a license to sell beer, I suppose? —To whatever extent the magistrates' license goes, the Lord Chamberlain's license, in this case, also goes, and no further.

3587. But what sort of license is that. I thought the Lord Chamberlain's power to license theatres was under the 6th & 7th Victoria?—Yes, it is so.

3588. He cannot license anything else, can he? You will find that what I say is perfectly correct; the Lord Chamberlain's license is a sort of codicil to the magistrates' license.

3589. Then what are the words; what has it got on the face of it?—I cannot give you the exact words. It did not pass through my hands, but you will find it is merely supplementary.

3590. Mr. Powell.] We have it in evidence that the license to the Alhambra was refused because the building was in some way or other not thought safe?—Yes; but that was several years ago.

3591. That being the reason why the license for evening performances was refused, what change of circumstance was there with regard to the safety of the building which made the Lord Chamberlain give a morning license?—There was no change whatever; it was simply that a clause of the Act 25 Geo. 2, which puts certain places in danger, had never been repealed, and in order to secure them from informers, until some new arrangement were made, this temporary license was granted by the Lord Chamberlain, with the concurrence of the magistrates.

3592. Are you aware whether there was any understanding or arrangement with Mr. Strange, that the galleries which were originally thought unsafe should be closed during the morning performances?—No, I am not aware of anything of the kind.

3593. Mr. O'Beirne.] Was the license for a morning performance a music and dancing license, or for the performance of stage plays?—The Lord Chamberlain's temporary license went no further than the magistrates' license went; and it certainly did not permit the performance of stage-plays.

3594. Chairman.] This part of the licensing system is not in your department, is it?—No, it is not in my department at all.

EDWARD TYRRELL SMITH, Esq., called in; and Examined.

3595. Chairman.] YOU are at present lessee of Astley's Theatre, are you not?—Yes.

3596. And you have been lessee of Drury-lane Theatre?—Yes.

3597. With what other theatres have you been connected?—With Her Majesty's Theatre and the Haymarket Theatre.

3598. And with Cremorne Gardens?—And with Cremorne Gardens.

3599. Are there any other places of entertainment that you have been connected with?—Yes, there is the Alhamhra; I purchased that building.

3600. Did you precede Mr. Strange?—Mr. Strange followed after me; he followed Mr. Wyld, I believe.

3601. The Committee would be glad to hear your views with regard to the licensing of theatres; do you think that the present system works well?—I do.

3602. Do you consider that the music halls suffer from the present arrangement?—No, I do not think that the music halls suffer at all; on the contrary; I think the theatres suffer from the indiscriminate granting of licenses to places that are not fit for them.

3603. In what respect are they unfit?—With respect to their supervision, in the first place, and with regard to convenience in the second place; there are exceptions, as a matter of course: now, the Alhambra is an exception, and there are other places that are convenient and suitable for the public, but where there are confined places, where there is eating, drinking, and smoking goes on, which the lessees of theatres could not do with decency, they have, of course, the music halls to oppose them.

3604. Does the taste of the public run more on music halls than on theatres?—I believe that the taste of the public is more with music halls.

3605. How do you account for that?—Because a man can sit down and drink his glass of grog, and blow his pipe, and enjoy himself there, not caring for anybody.

3606. Do you think if that is the taste of the people at present, that Parliament ought to check it?—I think certainly that there should be a check on the part of the Government, or some person appointed by them to supervise some of the music halls. But there are some of those music halls that are highly respectable; there is Mr. Strange's at the Alhambra, which is a very respectable hall; the Canterbury Hall and the Oxford Music Hall are also highly respectable, but there are exceptions, where having no supervisor like the Lord Chamberlain to license them, they are not respectable. The songs, some of them, are a disgrace to any person to put on the stage. It requires some person there as an inspector to look over those things.

3607. The Committee have been told that there are no places where questionable songs are sung now?—There is one that was fined in the papers last week for some offence of that kind. Perhaps a man comes on the stage, and he has a clock under his arm, and he says, "This is the way I wind the old woman up on Saturday nights," and all kinds of allusions and bestialities in a mild way. Sometimes they have an organ, and make the same remarks.

3608. Is there any power of interfering with that?—No; there is no power of interfering except that the police could report that to the Commissioner of Police, and then it would go to the magistrates on the licensing day. E. T. Smith, Esq. 30 April 1866.

3609. And the only punishment would be that their license for selling spirits would be stopped, would it not?—Their license for music and dancing would be stopped.

3610. It has been given in evidence before this Committee that improprieties generally would be hissed off the stage; and that, therefore, there is no occasion for such a supervision; is that your opinion?—The fact is, that it depends entirely on the company that associates in those places; obscene songs in public would meet the views of a certain class of people who go there expressly to get drunk.

3611. To go back to the respectable music halls, are you against the performance of theatrical pieces at music halls?—Certainly, if the people are allowed to smoke and drink in the place.

3612. Would it not be better that good small pieces should be acted there, though there is smoking, eating, and drinking going on, than that there should be bad songs or things of that description?—My personal feeling and opinion, independently of my being in the profession, is that I should say you are opening a field for most disgraceful things, and to lower the drama, and to drive all respectable persons away.

3613. I am supposing that you gave permission to act pieces licensed by the Lord Chamberlain at the music halls; do you object to that?—Certainly not, so long as they have the Lord Chamberlain's license.

3614. You do not object to the drama being performed in the presence of smoking, eating, and drinking, then?—I do indeed.

3615. Even if it is a respectable piece that is performed?—If it is a respectable piece I think it would be a disgrace for smoking, eating, and drinking to be going on at the same time.

3616. Do you think it is better for the public interest that a ballet should be performed to people who smoke, eat, and drink, or that they should see a good play?—It depends entirely on taste; would you like to go to a place where there is smoking, eating, and drinking, with a ballet, and take your wife and family, if you have them?

3617. Most people would prefer to see a good play, would they not?—Yes, but not with smoking, eating, and drinking going on.

3618. You object to the drama being performed simultaneously with smoking, eating, and drinking?—Certainly, I do; it would be a disgrace to the profession.

3619. Is not that rather your view as belonging to the profession?—No, not at all; if you had a respectable play you could not get respectable actors; you would have to put up with anybody that thought proper to play in a music hall, and that would be a disgrace to the drama and drive away the public.

3620. If that were so, the people would cease to go there, would they not?—You cannot help young clerks and others leaving their places of business, business, and going and enjoying those things; but the respectable people would not do it.

E. T. Smith, Esq.

3621. But if they go there to smoke and drink, is it not best that they should have as good an entertainment given them as possible?—You may have a good entertainment, but you may encourage drunkenness, which, I believe, it is now the opinion of everybody you ought to do away with; you bring the drama down to a pot-house.

3622. Then is it your opinion that the public would go more to such places if there were dramatic entertainments allowed there?—If there is no drinking allowed at those places, and no pot before them or glasses, they would go out and take a little refreshment between the acts; they would not be sipping altogether during the whole of the evening.

3623. Do you think that a supervision over the performances at music halls by some authority is desirable?—Most certainly.

3624. Would you extend the censorship to the songs and pieces performed at the music halls?—Certainly; they should be revised by some person, and it would be a great benefit to society if that were done.

3625. But you would not accompany that censorship with greater liberty to act other pieces, such as dialogues and small plays, under the supervision of the Lord Chamberlain?—I should object to it where there is smoking, eating, and drinking; they should have their license for music and dancing, and keep to that.

3626. What do you give at Cremorne Gardens?—We have a theatre licensed by the magistrates; it is out of the Lord Chamberlain's district.

3627. Do they smoke and drink in the theatre?—No.

3628. But they smoke and drink outside, do they not?—Yes.

3629. But that encourages drinking as much as if they were to drink inside, does it not?—So it would outside a music hall.

3630. But you do give plays at Cremorne Gardens?—I have never given a play; I have given a musical entertainment and a ballet.

3631. Have you given performances at Cremorne Gardens that would come under the name of stage plays if they were given in London?—Certainly.

3632. That very kind of entertainment that you think the music halls in London should not be allowed to give is an entertainment which you give at Cremorne Gardens?—I should have no objection to music and a song or two; the only one that I have given was a thing that was written by Mr. Tully; that was a musical entertainment, which lasted for about an hour; we only give one hour's entertainment.

3633. Would you object to that kind of entertainment being given at the "Alhambra"?—Certainly not.

3634. But at present they would be prevented by the state of the law from doing that at the "Alhambra," would they not?—No, they might have music.

3635. But this entertainment at Cremorne was more like an opera, was it not?—Yes, a slight opera.

3636. Mr. Locke.] Are they in costume?—Yes, they are in costume.

3637. Chairman.] They would not be able to perform in costume at the "Alhambra"?—No, but this was licensed as a theatre.

3638. Would you disapprove of a change in the law that would permit a performance of such a piece as that at the "Alhambra." At present, the "Alhambra" not having a theatrical license, could not perform such an opera as that; would you be inclined to permit that?—I should have no objection so long as there was no stage dress.

3369. You would object to a change in the law if they were permitted to wear costumes?—Yes.

3640. But they wear costumes at Cremorne Gardens?—Yes, but it is licensed.

3641. If they were licensed at the "Alhambra" you would not object?—No, certainly not.

3642. Then you would recommend a change of system which would permit the licensing of the "Alhambra" for the performance of such pieces?—Yes.

3643. Then if a piece like that were performed at the "Alhambra," it would be a musical play?—Yes; I should have no objection to their performing "Richard the Third," if they liked, so long as there was no smoking and drinking.

3644. You would not give a license to the "Alhambra" in that case?—Not for smoking, eating, and drinking.

3645. But surely that would not interfere with the performance of a light opera, such as you have at Cremorne Gardens?—It all depends on the taste of the public.

3646. If there were no smoking would you object to drinking?—I should object to drinking in front of the stage. I think it is encouraging every description of wrong doing.

3647. Colonel Sturt.] Would you allow drinking between the acts?—No, not at all, between the acts.

3648. Chairman.] You do not object to a ballet while they are smoking, but you do object to a musical play while they are smoking?—I consider that while any performance is going on upon the stage, smoking, eating, and drinking is bad.

3649. Even while a ballet is going on?—Even while a ballet is going on.

3650. Do you object to smoking, eating, and drinking at the "Alhambra," even under the present state of the law?—Yes, I do indeed.

3651. Now, with regard to the plays, do you think that the present system of censorship, all the plays being submitted to the Lord Chamberlain before they are performed, satisfactory?—Yes; if it was not so, I am satisfied that it would be a second step towards the same thing as smoking, eating and drinking, and we should have some of the minor theatres playing pieces that would be a disgrace to the stage.

3652. You are in favour of maintaining the present system of censorship?—Certainly.

3653. Have you ever found it work inconveniently?—Not at all. On the contrary, my plays are sent in with the fee, and are read and returned immediately; if there is anything put in by the author about our Saviour or God, it is cut out.

3654. Have you found dramatic authors object to the censorship?—Never; I had one piece which perhaps was very properly objected to, founded on La Dame aux Camelias. The Lord Chamberlain objected to license that, and I bowed to that decision, of course.

3655. Taking English dramatic authors, do you think that the present law of censorship hinders them in their composition?—Certainly not, because I should think that the dramatic authors, as a body, a body, are gentlemen who would not write a thing that would be improper at all.

3656. But if the censorship was removed, do you think that a questionable kind of plays would be performed to a greater extent than they are now?—Yes, certainly.

3657. You do not think that the public feeling and taste, are a sufficient guarantee without some supervision?—There must be some supervision or you would have things like the murder of the other day put on the stage; there was Thurtell and Weir's gig put on the stage; but all those things are suppressed immediately.

3658. Mr. Locke.] They had the original gig on the stage for a long time?—Yes; the man was little Williams, of the ham and beef shop in the Old Bailey.

3659. How many weeks did they draw that across the stage at the Surrey Theatre?—I do not know, but it was stopped at last.

3660. Chairman.] You think that the dramatic art would suffer from a change in the present law as to the licensing of music halls?—Certainly, most seriously.

3661. But would it not create a greater demand for plays?—It might create a greater demand for plays, because, as a matter of course, they would have to get pieces of some kind to perform.

3662. I do not know whether you heard the evidence given at the last sitting of the Committee, with regard to the number of pieces performed at the theatres in the course of a year?—No.

3363. Some of your pieces, no doubt, have had a great run?—Yes, some of the pieces have had a great run.

3664. During that time there was no demand on the part of the public for any novelties?—No, but some of the pieces have a very short run.

3665. Could you say how many new pieces you have performed at Drury Lane in the course of a year?—No; it is impossible to tell you now.

3666. Was it 20, do you think?—My friend Mr. Boucicault performed in one, and he had a great run. I let the theatre to him.

3667. But supposing that at four or five of the principal theatres, some pieces have a great run, then there is no demand for new plays at that time, is there?—No, but still the managers would buy them. I am ready to buy a new play now; I was asking Mr. Boucicault, and he says that he has five or six in stock.

3668. But if the music halls were allowed to perform plays, do you not think there would be a greater competition for plays, and greater inducement for dramatic authors to write them?—Plays and trash.

3669. A greater competition for trash?—Plays and trash, both together.

3670. Has the price for dramatic pieces risen or fallen, generally?—It has risen, I think.

3671. A dramatic author, for a good play, has at least the same price as formerly, you think?—He has more, I should say.

3672. No doubt, throwing open the theatres generally, and not confining the legitimate drama to the two patent theatres, has greatly increased the demand for theatrical literature?—Exactly, and in consequence of the two patent theatres being thrown open, the profession has fallen off, so far as actors and actresses go; there is no school now for the drama.

3673. What was the school formerly?—Some years back persons used to have a circuit for themselves, and you would find young men who wished to join the profession going to that circuit; they would select them from there, and send them up to Drury Lane or Covent Garden.

3674. What stopped those circuits?—I think myself it has been the large theatres not succeeding, and the little theatre in the Haymarket; they did not succeed. For instance, the rent of Drury Lane used to be 14,000 l. a year; I paid 4,000 l. a year, and in consequence of that persons have not found the drama very profitable. I had Mr. Charles Kean there for six weeks, and I lost 3,000 l. by him, and I lost 3,500 l. by Mr. G. V. Brooke in another six weeks.

3675. What do you attribute those losses to?—Sometimes it is the taste of the public, but Mr. Kean would bring his own actors and actresses with him; parties that could not what we call cry him down in their voices. I was forced to submit to these things, and the other parties were not so good. G. V. Brooke was not so much in favour as when he first came to me.

3676. But do you not think that those misfortunes were in consequence of a change in the public taste, and not in consequence of the monopoly having broken down?—Look at the bills of the theatres 30 years ago; you had then got all the talent that you could possibly have.

3677. Do you think if Drury Lane had been the only place open, that people would have gone to hear G. V. Brooke?—No; I am not talking of Drury Lane only, but people of first-rate education would not like to go and see a fourth-rate actor in plays where Kean and Kemble had acted.

3678. But you think that if the two patent theatres only had been kept up, the drama would have been in a better state?—Most certainly.

3679. But fewer people would have been able to enjoy it?—Yes; but still they would have gone to different parts of the house; the pit was originally 3 s. 6 d., and I reduced it to 2 s.

3680. Have you not done good service then by enabling more people to enjoy good plays?—I have done great service to the public, but I have not obtained my return for it.

3681. Is it not to the advantage of the public that there should be 10 or 15 theatres rather than two?—I feel pecuniarily on that point; there is a certain number of people who go to the theatres every night, and it is most extraordinary that there is never any more, and if there are 13 or 14 theatres they get divided.

3682. You think there are more theatres than there is demand for theatres?—Yes.

3683. But still the managers do not close in consequence?—No, but still we hear of failures.

3684. Mr. Stanley said that if the music halls obtained the power of acting pieces they would change themselves into theatres and ruin themselves; do you agree with that evidence?—I have no doubt that it would seriously affect them; he is connected with the Canterbury Hall; I do not know that he knows sufficient about the profession to say that; but it stands to reason that if there are 20 instead of five it must hurt them.

3685. But still new theatres are built?—New theatres are built. The Lord Chamberlain told me that he should have no objection to license any theatre if there were proper entrances and exits.

3686. Do you think that it is a mistake to build new theatres?—It is like every other trade; a man must abide by it. When they gave a large sum of money for Pettigrew's patent for Drury Lane, the King would not grant it to any other place; but when it was granted and carried out they then lost a large sum of money.

3687. Are you in favour of granting licenses to as many places as apply for them, or not?—You may have a theatre wherever you like.

3688. What is your definition of a theatre, as distinguished from a music hall?—A theatre is a place where there is scenery and performance in costume, and so on, and where there is no drinking, and it is under proper censorship.

3689. Then the theatres abroad, where people smoke, are not real theatres, you think?—I do not recollect one, except in the Palais Royal; they take refreshments in the boxes, I know, because I have had it there myself.

3690. Mr. Locke.] In private boxes?—No, in public boxes; but not spirits, nor wine.

3691. Chairman.] Have the salaries of good actors increased or decreased lately?—A good actor can always get an excellent salary.

3692. There is as great a demand for good actors as ever, I suppose?—Yes, if you can get them.

3693. In fact, there are not enough of them for the demand?—There are not any, except for comedy; the only person left on the stage of any consequence is Mr. Phelps; we had no one to follow Edmund Kean.

3694. To what do you attribute that?—Because there is no encouragement to them.

3695. But you say that the salaries are as high as ever?—Yes, but the actors are fewer.

3696. But does not the attraction of a high salary held out to actors lead to people embracing the profession?—No; take the case of Mr. Charles Matthews; I gave him 100*l.* a week at Drury Lane; when he goes I do not know of anybody that will take his place in that line. Mr. Buckstone has got a very fine company, and the comedies that he plays require it; he has got the best of them. But with regard to the other theatres, where will you find a good actor?

3697. But to what do you attribute there being no good actors if there are plenty of theatres and high salaries?—I consider that the profession is not now in the state that it was formerly; people were brought up to it, and went into it with the idea of having a dramatic education to receive and to appear at the large theatres; now there is scarcely any chance of appearing at a large theatre; it is the taste of the public. Sometimes the taste of the public may be for the legitimate drama, and sometimes it may be for nonsense. I brought out a little farce with Mr. Charles Matthews with only two persons in it, and it had a very very great run; that was in opposition to the Wizard of the North, at Covent Garden; the receipts were enormous; it filled the house every night, and the piece was on "A Woman's Green Bonnet."

3698. There were only two people in it?—There were only two people in it.

3699. It was a trifle?—Yes.

3700. Would you have objected to that piece being performed at the Alhambra?—Certainly not, provided there were no smoking, eating, or drinking.

3701. Though there are plenty of theatres, and though the salaries are high, actors are not forthcoming, you say?—No, I think not.

3702. Do you think that there is a less tendency on the part of educated men to enter the profession than there was?—Certainly.

3703. There are not so many educated actors who enter the profession?—There is not so much talent, but they have very good education.

3704. Do you think that the writing of plays is equal to what it used to be?—Yes; Mr. Robson, when Kean performed every night that he could come there, used to come and see him, and he said, "I ought to have been a tragedian."

3705. But do you think that the dramatic literature of the present day is equal to former dramatic literature?—Certainly.

3706. That the pieces written now are as good?—Yes, certainly; but it is of a different class; in the present day you must have a sensation scene; something of an inventive genius of my friend Boucicault, or something of that kind. There is one thing which I want to call the attention of the Committee to: I read in the "Era" that my friend Mr. Webster said I let boxes to gentlemen who had a key to go behind the stage; I am afraid that Mr. Webster mistook it for one of those music halls. I never did anything of the kind.

3707. Have you ever permitted gentlemen to go behind the scenes in the theatres under your charge?—Certainly not; I object to it entirely; we have got 150 girls now at Astley's Theatre, and if we had gentlemen behind the scenes we should never get on at all.

3708. Colonel Sturt.] But people may go behind the scenes without wishing to talk to the girls?—Yes, if people come on business; I reserve to myself the right to ask any one to go behind the scenes.

3709. Mr. Locke.] They do it, do they not?—There were five or six gentlemen from Scotland the other day who wanted to go behind the scenes, and I said they might if they pleased.

3710. Colonel Sturt.] There is no reproach in going behind the scenes?—None whatever.

3711. Chairman.] But you object to it while business is going on?—Yes; the girls might forget their cue, and the stage would be waiting.

3712. Mr. Locke.] You mean if people were admitted on the stage?—Yes.

3713. But have you a room distinct from the stage?—No; my room is entirely in front of the house.

3714. There is no large room behind the scenes at Astley's?—No.

3715. Nothing but the theatre and dressing room?—No; I had at Drury-lane a room on the stage.

3716. Lord Eustace Cecil.] It was in answer to Question 3168, which was put to Mr. Webster by me, that he said what you have referred to. He was asked, "Used that to be the practice in former years"?—and he answered, "Not within my knowledge. I have heard that Mr. E. T. Smith admitted gentlemen behind the scenes if they took a stall for the year, but that has never been done by any dramatic manager in my time that I know of, and indeed that is only hearsay."

3717. Chairman.] Did you ever do that?—No, certainly not.

3718. Mr. Locke.] He goes on to say it is only hearsay. "You have no positive evidence about that?

that? No."—Just so; no manager would do it.

3719. Chairman.] Are there some managers who are more strict than others?—They are all alike; they would not allow anything of the kind.

3720. Except the person wanted to speak on business?—Except they wanted to speak on business.

3721. Colonel Sturt.] All managers would feel at liberty to admit a personal friend behind the scenes?—Yes; I should be very happy to see every Member of the Committee behind the scenes.

3722. Mr. Locke.] Then where is the distinction between that and the Alhambra, except that at Astley's the only place where they could go to would be on the stage itself?—The only thing about the Alhambra (and that is hearsay, and Mr. Strange is a respectable man), is that gentlemen are said to go behind and drink champagne, and so forth.

3723. But that is not on the stage?—No, in a room behind.

3724. That room is not level with the stage, is it?—I have never been in the canteen.

3725. You are not aware that the canteen is distinct from the stage altogether?—No, I am not aware; there was no canteen when I was there.

3726. You are not aware that it is below the stage, and not connected with it in any way?—I do not know.

3727. Now a word or two about Cremorne; will you tell us what performances there are?—I open to-night.

3728. What do you start with?—Whitebait dinners.

3729. And breakfasts?—You can have breakfast if you come at two o'clock in the afternoon.

3730. At what time does the garden open?—About four in the afternoon.

3731. Those are favoured individuals, who have breakfast at two, are they?—No; we have the hotel open at two, but not the gardens.

3732. Then you may have what you please after two, until when?—Until 11 o'clock on Sunday night, 12 on Saturdays, and one o'clock on every other day; that is according to the magistrates' license.

3733. What performances do you start with to-night?—None at all until Wednesday.

3734. Has Cremorne been closed during the winter?—Yes, all the winter; it is only open for four months.

3735. It is not worth while to keep open the tavern part during the winter?—No, it is not.

3736. You have not quite arranged what the performances are to be, perhaps?—Yes; it is to be a ballet of 150 ladies.

3737. Which part of the garden is it that you perform that ballet in?—In the theatre.

3738. Is the theatre on the right-hand side?—It is on the left-hand side as you go in.

3739. Is it a very large room?—Yes.

3740. That large room forms one side of the place where they dance, does it?—It is detached.

3741. First of all, on the left-hand side, is the bowling alley?—As you go in, the bowling alley is on the left-hand side.

3742. Then you go beyond that, and then you come to this large room, and then you come to the circular place with walks round it, and with the rooms above?—Yes; there are three entrances.

3743. I am supposing that you go in at the entrance in King's-road; principal entrance?—Yes.

3744. Then there is a circular sort of rotunda?—Yes, the orchestra.

3745. And the part boarded round it is for dancing?—Yes.

3746. The theatre is close to it?—Yes.

3747. Just outside the theatre there are tables and chairs, and people can have any drink they like?—Exactly.

3748. The difference between this theatre at Cremorne and the music halls is this, that there is a shorter performance at Cremorne, and you have so much space that they can walk into your theatre for about an hour, and walk out again if they like; they can sit down at a table and enjoy themselves as they please, and just walk in and out again?—Yes.

3749. That could not be very conveniently done at a music hall, could it?—No, but they could go next door.

3750. But it becomes necessary at the music halls that they should take refreshments in the same place where the theatrical performance is going on?—They could do the same as they do at the Grecian and Lanes, and Rouse's.

3751. The Grecian has a large garden round it?—Yes, the Lord Chamberlain will not allow smoking inside the building.

3752. At the Grecian there is, however, a garden round it, as I say?—Yes.

3753. That is much the same thing as at Cremorne gardens, only it is not so extensive?—Just the same as Cremorne, only not so extensive.

3754. The same as the gardens in Germany; you have never been there, perhaps?—No.

3755. And much the same thing as the gardens in France?—Yes.

3756. There is this drinking, smoking, and eating at Cremorne?—Yes.

3757. There is probably no place in the world where people smoke more cigars than at Cremorne. You have got an antagonism to smoking, eating, and drinking; but you do not find that the smoke at all interferes with you there, do you?—Not outside, but it is prohibited inside.

3758. They are only inside for a very short time?—They are only inside for a very short time; at the music halls they can go out to a public house.

3759. Of course every man in a free country can go into the street, we know, but if he walks out of the music halls there is no amusement for him in the street?—No, and he has to pay if he returns.

3760. If he walks out of the theatre at Cremorne and walks into another part of the garden, there is something going on, for the amusements rush on pretty quickly from one place to another?—Yes.

3761. You have horsemanship there?—Yes, we have horsemanship, but there is no smoking, eating, and drinking allowed there.

3762. There is no smoking, eating, and drinking allowed in any of those particular places?—In none of them.

3763. But can you smoke, eat, and drink as much as you like in the other parts?—Yes.

3764. There are private rooms round the place where they dance?—Yes.

3765. And ladies and gentlemen go into those boxes?—Yes, there are boxes.

3766. They are up too high for people to see into them, are they not?—No, you can see into them.

E. T. Smith, Esq.

30 April 1866.

them. I took great care of that when I had them built.

3767. Where must you go to see into those boxes?—As you pass below, they are open, and no immorality can take place there.

3768. There is a row of boxes all round for refreshments, and you can see into them, you say?—Yes.

3769. What height are they from the ground?—About eight feet.

3770. They are rather more, are they not?—No.

3771. Eight to the bottom of the boxes?—Yes, eight feet to the bottom of the boxes.

3772. First of all, there are boxes on the ground?—Yes.

3773. What is the height of those boxes on the ground with tables in them?—From the ground to the roof about eight feet.

3774. Above those there are other boxes, are there not?—Yes, dinner boxes and supper boxes.

3775. They are like little rooms?—Yes, like little rooms.

3776. Something very much like the cabinets in Paris?—I have never been in them.

3777. Not in the Champs Elysées?—No, I have not been there.

3778. They are very much in the same style as the rooms at Cremorne; they are little rooms?—Our rooms are entirely thrown open; when I had them built, I had them built so that everybody could see into them, and so that the magistrates could see that there was nothing immoral possible that the police could not see.

3779. There are some boxes above the other boxes, you say?—Yes, there are 14 rooms, just for four persons to sit in; that is all.

3780. Where you can have any refreshment you like?—No, you cannot go up there to have a bottle of wine without you dine or sup; we do not let them out for drinking purposes.

3781. You could dine in them?—Yes; we have some of the first noblemen in the land who dine in them.

3782. Or sup in them?—Yes, or sup in them; the moment it is dusk they are lighted up inside.

3783. You have said that there is going to be a ballet; are you going to have a play this year?—No, it will be a kind of pantomime.

3784. But there will be talking in it, I suppose?—Not this year.

3785. You have had talking, I suppose?—We have had singing, no talking.

3786. Does not your opera go through the recitative and all that sort of thing?—It is merely a sort of transformation scene, and songs and duets, and so on.

3787. In an opera you must have a recitative or something, or else it would be all nonsense?—It was merely a tale written by Mr. Tully, with a few songs put together.

3788. But who tells the tale?—It is only in the singing, and from the description of the piece.

3789. There is no dialogue?—No, there is no dialogue in that piece; I dare say I shall have dialogue during the next season, and I dare say that I may play a farce.

3790. Were you ever at Amsterdam?—No, never.

3791. You seem to be shocked at smoking; are you aware that at Amsterdam there is a place precisely similar to the music halls here, only not so large, where they have smoking and take refreshments, and there is French vauderville performed there, in fact, they perform three pieces every night?—I was not aware of that.

3792. Everything is conducted with the greatest propriety, and the most respectable persons in Amsterdam go there?—I know they are fond of their pipes there.

3793. A good many people are fond of their pipes in England?—Yes.

3794. If that suits Dutchmen, why should it not suit Englishmen who have Dutch tastes?—It depends entirely upon whether it is English or Dutch taste.

3795. Why should not an Englishman with a Dutch taste indulge it if he does not interfere with anybody?—Well, it is you who have got to legislate, and you will be responsible.

3796. But should not the tendency of legislation be to let people do pretty much as they please, if they do not interfere with others?—But they do interfere with others.

3797. How?—If your wife and family wanted to see a piece at Drury Lane, and just under her nose there were 50 or 60 people blowing their clouds, you would say that was disgraceful.

3798. But the people would not do that at Drury Lane, would they?—They would if you threw it open.

3799. You think that the people could not get on without smoking, eating, and drinking?—No; you would ruin the theatres, and make the theatres a disgrace to society.

3800. You think that because they do it at one place they must necessarily do it at all other places?—Yes, of course.

3801. Chairman.] Would not a higher price of admission check that?—The theatres would never be able to compete with the music halls.

3802. Mr. Locke.] You think that there should be legislation to prevent smoking?—In theatres, I do.

3803. It would not do to leave it for the proprietors of theatres to say no smoking is allowed, you think?—No, certainly not; it is a matter of the very greatest difficulty even now; a gentleman would feel annoyed if he lit his cigar in the lobby to be told of it.

3805. But take a tragedy; a person would not want to go and see a tragedy at a music hall, where there was smoking, eating, and drinking going on?—Yes, they would; they go now to see a tragedy, if they have been out dining, and so would the lower orders of society. Look at the Bower Saloon, that place is licensed by the Lord Chamberlain; the gentlemen of the Committee ought to go and see these places.

3806. But they do not smoke there, do they?—They have to go through a public house to it, the same as one or two of the other theatres.

3807. They have got the Lord Chamberlain's license?—Yes, the Lord Chamberlain's license restricts immediately any smoking, eating, or drinking in the place. In my boxes, the refreshments are entirely detached from the auditorium, and the place in the pit is entirely detached.

3808. Where have you got your refreshment bar in the pit?—Right at the back; it is partitioned off.

3809. You cannot see the counter from the pit?—I do not think you can.

3810. Chairman.] Can you see the performance from the bar?—No.

3811. Mr. Locke.] When you are sitting in boxes, you can see that bar; can you not?—No, our pit is very large; it holds 1,200 people.

3812. But the pit comes under the boxes?—Yes, therefore you cannot see it.

3813. But cannot you see it from one of the front boxes close to the stage?—No, certainly not.

3814. But it is in the pit, is it not?—No, it is detached; it is partitioned off.

3815. Chairman.] There is a screen behind it, I suppose?—It is a little shut up partition, enclosed.

3816. Mr. Locke.] They sell wine and spirits, and so on, at that bar, do they not?—Yes, they have a license from the Inland Revenue.

3817. And that is a very valuable thing, is it not?—No, I find that the greater proportion of men like to go round to the public houses, just to meet their comrades, rather than have it there; they charge more for it in the theatres, and give a better article.

3818. How much do you let that for?—I let the three saloons for 10 l. a week; the boxes, pit, and gallery.

3819. Are they each of them 10 l. a week?—No, 10 l. for the lot; for that they sell the bills, and the books, and take care of the ladies' bonnets, retiring rooms, and gentlemen's coats and umbrellas on wet nights.

3820. They make what profits they can?—They make what profits you like to give them.

3821. But have they the sale of spirits for that?—They can do what they like for that.

3822. Chairman.] That amounts to 500 l. a year?—No, because the theatre is only open seven months in the year; it is about 250 l.

3823. Mr. Locke.] They pay you 10 l. a week, and furnish all those persons about the theatre who perform necessary duties, and whom you yourself would have to pay if they did not?—No, because the parties pay themselves from what they can get for the bills; if you wanted anything or the children wanted to go anywhere, you gave them 3 d. or 2 d. to take the children to the retiring room.

3824. Colonel Sturt.] The boxkeepers pay themselves, do they not?—The boxkeepers pay themselves.

3825. Mr. Locke.] How many persons do you suppose those people employ in the theatre?—About six; two to each part; they are generally old women.

3826. But you have got some waiters, have you not?—No.

3827. Who are the people who draw all the beer?—The daughter of a very respectable man indeed, Mr. Drysdale, who has been at Her Majesty's Theatre, and so on; she does it.

3828. She cannot do it all over the house?—There is no beer drawn except in the pit.

3829. Is there not a beer engine in the gallery?—No.

3830. Only in the pit?—Only the pit. I believe they supply those people up stairs from the pit.

3831. Now about the stage falling off; you attribute that to the three patent theatres being deprived of their former privilege. Did you ever see the Report of the Dramatic Literature Committee, which was moved for by the late Mr. Duncombe, which was printed on the 2d of August 1832?—Yes.

3832. You said that you thought the actors very much deteriorated in the style of their performances?—Not in the style of their performances.

3833. But the character of their performances?—Yes; the character of their performances; there have been some very good things written.

3834. You have stated that Mr. Phelps is the only good actor?—Yes, the only good actor compared with former days.

3835. Are you aware that John Kemble introduced elephants on to the stage when those three were patent theatres?—Yes; and so did Yates at the Adelphi.

3836. But the Adelphi was not a patent theatre, and he might introduce any animal he liked on the stage?—Yes; Her Majesty used to witness Van Amburg, and go and see the lions fed.

3837. But that was at a patent theatre, before the alteration took place in 1832?—I think not. Van Amburg was since that.

3838. But was it not a charge against the patent theatres, that the object for which they had their patent, namely, the legitimate drama, had been forgotten by them, and that the very species of performance that there was at the minor theatres was introduced on to the stage of the major theatres?—First of all, with regard to the actors, I do not think we have anybody on the stage who has ever drawn at the patent theatres since Edmund Kean's death. It is, of course, a large place to fill, and a very expensive place.

3839. But I am asking you, when they were patent theatres, and when they had exclusive privileges, whether the charge against them was not, that they were performing pieces which, it was supposed, the minor theatres alone performed; that they introduced on to the stage horses and other animals, and that therefore they had no right to complain if the same privilege which they had were extended to all the theatres?—I cannot speak to 30 years ago, but you will find Mr. Kemble's evidence and other people's evidence, to show you the falling off of the drama.

3840. At that time?—Yes, and it has been falling off ever since.

3841. It was falling off before 1832, but at the present time there are more theatres, and they are better filled, is not that so?—You may think so, but it is the managers who find things out; they keep the treasury.

3842. Do you mean that they keep the theatres open at their own expense?—If you take a house for seven, 14, or 21 years, you must pay the rent.

3843. The theatres have filled lately, have they not?—Mr. Boucicault had an excellent piece at the Princess's; the Princess's has filled exceedingly well. The pantomimes always fill a theatre, but after 12 weeks run of a pantomime, I think it is a very dangerous game for any manager to go to expense unless he has got plays that would really take the run of the town.

3844. You look upon yourself as a sort of public benefactor then. You have had many theatres, Drury Lane and Astley's, for instance, and

E. T. Smith, Esq.
30 April 1866.

and you are now keeping Astley's open for the public good, I suppose?—I am just like a barrister who likes to take his fee for his brief. The theatres do not pay now so well as they did; there are only three months in the year, during the pantomime, that a manager can be certain of his house paying, unless he has plays written by Mr. Boucicault, or some one who understands the public taste.

3845. But you get such a piece every now and then?—Very seldom.

3846. Setting off the good plays against the bad ones, I will ask you whether the theatres ever answered better than they do now?—I think they have answered better than they do now; I am not at liberty to mention names, but they have answered a great deal better than many that I know lately.

3847. Are the rents higher or lower than they were?—Drury Lane when I took it was 4,000 l., it used to be 4,500 l.; I pay the same rent at Astley's as I did before; I paid 6,000 l. at Her Majesty's; I think Mr. Fechter pays a little less rent at the Lyceum than he did before.

3848. Chairman.] The rent was once 14,000 l. at Drury Lane, was it not?—Yes, I think so; 12,000 l. or 14,000 l., but that was at a time when there was a lot of noblemen and gentlemen on the committee who managed the theatre themselves; Mr. Bunn paid 12,000 l.

3849. Chairman.] Did Mr. Bunn make it answer?—No, and Mr. Polhill lost 60,000 l. at Drury Lane.

3850. Colonel Sturt.] Mr. Bunn had Covent Garden too, had he not?—Yes.

3851. Chairman.] But the other theatres have answered lately, have they not?—No, but I do not wish to go into the private affairs of my brother managers.

3852. Mr. Du Cane.] What was the style of performance which you gave at the Alhambra, when it was under your management?—Acrobats and dancing; that was all.

3853. Pretty much the same as it is now?—Pretty much the same as it is now, only we had no scenery.

3854. Had you no ballet?—Yes, I think I had a ballet there.

3855. Have you visited the Alhambra after, under Mr. Strange's management?—No, I have not had time.

3856. But have you visited it?—Yes, once or twice.

3857. Is it, in your opinion, conducted in an orderly manner?—Yes.

3858. Do you consider the audience respectable?—Yes; as respectable as all public audiences are.

3859. Quite as respectable as a theatre audience?—Just the same as a theatre audience, I should say.

3860. Did you notice any great proportion of women of a certain class at the Alhambra?—Perhaps I should not know them.

3861. At all events you did not observe them? No; I did not wish to observe them.

3862. Do you agree with the opinion given here by Mr. Buckstone, that the facilities with which a young man with a good voice, or a turn for dancing, can get an engagement at the music halls now tends to create a dearth of rising young actors?—I do agree with that opinion in one respect; it would make you laugh to see the number of letters I receive; 8 or 10 a day sometimes, from persons who wish to be actors and actresses and singers. It is "I have got a good baritone voice, or a good tenor voice." They want to be singers, more particularly comic singers. A man can go and get 6 l. a week from a music hall, and he will sing over the water, or he will keep his brougham and go up to the Oxford, and then he will go to another music hall again; he will go and get his four or five turns a night, and earn 20 l. or 30 l. a week.

3863. When you were manager of Drury-lane Theatre, or other theatres, can you call to recollection your having engaged any talented young actor from a music hall?—Yes, I engaged Mr. Parkinson; I had Drury-lane and Her Majesty's Theatre, and the Alhambra at one time; I engaged Mr. Parkinson and another young man also to appear at either place.

3864. Do you consider that there is any falling off in the public taste for legitimate drama at the present time?—I could answer the question, but I would rather not. I do not consider that the drama has answered at Drury-lane, although they have played it. Looking to the position of the lessees at the present moment, I do not consider that it has sufficiently answered.

3865. Is that in consequence of the public taste having changed, or is it from the difficulty of finding a sufficient staff of actors to put a high class play on the stage?—That is one reason; and the other reason is the manner in which authors very properly proceed. My friend Mr. Boucicault travels a good deal; he goes to Paris: he is very clever, and he gets ideas and puts them together; and he brings out a sensation drama. Now, for a person to bring out a merely talking drama, without any action in it, or sensational effects, is useless; the people will not go to that theatre; they will go where there is scenic effect, and mechanical effects to please the eye.

3866. Do you give any burlesque performances at Cremorne Gardens?—No.

3867. Do you consider that burlesques are a very paying style of performance now?—It is the style that most things are written in; for instance, when I was playing "Mazeppa" at Astley's, they brought a burlesque out at the Victoria, and I understand it is very well done indeed.

3868. Did it draw a large house?—Yes; persons who went to see one would go to see the other. Some persons think that deteriorates the drama; on the contrary, I think it does a great deal of good. The people who have seen one say, "Let us go and see the other."

3869. You do not share in the opinion that the performance of burlesque tends to turn the public taste from the legitimate drama?—No, certainly not; if it is a piquant burlesque, gentlemen can amuse themselves, and laugh at the wit; and there is nothing at all immoral or obscene in it.

3870. You think that it rather induces people to go and see the performance that is burlesqued?—Exactly.

3871. Do you think that if the music halls were allowed to give theatrical performances, the proprietors of those establishments could afford to give as high a sum for a first-class actor as the managers of theatres can?—Certainly not; not for first-class actors. The only boon that it would be to the music hall proprietor would be the profit that he would obtain on his grogs, and his beer, and his cigars.

that

3872. Do you agree with the evidence that has been given, that music halls would employ inferior actors, and in that way the public taste would be degraded?—Yes, I do.

3873. Mr. Strange said in his evidence that it would not pay him to have any sort of high-class theatrical entertainment, even if he could legally do it?—Mr. Strange is a very clever fellow; but he might alter his mind when he obtained his licence.

3874. Colonel Sturt.] You have mentioned that there are some immoral songs sung at some of those music halls; do you consider that the performances at the music halls are lower in their moral character than the performances at regularly licensed theatres?—Certainly; highly respectable authors write for the stage who would not write for music halls.

3875. What do you think of the performances at music halls as a matter of fact?—At some of the music halls the songs are not immoral; but I was told yesterday by a friend of mine that he saw in the paper that one of them was fined last week.

3876. You have stated that you thought music halls tended to encourage drunkenness; did you find it so when you were proprietor of the Alhambra?—I have no doubt of it, when a man can have his grog always before him; they lose their place if they go out.

3877. The more men go to music halls the less they would go to public-houses, I suppose?—I suppose so, because it is a public-house that the man is in.

3878. Lord Eustace Cecil.] You have had some experience both of music halls and theatres, have you not?—Yes.

3879. Is it the habit of the managers to have detectives at music halls as well as theatres to look after improper characters?—No.

3880. Mr. Webster stated that at the theatres it is so?—I have no detective; I have a constable attending every night at the door, and in case of disturbance he is sent for from the door.

3881. You never had any detectives there when you were lessee of the Alhambra?—No.

3882. Do you have them at Astley's?—I shall have some to look after the bars.

3883. When you were manager of Drury Lane Theatre you never had detectives at all?—No.

3884. Do you think it would be possible so to define a light piece to be performed where there was smoking, eating, and drinking, as not to interfere with the legitimate drama?—How can you do it? I think it would be utterly impossible.

3885. You would object to any such performance at the music halls as even that given by Mr. and Mrs. German Reed?—Go and look at the music halls! Would you go and grant a license indiscriminately to a person who has got a room half the size of this to go and put up "Penny Gaff," such as you might once see in the New Cut, where people used to go and pledge and steal things on purpose to go and belong to the corps there? But I should not object to the Alhambra being a theatre; I should like to see it a theatre; I think it would be a very paying concern.

3886. You think that it is utterly impossible to define "light plays" for the purpose I mentioned?—Yes.

3887. Are smoking, eating, and drinking allowed in the body of the building in any of the places which have the Lord Chamberlain's license, such as the Bower Operetta House, in Stangate?—That theatre is in a public-house; the passage is in the public-house, and you open a door, and there is the theatre.

3888. Take the Cabinet Theatre at King's Cross, and the City of London in Norton Folgate?—The Cabinet is only a little amateur place.

3889. Are smoking, eating, and drinking allowed there?—I have not been there.

3890. Do you know the Effingham and Marylebone Theatres?—The Marylebone is a highly respectable theatre; Mr. Cave would not allow any smoking, eating, or drinking there.

3891. Mr. Clay.] I understood you to say that theatres, as a speculation, have been less remunerative during the last 10 years than they were at some previous period?—Yes.

3892. At what period would you say they were more remunerative than they have been during the last 10 years?—I was speaking of the time when there were actors and actresses that people would run after; Mr. Webster is a very nice fellow, and a brother manager, but he is getting very old, and Mr. Buckstone is getting very deaf; all the favourites of the public are falling off.

3893. If more money was made at the time when there were better actors, can you tell me what manager made it? Going back 10 years, what managers ever made as much money as has been made in theatres lately?—Mr. Davidge, at the Surrey, made about 25,000*l.*; Mr. Ducrow made 60,000*l.*, and Mr. Greenwood, at Sadler's Wells, made money.

3894. Is not the run of a piece a pretty good test of its paying character?—It may be so.

3896. But you will allow, will you not, that the run of a piece is a fair test of the money that it brings in?—Yes, and it depends on the actors and actresses. Mr. Buckstone is particularly lucky; he has got Mr. Sothern, and people run after him.

3897. Just so; but when a piece runs for 150 nights it is a pretty fair test that it brings money in, is it not?—Yes.

3898. Is it, then, within your recollection that previously to the last 10 years there had ever been in any theatres in London such an extraordinary run of pieces as there has been during the last 10 years. Take "Lord Dundreary," or the "Ticket of Leave Man," "The Colleen Bawn," "The Streets of London," the "Octoroon," and a great many others that I do not recollect, and tell me if it is within your recollection that previously to the last 10 years there were in any theatres in London pieces which had anything like such long runs?—I cannot bring them to my recollection at this moment.

3899. Then it is surely a fair inference that the theatres take more money than they did before?—No. We have a better class of authors; sensation dramas draw now.

3900. But I am speaking only of the money that is made; is it not your opinion that, as a general rule, the managers of theatres have made much better speculations during the last 10 years than than they did in the 10 years before that time?—I am not at liberty to say. I know that Covent Garden has not, but I cannot speak of the treasuries of my brother managers.

E. T. Smith, Esq.

3901. You say that a sensation drama will pretty generally draw, but you think that what you call a "talking drama" does not; is there not a piece which has been acted lately for a great many nights, called "Society"?—I believe there is.

3902. Are you aware that that is as entirely a "talking drama" as you can possibly put together?—I have never seen it.

3903. That there is not a sensation scene from beginning to end, and that that piece has drawn for a great many nights?—I have never seen it, but I am aware that it has been running.

3904. The legitimate drama, in your belief, has fallen off from the deterioration and want of actors?—Exactly.

3905. Do you not think that there are other causes that may readily account for the facts. I presume you would consider that the legitimate drama was most likely to be supported by the highest and best educated classes of society?—Yes, certainly.

3906. Do you not think that the great change that has taken place in the habits of society, such as the late hour of dining, and the immense competition of all other kinds of amusement; the fact that whereas 50 years ago where there was one ball where there are now 20; do you not, I say, consider that those causes, much more than any deterioration in English actors, may have caused what you call the "degradation" of the legitimate drama?—They may add to it, certainly; but, take Mr. Jefferson at the Adelphi, and Mr. Sothern at the Haymarket, they are Americans.

3907. Mr. Sothern is an Englishman, is he not?—He is from America, I think; he looks like an American; and Mr. Jefferson is an American, I believe. But with regard to the legitimate drama, you must bear in mind that you have got as good "sensation" in Richard the Third and Macbeth as you have in any sensation drama of modern date, but where are the men to play them.

3908. But can you conceive any reason why there should be a less dramatic talent among Englishmen now than there was in the days of Kemble or Kean, or at any other time?—I suppose it is that a gentleman who has received a good education can get more money by following some other occupation than if he were an actor.

3909. Do you not conceive it to be a more likely reason that there is less demand for actors of a high class?—You cannot get an actor of a high class; can you tell me of any one yourself? I should like to know where to get one.

3910. For many years past, owing to the causes I have mentioned, is it not the fact that there has not been a demand for that kind of acting?—No, and for the best of all reasons, that you have not had pieces written for actors of that class, nor could you find actors of that class if you wanted them.

3911. But do you not suppose that if London was now filled with theatres beginning to give the Shakesperian drama, and those theatres were crammed, actors would spring up to meet the demand?—No; where are they?

3912. You think, in fact, that there has been a material alteration in the genius and talent of England?—Certainly there has in dramatic talent; not in Englishmen generally, I suppose.

3913. You consider that there has been an entire change in the dramatic genius and talent of England?—Yes.

3914. Can you conceive any reason for such a change?—No, except that I do not think they expect now to receive a sufficient reward for their labour.

3915. You say that the cause of the absence of dramatic talent is that people do not expect to be rewarded?—Yes; you are speaking of the legitimate drama. Think of the number of years that Drury Lane was closed; and I did not expect even myself that it would answer, nor has it answered since, I understand. What gentleman could look forward for success with legitimate acting at any of the principal theatres? Is there any encouragement for him to study it?

3916. There is, therefore, no falling off in the dramatic genius of the country, but there has ceased to be a demand for this particular kind of entertainment; is that not so?—I do not know about ceasing to be a demand; an actor can always take his turn through the country; for instance, if Mr. Fechter, in "Hamlet," was to take a turn round right through the provinces, he would make a very ample fortune; the theatres would all be open to receive him; but with regard to having a proper cast, such as we used to have at the patent theatres, it is utterly impossible.

3917. But the provinces are not a test of what I say, because in the provinces there is not that competition of other amusements, is there?—Yes, in Manchester, Liverpool, and Birmingham there is. At Birmingham there are two theatres belonging to Mr. Copeland.

3918. But there is not that immense competition from concerts, music halls, and so on, as there is in London, is there?—Yes, there is Italian opera; Giuglini and Piccolomini I took down twice in the season. The cause of that is this, that in provincial towns, such as Manchester, the time when these concerts take place, or the opera takes place, is the time when society meets together all round the neighbourhood.

3919. If you were sure that you could cram your theatre by the representation of what is called legitimate drama, should you doubt that by going through the provinces, and selecting such genius as you could find there, and then adding all such genius as there is still in London (which is a good deal), you could even now produce an excellent performance of that kind?—Certainly, if you could get a staff, but you cannot get it; every manager in London knows that an actor must come out of the country first; then he is "written up," and the cry is "secure him," but you cannot get him.

3920. But having found the man, do you think you could not make a great deal of money by legitimate drama, or is it that you think that you could not find that man?—I could make the money if I could find the man.

3921. There is one theatre, is there not, where they have performed the legitimate drama for many years past, and that is Sadler's Wells?—Yes.

3922. Has that theatre paid?—I believe so; Mr. Greenwood and Mr. Phelps had it; Mr. Phelps did a great deal for the drama at Sadler's Wells.

3923. And he was paid for it?—Yes.

3924. Do you not think that in London there is an audience to be found for all sorts of amusement, from the highest legitimate drama down to the the lowest order of decent entertainment?—I think not.

3925. Mr. Phelps appealed to one kind of audience, and the music halls appeal to another?—Mr. Phelps was lessee of the theatre; he had no salary to pay his principal, and his partner was the treasurer in the theatre, so those two made it pay very well, and realised something handsome; but Mr. Phelps transferred his services to Drury Lane.

3926. But still the legitimate drama has paid the manager of any theatre who stuck to it, and music halls pay also. What objection should you make, then, to such a law as this, that all places of dramatic entertainment should have the right of playing precisely what they pleased, consulting as they best could the tastes of their audiences, subject to no legislation whatever except such police regulations as were necessary for preserving decency in the audience, and decency in the performances?—I have no objection if it is in a proper building, and it is put on the same competition as the theatres; so long as there is neither smoking, eating, or drinking.

3927. But smoking, eating, and drinking you would exclude from what you call a legitimate theatre?—Most certainly; I should not like anybody in my drawing room, with ladies singing, to come and sit down with a pipe.

3928. Did you ever go to Mr. Lewis's to hear the Moray Minstrels?—No.

3929. You are not aware that there is a great deal of pipe smoking there?—I do not know.

2930. And that it does not interfere with the music?—They must require something to wash it down before the next song, I should say.

3931. Mr. Selwin.] When you were at the Alhambra, was the size and shape of the building the same as it is now?—Yes.

3932. It has not been increased since?—No.

3933. In your theatre, you say the profit from refreshment is very trifling?—The profits are about 10 l. a week on an average.

3934. That includes fees for use of cloak room, sale of play bills, and so on?—Yes.

3935. But at the music halls, the managers depend to a certain extent, if not to a great extent, on the sale of those refreshments, do they not?—I cannot say that. The Alhambra will hold 3,000 people, and if they pay 1 s. a piece that is 150 l. I suppose the refreshments would be about two-thirds, or about 8 d., and if he gets 4 d. profit that is pretty good.

3936. You have said with regard to the character of the audience during your management at the Alhambra, that you think it was very much the same as the audiences at theatres generally are?—So they are generally.

3937. But Mr. Strange has said, that the average attendance of ladies of the town is about 90 every night?—Yes.

3938. Was that the case when you were manager?—Mr. Strange appears to know more about them than I do; I never counted them.

3939. But those women are found there?—Yes, and you cannot keep them out of the theatres.

3940. Mr. Webster's evidence was that they have detectives at the doors to prevent that class of women going in?—It is the first time I ever heard of there being detectives at the doors of theatres.

3941. Chairman.] Mr. Webster stated that the money of such visitors was not taken at the doors?—I should not refuse their money if they came in, not for all the detectives in London. It is nonsense; it must be wrong; I cannot think it.

3942. Colonel Sturt.] You do not care who comes, provided they behave themselves with propriety?—I do not care who comes, so long as they pay.

3943. Mr. Selwin.] You have said that you could not put in a defined shape the objection to plays being acted in music halls?—No; I should like to see them all theatres, provided they did not smoke.

3944. But, apart from that, at the music halls, would you see any objection to small pieces being acted, provided the number of the actors were limited?—I object to small pieces being acted, if they smoke, eat, and drink.

3945. Even with that limitation of the number of the performers?—Certainly. If you were to do such a thing, I should immediately try to let what interest I had in theatres, or else I should try to do more than any one else, by putting up a large bill, "Gin, 1½ d. a glass; elsewhere, 2 d."; that is what it would come to.

3946. You think that the simple acting of a scene in costume at a music hall, would injure the theatres?—Yes, I think it would be a disgrace to the drama.

3947. Mr. Powell.] How many does the theatre at Cremorne hold?—One of them holds about 1,500 persons.

3948. Have you two theatres?—Yes, I have another, which is a circus.

3949. How many does that hold?—About 2,000; that is for equestrian performances, and I am going to do a ballet there.

3950. Is there a separate charge for admission to each performance?—Yes.

3951. How long does the performance last?—It lasts for an hour at the theatre. The theatre is open to the public in the auditorium portion; but the stalls are paid for, and at the circus they pay 6 d. and 1 s.

3952. Do you find that the audience remain during the whole hour of the performances?—Yes, and they would remain longer, but it would not suit my purpose.

3953. Are there any refreshment stalls within the walls of those theatres?—At the circus there is none whatever, but at the ball-rooms, there is a bar the same as there is at a theatre.

3954. Is there much liquor consumed at that bar?—No, nothing during the performance.

3955. You consider this theatre at Cremorne as thoroughly a theatre as Astley's?—Yes.

3956. Wholly and completely a theatre?—Yes; I had to give security to the magistrates for it.

3957. Was that security with regard to the propriety of the performances?—Yes, with regard to the propriety of the performances connected with the theatre.

3958. Should you object to the music halls having the same kind of performances that you have at Cremorne?—Certainly, if there is smoking, eating, and drinking.

3959. The music hall proprietors, by Mr. Stanley, have expressed their wish as follows: "The proprietors therefore desire the right to perform small pieces, limiting the number of performers, say to five or six persons; say operas, operettas, pantomimes, burlesques, interludes, farces, ballets, or by whatever name they may be called."

E. T. Smith, Esq.

called." Would you give the music hall proprietors the license described in those words?—Certainly not; because six persons they could double or treble to 18; and they could have different dresses, and all sorts of things.

3960. Take Shakespere's plays, not as they are now performed, at a period of great love for spectacle, but restricting the performance within more narrow limits, would it not be possible to act many of those plays without more than five or six performers?—Yes, they would reduce it to one act, and cut it down anyway they liked.

3961. But take a piece of Shakespere's, from beginning to end; could they act it without more than five or six performers?—Or take any other drama; they would take the first act out of the drama, and cut it down and have it done with six performers.

3962. The effect of that would be to bring the music halls to very much the condition of some of the opera houses abroad, where you have not only one opera performed, but a series of scenes from different operas, would it not?—Yes, they do that now; there is no objection to that. At Weston's Music Hall, they have different scenes from different operas, but not in costume.

3963. You have no objection to that?—No, if they have no costume.

3964. Chairman.] You have an objection to scenery?—Yes.

3965. And costume?—Just so; that is a theatre; scenery and costume compose a theatre.

3966. Mr. Powell.] Would you let a person sing a song in character?—There is no objection to that at all; I have seen a drunken cobbler sing all sorts of nonsense; a singer comes on to the stage, and appears to be beastly drunk.

3967. You would allow nigger singers to appear as niggers?—Certainly; if that is their taste.

3968. How do you account for the long run of pieces at the theatres at the present time?—I think a good deal of it is to be attributed to the talent of my friend Mr. Boucicault.

3969. But there are other theatres that have had a long run with their pieces; there is the Haymarket and the Olympic?—Some people run after the scenic artists, and some run after the authors; if you find an author that will produce you an excellent drama, he will have his terms, and sometimes it will have a long run.

3970. Can you give any other reason for that length of run in pieces, which is characteristic of the present day?—No, I cannot; it is just the taste of the public; it is partly the advertising; people take Holloway's pills when they do not want them, and they are no good.

3972. Mr. O'Beirne.] What did you mean by the expression "school" for the drama?—When the patent theatres were in a flourishing state, a gentleman who had had an education would say, "I will take up this profession and study it;" and he had a chance, while those theatres were in their zenith, of appearing there, and in three years, by subscribing to the Fund, he obtained perhaps 200*l.* a year for three consecutive seasons. But it is a difficult thing now to keep open a large theatre.

3973. But you did not mean that there was any actual school for dramatic instruction?—No, there ought to be; that is what I tried for the year I brought out the Dramatic Fund.

3974. You meant merely that under those conditions actors had good opportunities of training themselves in their profession?—Yes.

3975. Mr. Powell.] You have a good burlesque company at Astley's, have you not?—Yes.

3976. Do you intend to take that company down to Cremorne?—No, I shall take the ballet.

3977. But not the other part of the company?—No; but I should be very happy indeed to do so if I thought it would take there.

3978. You do not propose to play at Cremorne this season such a piece as would give exercise to the burlesque company at Astley's?—If I thought it would take I should, because I have got a license.

3979. Lord Ernest Bruce.] How long have you been manager at Astley's?—For three years.

3980. Before that you were for some time lessee of Drury Lane theatre, were you not?—Yes.

3981. For how long?—For 10 years.

3982. Did you leave Drury Lane to go to Astley's, because you thought you had a better chance there?—No; I left Drury Lane because Mr. Falconer thought he could do better than I did, and he gave me 5,000*l.* to go out with my property, scenery, and leases.

3983. And then you went to Astley's?—Yes, some time afterwards.

3984. Is Astley's Theatre your own, or are you lessee?—I am lessee.

3985. To whom does it belong?—To Mr. Batty.

3986. There is no representative of Mr. Astley now living?—No.

3987. Now I believe that as soon as you went to Astley's the whole form of performance was completely changed?—Yes.

3988. In former days there was nothing but horsemanship; did you change it because you found that horsemanship did not pay?—I did not change it, my friend Mr. Boucicault changed that for me; he put seats into the pit, and I have never removed them, although I wish he had made them so that they could be taken up, and then I would have had horsemanship if he had.

3989. Was not that done in consequence of horsemanship declining in interest?—I think it was so; I should be very sorry to pass any remarks on persons who were there before me; but I think they were too niggardly in rewarding talent for horsemanship; for instance, we had horsemanship at the Alhambra, by an American company, and the place used to be crammed twice a day.

3990. Do you not think that it was by the exhibition of wild beasts that Astley's degenerated when that man was killed?—It would be a capital draw if there was a man killed every night.

3991. There is no horsemanship in London now; there is no hippodrome, is there?—No; there will be horsemanship at Cremorne.

3992. Ever since Mr. Boucicault came, and you succeeded him, your performances have been chiefly good operas; Miss Pyne has sung there, has she not?—Yes.

3993. And it has drawn very well, has it?—I am sorry to say that it has not.

3994. You have had "Der Freischutz;" does that draw?—No.

3995. What answers the best; is it pantomime?—Yes.

3996. And Miss Menken as "Mazeppa?"—Yes; a little taste in that way suits the public sometimes.

3997. You do not think there is a great increase of musical taste in that part of London?—I am satisfied that there is no musical taste on the Surrey side.

3998. Have you a half-price?—None at all.

3999. Is not half-price very much discontinued in most theatres?—I think it is discontinued in most of them. I discontinued mine for this reason: we have several gentlemen in this House, and others, who come over to Astley's; they dine so late that they do not get over there until nine o'clock, and I would rather have full price. The prices are, 4 s., 2 s., 1 s. 6 d., and 1 s.

4000. Those are very much lower than the prices you and I remember in former days, when you were lessee at Drury Lane for so many years. What were the prices then?—When I went there the prices were, 7 s. boxes, 3 s. 6 d. pit, and 2 s. and 1 s. galleries. I reduced the price of the boxes, with the consent of the committee, to 4 s., the pit to 2 s., and the galleries to 1 s. and 6 d.

4001. Did you find that answer?—Yes.

4002. But you would not recommend any further reduction?—No; the rent is very high, and it requires a double set of persons to fill that large stage, and double the quantity of paint to put on the scenes; and I should not recommend any further reduction, although I am perfectly satisfied it would do if there was a further reduction.

4003. Now with regard to the stalls and private boxes, you remember that many years ago there was no such thing?—Just so; from the commencement you will find it laid down that the private boxes were not to exceed so many. Miss Burdett Coutts had a box, which she has now; there is a box also belonging to the Duke of Bedford, and also a box above the Duke of Bedford's; that makes three boxes; then there is the committee box; so there are four in all.

4004. You remember, or you have read of the O. P. riots?—Yes.

4005. Those riots arose in a great measure from the increase of private boxes, did they not?—No, I think not.

4006. I think it did arise from that, and also the increase of prices; do you not think that the number of private boxes being increased, and stalls being invented, has rather injured than done good to the theatres?—I am perfectly satisfied of the contrary. When parties send to me they say, "Smith, will you keep me a private box?" they never send for one place or a stall. If a man wants to take his family, or even to go by himself, he can go without change of dress. Gentlemen have dined in the City, perhaps, and then they say, "We are not dressed; let us have a private box at the theatre."

4008. You do not think that stalls are injurious?—No; Mr. Boucicault, at Astley's, made a balcony similar to the American theatres, which is much preferable to a private box, because I think that private boxes now are not placed in the position where they should be. I think where persons have to pay two or three guineas for a box it should be in the centre of the theatre, so that you can see everything, whereas now they can only see one side of the theatre. I recollect the time at Drury Lane when there were behind always little boxes for two in the centre of the theatre, at the back of the auditorium part, and where there were blinds, and you could see everything and not be seen.

4009. Those boxes you did away with?—Yes.

4010. Those boxes used to hold four, did they not?—No, only two.

4011. Why did you do away with them?—Because I enlarged the dress circle.

4012. But you think that private boxes have done no mischief?—No, certainly not.

4013. And the same remark applies to the stalls?—Just so.

4014. They generally fill at Astley's, do they not?—Yes.

4015. Are you aware that Madame Vestris would never allow stalls in the theatre, because she said she thought it made an aristocratic division, which rather damaged her than otherwise?—She was wrong there, I think; she was a very clever woman, but I differ from her there; I think a gentleman or a nobleman would rather sit with his back to the pit and gallery, than be stared at.

4016. Have you ever heard that Madame Vestris had that objection?—No.

4017. I believe that was when she was getting rather on the decline, and did not like being stared at herself, perhaps; have you ever heard any other manager state that?—No, never.

4018. In Mr. Webster's examination, allusion was made to curtains in private boxes, but they are never drawn right across, are they?—No.

4019. You never saw such a thing in Drury Lane?—No; perhaps Mr. Webster might have done it himself.

4020. Such a thing would not be tolerated, would it?—No; it is a mistaken notion altogether.

4021. It is what you have never seen done in any respectable audience at Drury Lane, or anywhere else?—No.

4022. Chairman.] Have you any further remarks to address to the Committee?—I think not.

DION BOUCICAULT, Esq., called in; and Examined.

4023. Mr. Locke.] I BELIEVE that at present you are not manager of any theatre?—I am not at present manager of any theatre.

4024. What theatres have you been manager of in London?—I have been manager of Drury Lane for a short period, and of the Adelphi in connection with Mr. Webster, and I have also shared the profits in other theatres without being titular manager, in consequence of my always charging in that way for my pieces; I receive one half of the net profits.

4025. Chairman.] As an author, I presume?—Yes, as an author.

4026. Mr. Locke.] You are a dramatic author?—Yes.

4027. You have written plays which have been accepted at most of the theatres?—Yes, at nearly all the theatres.

D. Boucicault, Esq.

30 April 1866.

4028. Will you state the names of the theatres which have taken your plays?—Old Covent Garden, before it was destroyed, when it was a theatre; Drury Lane, the Adelphi, the Lyceum, the Haymarket, the Princess's, and St. James's Theatres.

4029. How many pieces have you written already?—Between 180 and 200.

4030. You are likewise an actor?—Yes.

4031. At what theatres have you performed in London?—At Drury Lane, the Adelphi, and at the Princess's Theatres.

4032. Therefore you have experience in every branch of the profession?—Yes, in every branch.

4033. As a manager of theatres, as a dramatic author, and as an actor?—Yes, and as a builder of theatres.

4034. Which are the theatres that you have built?—I reconstructed Astley's entirely; I gutted it from the roof down to the foundations, and I have also built three theatres in America.

4035. I believe that you have also been a good deal in Paris?—Yes.

4036. Have you written plays for the French?—Yes, and I am now producing a piece at the Gaiétés in Paris.

4037. In French?—Yes.

4038. Chairman.] A piece you have written?—Yes, and it is now in rehearsal.

4039. Mr. Locke.] When will that piece be brought out?—In about a fortnight; I came over here to attend the Committee from the rehearsal.

4040. What is the name of that piece?—It is a translation of "Arrah-na-Pogue" adapted to the French stage, reconstructed; it is entitled Jean la Poste, ou les Noces Irlandaises.

4041. First of all, with regard to the Lord Chamberlain's supervision, what is your opinion with regard to the propriety of the Lord Chamberlain being continued as licenser of plays?—I think that the office of licenser of plays is very foreign to the remainder of his functions; I think he is a very improper person for many reasons to be the licenser of plays.

4042. Will you state those reasons?—In the first place, the office is changeable with the Ministry, and one Lord Chamberlain differs from another in his views; we have been greatly disturbed in consequence of the Lord Chamberlains having different opinions on the same subject, both with regard to plays and with regard to theatres. Some plays have been licensed, and have been withdrawn after eight or ten years; others have been refused, and then a license has been granted after 10 or 13 years; we do not know when a piece will be refused, or on what grounds it will be refused.

4043. Chairman.] How many times has it happened that a license has been withdrawn after 10 years?—It happened in the case of "Jack Sheppard."

4044. Are there any others?—There were two or three, I think, of a similar description, which took place about that time.

4045. Mr. Locke.] Do you think if there were no officer to license plays, that there would be any inconvenience from improper pieces being produced?—I do not think there is any objection to a licenser, with a power of appeal from his decision, so as not to make him an arbitrary officer; but I have been in countries where the standard of the drama is very high, and where there is no licensing for plays or theatres.

4046. Will you mention to the Committee which countries those are?—In the United States, for instance, where I think the standard of the drama is very much higher than it is in this country.

4047. In what respect is it higher?—The pieces produced are of a better character, and the legitimate drama is more generally patronised; there are theatres almost in every city where the legitimate drama is generally played; both tragedies and comedies have long runs, and have had for the last 10 or 12 years. Those theatres pay best that play the higher class of entertainment.

4048. What new modern pieces have been introduced in America?—All those pieces that I have produced during the last six years, with the exception of "Arrah-na-Pogue," have been produced in America. "The Colleen Bawn" and "The Octoroon" were originally produced in America.

4049. But you made some alterations in "The Octoroon," I suppose?—None whatever.

4050. In what part of America was "The Octoroon" played?—All over it, north and south.

4051. Was it ever played in New York?—Yes, it was produced in New York.

4052. Was not there a strong objection taken to it?—None whatever; they considered it a very fair picture of manners.

4053. One would suppose that it would offend a great many people?—No, it was not offensive; it was looked on as a reproduction of fact.

4054. Those pieces you brought out first of all in America?—Yes.

4055. And afterwards you brought them out here?—Yes, they were afterwards brought out here.

4056. Can you mention any other pieces that have been performed here, which have first been performed in America?—Yes; "Lord Dundreary" was originally performed in America: Tom Taylor was the author; and "Rip Van Winkle" was first acted in America.

4057. And those pieces were written for American audiences?—Yes, they were; I have never known a piece in America of any kind that was of an objectionable character.

4058. There is no licenser of plays in America?—None whatever.

4059. Now, supposing that the licensing of plays were abolished in England, what do you think would be a sufficient check to prevent any improper pieces being produced on the stage?—I think the public themselves are the principal check; there are very many things that the licenser passes that the public does not pass; we very often have pieces performed containing things which the licenser has passed, and which even the actors themselves have passed (though they are more sensitive than the licenser, because of course, they do not want to be hissed), but what escapes them does not escape the public.

4060. Can you give us an instance of that?—Yes; take my comedy called "Old Heads and Young Hearts," produced at the Haymarket in 1844, when the licensing was stricter than it is now; there was a love scene at the end, where the gentleman (played by Charles Mathews) had to say to the lady, "I came to scoff, but I remained to pray," he being on his knees; that expression, out of Goldsmith, the audience mistook; they thought it came out of the Bible, and they hissed it.

4061. Can you mention any other instance?—Yes,

—Yes, lately, at the Princess's Theatre, in Mr. Charles Reade's piece, of "Never Too Late to Mend;" that was licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, but it created a great disturbance in the house the first night.

4062. Was that the prison scene with the crank?—Yes.

4063. That was not discontinued, was it?—Yes, after a short time they cut it out; it was modified by degrees, and at last they left it out altogether; it is left out now.

4064. Colonel Sturt.] It was not modified for a long time, was it?—The crank was taken out after two or three nights; and the scene was omitted after about 20 or 30 nights more.

4065. Lord Eustace Cecil.] The play goes on, does it not?—It went on for about 120 nights.

4066. Mr. Locke.] But that other scene, where a boy was put against the wall, continued, I believe, all through?—Yes.

4067. Did the public object to that at all?—They did, very strongly.

4068. You think that the public are the best check?—Yes.

4069. And that their taste is quite sufficient to prevent any impropriety on the stage?—I do; but I do not object, speaking as a dramatic author, to the licensing system, provided the officer is put himself under some sort of check, so that he shall not have arbitrary power, and be able to make a capricious use of it.

4070. Who do you think should be the referee, or the person to decide whether the licenser had acted properly?—I think that a simple case of words, or a situation, struck out might be put in very small compass, and submitted to the Home Secretary.

4071. You propose that he should be the check over the licenser?—Yes.

4072. Do you think that the Lord Chamberlain should be the licenser?—Certainly not; there should be a special officer, to be paid by fees from the theatres, or the various places which he licenses, precisely as it is in France.

4073. That is to say, that he should perform his own duties only?—Yes; that he should perform his own duties only, and be responsible for them himself.

4074. Colonel Sturt.] And be a permanent officer?—Yes, and be a permanent officer.

4075. Mr. Locke.] Would you have that officer simply for licensing plays, or would you have him entrusted with the other duties with which the Lord Chamberlain is entrusted?—Certainly not; he should have no other duties.

4076. He should be responsible for what he did, and not appoint any one under him?—Yes.

4077. But if an author objected to his decision, he should have an opportunity of appealing to the Home Secretary?—Just so; he should have an opportunity of appealing to the Home Secretary.

4078. Have you any further observation to make with regard to the licensing of plays?—No, none whatever.

4079. Now, with regard to the licensing of the building itself, what is your view with regard to that?—That the person should be a separate officer; he should be an architect, or a person having some special knowledge of the matter; the Lord Chamberlain has naturally no knowledge of it.

4080. What should be the instruction to the person licensing theatres with regard to the course he should pursue; what should be his duty?—There should be a schedule attached to the Bill, laying down a certain number of matters which he should be obliged to enforce, such as the width of the entrances, the width of the corridors and passages in the centre of the pit. Where a large block of people are assembled together, as in the gallery, or in the pit, where you have 700 or 800 people in a mass, it is necessary that in the centre of the mass there should be an ample passage kept clear, and never occupied under any circumstances. There should be an access to the middle of the mass, so that people could go in and out easily.

4081. But should the officer have any option whether a theatre should be licensed or not?—Never.

4082. Any place that was fit for a theatre should be licensed, as a matter of course?—Yes.

4083. The only ground of refusal should be that the building was not adapted for that purpose?—Yes.

4084. Therefore the licenser of theatres should be an architect, and a person authorised to inspect the building, and to report on it, and if in his opinion it was calculated for that purpose, the license should follow as a matter of course?—Yes, as a matter of course.

4085. That would be something approaching free trade in theatres?—Yes, as it now exists in France and America.

4086. How does it exist in France with regard to that one point of licensing theatres?—The licensing of theatres is simply a matter of police regulation; antecedently to two years ago there was regular licensing as we have in England, and it amounted to a monopoly, such as there now is in London, where managers can sell the leases of theatres for a very large premium; the lease of Drury Lane Theatre in Mr. E. T. Smith's time was 4,500 l. a year, and he sold it four years ago for a premium of 6,000 l., I believe about a year or so after he had signed the lease. In Paris there was the same thing, what were called privileges of the theatre, which were sold, but about two years ago the Emperor abolished the privilege altogether, and now they have what they call "la Liberté des Théâtres;" you may build a theatre where you like, provided you conform to the police regulations.

4087. And act what you like, I suppose?—And act what you like.

4088. What were the restrictions of theatres in France before the liberty of the theatres took place; were they similar to what existed in England previously to the passing of the 6th and 7th Victoria?—They were something similar to that.

4089. The Théâtre Français was the only theatre, except the Odéon, that could perform the legitimate drama?—Yes.

4090. Then there is the Académie for operas?—Those two theatres receive subventions, and so does the Imperial Academy.

4091. They do legitimate drama?—Yes.

4092. But previously to two years ago were there not more than those two theatres which received subventions?—The number of theatres that received subventions were, the Grand Opera, the Comic Opera, the Théâtre Français, the Odéon, and the Lyrique. No other theatre ever received any.

4093. None of the others?—No.

4094. The Porte St. Martin, the Gymnase, the Gaiétés?—None of them ever did.

4095. Chairman.] Do those theatres receive subventions still?—Yes, and more than that.

D. Boucicault, Esq.

30 April 1866.

The Government comes forward regularly every year and pays the debts of two of the theatres, if they do get into debt, which they always do; those are the Théâtre Français and the Académie.

4096. Mr. Locke.] What is the object of the French Government in doing that?—To maintain the school. In the Théâtre Français they maintain a school for declamation in the French language; in the Académie it is for music, to which is attached the Conservatoire.

4097. The Odéon is a sort of second Théâtre Français?—The Odéon is a kind of second Théâtre Français.

4098. But it is in another part of the town, is it not?—Yes, it is on the other side of the water; it is like our Surrey Theatre.

4099. In the Quartier Latin?—Yes.

4100. Then there is the Lyrique?—The composers of France found that they had not a sufficient stage in the Opera Comique, and they petitioned the Government for another opera, and for a wider market, and then the privilege was granted to the Lyrique; they also asked for a similar subvention, and they obtained it.

4101. That is five theatres?—That is five theatres; two theatres for drama, and three for opera.

4102. Do you think that that answers?—It does not answer as a commercial speculation, but I think it does answer for the support of a certain kind of school.

4103. Take the Théâtre Français; do you think that in consequence of that subvention, French declamation is kept up at its proper standard?—I think it is kept up at the highest standard.

4104. Do you think that the performers at the Théâtre Français are superior to those at other theatres?—Yes, very much.

4105. Their style is better, and more chaste?—Yes; their style is better, more chaste, and purer.

4106. Do those performers begin at the Théâtre Français, or do they come to the Théâtre Français from other theatres?—The Théâtre Français has a right of claiming performers from those other theatres; a right to go to other theatres and claim an actor or actress, if he or she is willing to come; a claim on the part of the Théâtre Français immediately voids the engagement, if the performer is willing.

4107. What is the result with regard to salaries?—That is a matter of arrangement between the individuals themselves and the Théâtre Français.

4108. Suppose a person is receiving 20 l. a week at another theatre?—He is not obliged to come, but the others are forced to let him go.

4109. Then it rests with the actor?—Yes.

4110. And the Théâtre Français?—Yes.

4111. Do you know many instances where that has been done?—Yes, several performers have been taken from the Gymnase to the Théâtre Français in that manner; Bressent went six years ago to the Théâtre Français.

4112. The other theatres are quite aware of that regulation when they enter on an engagement?—Quite.

4113. Is there a similar rule with regard to the singers at the Académie?—I believe not.

4114. I believe the Académie educate their own singers?—Yes, they have got a school attached.

4115. Is M. Faure one?—I do not know.

4116. He is at the Académie, is he not?—Yes, but I do not know whether he is a pupil of the Académie.

4117. Do they have other singers at the Académie than those who are pupils?—Yes, they have them from anywhere.

4118. You say that this liberty of the theatres was established two years ago, but no alteration was made, I suppose, with regard to the Théâtre Français doing this?—There was no alteration with regard to that theatre. It was a general liberty to build theatres wherever they pleased.

4119. And to perform in them what they liked?—Yes.

4120. Any species of performance?—Yes.

4121. Molière, Racine, or Corneille?—Yes.

4122. And operas?—Yes, if they pleased.

4123. There was no restriction whatever, either with regard to tragedy, comedy, farce or opera?—Nothing.

4124. The time has not yet been long enough to make any great difference, I suppose?—None whatever. At the time that the liberty of the theatre was granted by the Emperor, there was a piece brought out at the Variétés, entitled La Liberté des Théâtres, for the purpose of showing what the results would be. One of the scenes was a music hall, with persons eating, drinking, and smoking in front, while the performance was going on; but although there is a great number of music halls in Paris, none of them have been able to avail themselves of the drama up to this moment.

4125. Are they restricted from doing so?—No, not at all.

4126. Mr. Webster distinctly said that no music hall in France could have any performance on the stage whatever, and that nobody could appear on the stage of a music hall in costume?—That is a mistake of Mr. Webster's; I believe that to be an error.

4127. Can you mention that café chantant, where La Theresa sings?—The Alcazar.

4128. That is on the Boulevards, is it not?—Yes; in the Boulevard Sebastopol.

4129. She never sings in costume, does she?—I have seen her once; she was not in costume.

4130. She sings at the Champs Elysées in the summer months, does she not?—Yes.

4131. She does not sing in costume, does she?—No.

4132. But have you seen other singers at the Alcaza in costume?—No; the Alcazar could not, by possibility, give theatrical performances; it is a mere platform, that comes out into the auditorium.

4133. Can you mention any of the cafés chantants where you have seen plays performed?—No.

4134. But you do know that there is no restriction?—I know it from the Society of Dramatic Authors in France, of which I am a member.

4135. Has that freedom existed since the liberty of the theatres was decreed?—It is the meaning of that liberty.

4136. Have they taken any advantage of it?—No; they have not altered their performances.

4137. Mr. O'Beirne.] Have you got a copy of that law?—It was not a law, it was an edict published in the "Moniteur."

4138. Mr. Locke.] Are there any other regulations of the theatres that you can speak of in France, France, as different from ours?—I do not think there is any other.

4139. There is a censorship there, is there not?—Yes, a very strict one.

4140. Now what is the course pursued in France?—The manuscript is sent in to the censor's office, to a separate office, there is a special officer for that; I think there are three persons employed as censors of the stage, and they can immediately cut from the piece anything that is objectionable, or forbid the piece altogether. I was told the other day they thought it very probable that the "Conseil de Guerre," the trial scene in "Arrah-na-Pogue," would be forbidden, as bringing military tribunals into ridicule.

4141. That would be considered objectionable on political grounds, I suppose?—Yes.

4142. They are very strict in France on political questions, are they not?—Very strict.

4143. You have said that in England the taste of the public would be a sufficient check with regard to morality, and no doubt it would; what do you think it would be with regard to politics; do you think if politics were introduced on to the stage that the audience, so far from objecting to it, would be delighted with it by way of change?—No; I have tried political allusions occasionally, and I have seen them tried, but they did not answer.

4144. But suppose you went a step further, and, as was suggested the other day, Mr. Buckstone was to act Lord Russell?—I think the public would stop it; I feel sure of that.

4145. You think there being two parties in the country the public would not allow it?—I think the public would form one party on that subject, and say that it was bad taste.

4146. They would not allow it?—They would not allow it.

4147. With regard to religion, do you think that the Lord Chamberlain has been any check with regard to introducing that on the stage?—No, I think he has acted rather capriciously; he has forbidden "Moses in Egypt," and he allowed a parable of Our Saviour to be put on the stage; "The parable of the Prodigal Son."

4148. With regard to the Lord Chamberlain licensing plays, is there any uniformity of action or any rule laid down, or does one Lord Chamberlain decide one way and another another?—Yes, just so; one Lord Chamberlain, I believe it was Lord Delawarre, stated that he thought there were theatres enough in London, and that he would refuse to license any more; the next Lord Chamberlain says there are not enough, and that he may license more if they are properly built.

4149. Is there any difficulty in obtaining a license now under Lord Sydney?—I am hardly aware of that; I have never gone so far as to apply for a license, but when I was about to apply for a license I was told that there would be a difficulty about it, and I thought it very unfair; I was told that the other managers would be called together in the West End, to say what reasons they could allege for my not having a license; I think it is unfair if a person wishes to go into an enterprise that those persons who are in competition with him in the same enterprise are to be brought together and to be asked if they object.

4150. If it was a fit building and properly conducted, you think that any man should be allowed to open a theatre just like a shop, or anything else?—Yes, certainly.

4151. Which "Moses in Egypt" are you speaking of, as that which was forbidden?—I think it was the piece at Drury Lane; the Mose in Egitto.

4152. Do you recollect the "Moses in Egypt," produced some years ago at Covent Garden with splendid scenery, where they introduced the Plagues of Egypt?—I do not recollect that, but there was such a thing.

4153. That piece was performed for sometime?—Yes.

4154. Has Rossini's opera ever been performed here?—That was forbidden, I believe, but it was performed in another form with another title.

4155. That opera was brought out in Paris two seasons ago?—Yes.

4156. Take "Ruy Blas" again?—That was forbidden about 20 years ago; the alleged reason then was that there was a queen in it. The queen was in love with Ruy Blas, but they changed the queen into a princess, and then they admitted it.

4157. Was it on the principle, Ne touchez pas à la Reine?—I suppose so.

4158. You say that any person, when a proper theatre is built, should have a license as a matter of course; would you have it carry the wine and spirit license, as the Lord Chamberlain's license does now?—Decidedly, I should not; it should be the drama pure and simple.

4159. Without any license for wine and spirits?—Just so.

4160. Then with regard to refreshments in theatres, how would you have that managed?—I would have the manager of the theatre, if he wished it, go to the licensing magistrates, just like a public-house keeper, or any one else, and get a license accordingly.

4161. Would you have any restriction with regard to the mode in which they sold their refreshments?—No, none whatever.

4162. Would you leave it to the manager to sell those things in the auditorium just as he pleased?—Yes, just as he pleased.

4164. Is there smoking, eating, and drinking, in all the theatres in America?—There may be, but there is not.

4165. How do you account for that?—The audience go to the theatre for a specific thing: for an intellectual not a sensual enjoyment; you cannot carry on the two together; you might reduce the intellectual enjoyment to a level which addresses itself to the eye or the ear, and that can be enjoyed at the same time as smoking, eating, and drinking; but if you attempt to enjoy a purely intellectual entertainment, such as the drama, the concentration of the mind required for it to be enjoyed thoroughly is such that it is impossible to combine the two together.

D. Boucicault, Esq.

4166. Do you suppose that all persons would feel that?—Yes, they do feel it throughout the United States. I have lived there for seven years. There are plenty of music halls, exactly on our own system, side by side with the theatres; and they might play the drama there, but they do not, because they cannot do it to the same perfection.

4167. But is there any restriction laid down in the theatres in the United States with regard to smoking?—None whatever. There was a theatre in New York where there was smoking, eating, and drinking, called Niblo's Gardens; a very large handsome theatre. By degrees they imported the drama; the drama abolished smoking, eating, and drinking; it was decreased, and gradually discontinued altogether.

4168. They may have their refreshments in any way they please; but there is the same distinction there between the theatres and music halls as there is in this country, is there not?—Yes, precisely.

4169. In the one they never have refreshments in the auditorium, and in the other they do?—Just so.

4170. People take their choice where they will go to, and without any law whatever that distinction is kept up?—That is practically the result.

4171. You have a very large pecuniary interest in the drama, have you not?—Yes, I think I have the largest.

4172. Will you explain in what way that arises?—I produce certain works in London at one or more of the theatres, on which I share the profits of the theatre while the work is being played. I can send a piece into the country sometimes, with one or two actors employed for the purpose of the principal parts; and then that drama going round the country acts as a star; and I receive a clear half of the net profits in all those theatres, by which means it sometimes appears in five or six theatres at the same moment.

4173. On the very same night?—Yes.

4174. Now, how many theatres are there in London in which you have an interest in the performance now going on?—Only one now; there were two.

4175. Which is that?—The Princess's Theatre.

4176. What piece is being played there?—"The Streets of London."

4177. Are you the author of it?—I am the author.

4178. There is no other piece now of your's going on in London besides that?—No. I am the author of "Rip Van Winkle," and I received a share of the profits on that piece also.

4179. Now, do you think that the present system of restriction is detrimental to your interest and the interests of other dramatic authors?—The restriction of the number of theatres? Yes, decidedly; I am suffering under that now.

4180. Will you explain to the Committee in what way you are suffering now?—Last year for 14 months I monopolised two of the theatres, with two pieces, "Arrah-na-Pogue" and "The Streets of London," which ran for 14 months at the Princess's, and I monopolised to a great extent the Adelphi. It is very disagreeable for an author who has any kind feeling for his fellow authors, to be occupying a very large portion of the market in that way; the consequence was that, although I could go on, and was pressed to do so, I retired about seven months ago for the purpose of leaving the space free for a year; therefore I am deprived of the market that I am entitled to, and would have, if there were more theatres in London, and if there were plenty of room for all.

4181. If there were more theatres in London you could bring out more pieces?—Yes, indeed I could.

4182. Are all the theatres full; have they each a piece that is running?—Yes.

4183. Each of them?—Yes.

4184. There is no room for anybody else?—No; a great many deserving authors are kept out entirely because there is no room for them.

4185. Do you know of anybody who is anxious to build a theatre?—Yes, I know of two or three.

4186. Are they prevented from doing so?—Only in this way; the impression abroad is that there is a difficulty in getting a license; capitalists will not go into a thing when they fear that at the last moment they may be arbitrarily deprived of the chance of going on.

4187. But suppose a company or a capitalist is desirous of building a theatre, and plans are submitted to the Lord Chamberlain, would he refuse the license?—We do not know whether he would or not; he retains the privilege to the last.

4188. Does he retain that privilege when the theatre is built?—He can do so.

4189. Of course, nobody would choose to build a theatre on the mere speculation of its being possibly licensed and possibly not?—Just so.

4190. But is it not possible to obtain a license from the Lord Chamberlain for a theatre if he approves of the plans sent in to him, and security is given that the theatre shall be finished and built in a particular way?—No; the present Lord Chamberlain may, for instance, say to the party who is now building the theatre in Holborn, which will be ready in two months, "I approve of the plans as far as they go;" the person builds the theatre, but in two months' time another Ministry may be in, and another Lord Chamberlain may take another view; he may take Lord Delawarre's view, and say that he is not bound by the acts of his predecessor.

4191. Can you give any instances where the Lord Chamberlain has not confirmed the acts of his predecessor?—That has been frequently the case with regard to plays, but he has not had an opportunity very well with regard to theatres, because no new theatre has been built in the West End for 25 years.

4192. Among the other dramatic authors, you signed that petition to the House?—I did.

4193. I believe that that petition states the views of dramatic authors on the subject?—Yes.

4194. Will you be kind enough to explain to the Committee what the objection on the part of dramatic authors is with regard to the present system?—Their objection is to the monopoly that is enjoyed by a few of the West End theatres; they practically enjoy a monopoly; they wish every encouragement to be given by the withdrawal of restrictions of every kind to the employment of capital in building more theatres and theatres of a better description.

4195. Now, do you think that you could supply all the present theatres at the west end of London with pieces to perform there yourself?—Yes, easily.

4196. The whole of them?—Yes.

4197. You

4197. You say that you have desisted for a year from writing pieces?—From producing them.

4198. Do you think that more theatres would be built if the law was altered and it was left to anyone to open a theatre if he pleased, provided it was properly built and afforded proper accommodation?—Yes, undoubtedly.

4199. The Committee have had some question raised to-day with regard to the rents of theatres; have those rents increased or diminished lately?—They have increased beyond measure within the last 10 years.

4200. But the rents of Drury Lane and Covent Garden had diminished very much previously to the last 10 years, had they not?—Yes.

4201. Can you speak as to what the rents are now?—Yes.

4202. Take Drury Lane?—The rent of Drury Lane I cannot speak of, for the present lessee has gone out, and his lease has lapsed into the hands of the committee. They are now calling for tenders, and I have no doubt that they will get 7,000 l. for it.

4203. What was Drury Lane let at before?—4,500 l.

4204. With regard to Covent Garden, what can you say?—That is an Italian Opera house.

4205. A new theatre, and this is the first time it has been let?—Yes.

4206. Now with regard to Mr. Fechter's theatre, the Lyceum, what is the rent of that?—The rent of the Lyceum theatre has increased about 60 per cent. within the last 10 years

4207. What is the rent of the Haymarket?—I do not know. I know what the rent was, but I do not know what the rate of increase is.

4208. Chairman.] You had Drury Lane, had you not?—I had it in 1862, and I paid 7,800 l. a-year for it.

4209. Mr. Walpole.] Do you know what the rent of Drury-lane theatre was 10 years ago?—It was very low to Mr. Smith. I think it was about 4,000 l.

4210. Mr. Locke.] Has it ever been as high as 14,000 l.?—Not during the last 30 years.

4211. Mr. Walpole.] When Mr. Edmund Kean acted there, do you know what Drury Lane was let for?—£. 14,000 or 15,000 l. a-year.

4212. Mr. Locke.] The prices of admission were higher then than they are now?—They were double what they are now.

4213. You say that your opinion is, that it should be left entirely free with regard to the description of performance that theatres or music halls, or any other place, choose to give?—Yes.

4214. And you know from your experience in America that the taste of the public is sufficient to regulate the matter entirely?—Yes.

4215. And no inconvenience has resulted from it?—None whatever.

4216. The same thing has occurred in France?—Yes, and Germany and Belgium.

4218. What is the exact definition of a vaudeville?—A vaudeville is a small comedy in which a portion of the dialogue is sung; the song must not be introduced as an impertinence to the piece, but a portion of the dialogue itself is turned into a song; that constitutes a vaudeville.

4219. That would likewise be the case with an opera, would it not?—No, an opera is a work in which the music is the thing, and the drama is subordinate to that.

4220. Mr. Du Cane.] Do you call the "Loan of a Lover" a vaudeville?—Yes.

4221. And the "Sentinel"?—Yes.

4222. Mr. Locke.] But in this country, some few years ago, Mr. Braham introduced "Scots wha hae wi' Wallace Bled" into any operas he liked?—That is an impertinence.

4223. Is not it a rule with operas that the songs that are introduced ought to tell part of the story?—They ought to tell part of the story, but they may not do so. Generally speaking, the songs in operas, and particularly in comic operas, are abstractions from the story; it must be a small comedy, and a portion of the dialogue turned into a song to make a vaudeville.

4224. Mr. Du Cane.] The song must continue the action of the play?—Yes.

4225. Mr. Locke.] But should not every song in an opera do the same?—No, it may be mere reflection or soliloquy.

4226. Take "Love in a Village," how is it there?—That is what we call here a comic opera, which is very different from a comic opera in France; ours is simply comedy with songs introduced, but that is not the case in France.

4227. Your description of a vaudeville is contra-distinguished from the French comic opera?—Entirely.

4228. But not contra-distinguished from the English comic opera, because you have speaking and singing in both?—In nearly all French comic operas in France the dialogue and music belong to each other, they belong to the piece, but in England they need not; you might cut out every song of "Love in a Village," and play it as a comedy, and never miss them.

4229. Would not that be the case in a vaudeville too?—No, there you would be cutting out a piece of the action.

4230. The singing would be part of the dialogue which carried on the story?—The singing would be part of the dialogue which carried on the story.

4231. That is the distinction, is it, which makes a vaudeville?—That is the distinction.

4232. Now, what is the distinction between ballet and pantomime; it would be difficult to define it, would it not?—No, because they are kinds of the drama, and when once you define the drama itself, you can define the different kinds of drama, of course.

4233. But it would be impossible to lay down any specific rule, unless you defined the particular thing itself, would it not?—If you lay down any specific rule, who is to determine whether the piece in question is of that kind or not?

4234. You might say that Shakespeare or Sheridan Knowles's plays should not be acted, or you might select the whole of the classical and legitimate dramas and say that those pieces should not be acted, naming them?—If you defined them by name, of course you could do it.

4235. But if you merely depended on the description of the piece, of course it could not be done?—Certainly not.

D. Boucicault, Esq.

30 April 1866.

4236. The description would be interminable?—Yes.

4237. Do you think that the performances at music halls have, upon the whole, been beneficial or not?—Greatly beneficial to the theatres.

4238. Will you be kind enough to explain how that is?—Twenty-five years ago the amusement-seeking public, so to speak, were divided into two classes; the upper classes which went to theatres exclusively, and the lower classes which attended public houses and tea gardens and things of that kind; the music hall was the stepping stone between the two things. The artisan who used to go alone to the public house was induced by his wife, I presume, to go rather to the music hall, where he has something of the public house mixed with a little intellectual entertainment; I know that for a fact, for I have studied the question pretty closely, and that the large sums of money which have been made by managers in pits and galleries of theatres lately, has been principally due to the pits and galleries of the theatres being recruited from the music halls.

4239. Do you recollect Mr. Robson coming out at the "Grecian"?—Yes.

4240. Did he come out there originally?—Yes; he was a waiter there.

4241. He performed there, did he not?—He learnt his art there.

4242. It is not correct to say he learnt his art in Dublin, is it?—He did not; he was a great actor before he went there; I recommended Mr. Charles Kean to take him before he went there, or certainly during his first season.

4243. Can you mention the name of any other actor who commenced his career in the "Grecian" or a similar place?—No, I cannot; with regard to the music halls, I may state that the performers get such very large salaries, and so much more than the theatres will pay them, that they do not feel inclined to leave the music halls for the theatres.

4244. Do you think that the objections which the theatres make to music halls being established are well founded?—No, I think it a mistake; I think the more the music halls are encouraged the better the theatres will succeed.

4245. What is your reason for saying so?—Because I believe it is necessary to have a stepping stone from the sensual enjoyments of the people to the intellectual enjoyments of the people; they will not go straight from one to the other.

4246. You have been to the Alhambra Music Hall, and different places of the kind, I suppose?—Yes.

4247. Have you discovered any impropriety there of any sort?—No, I never saw any more impropriety there than you may see in any very large assemblage of that description.

4248. If properly regulated, do you think that music halls are an advantage rather than otherwise?—Yes, I do; I think they are a very great advantage.

The RIGHT HONOURABLE GEORGE JOACHIM GOSCHEN, IN THE CHAIR.

DION BOUCICAULT, Esq., called in; and further Examined.

D. Boucicault, Esq. 4 May 1866.

4249. Mr. Locke.] YOU are desirous of making some correction in your evidence, I believe?—Yes. Since my examination, on Monday, I sent to Paris, and obtained a copy of the edict of the Emperor, to which I referred, of the date of the 7th of January 1864, taken from the "Moniteur Universel" ("the Decree," I see it is called), concerning the liberty of the theatres; and I wish to make some remarks with regard to that.

4250. Will you kindly put that document in?—Yes. (Vide Appendix.) It begins by abolishing all preceding laws with regard to theatres and places of entertainment. Article 1 gives a right to any individual to build a theatre where he pleases, without a license; but he must give notice to the Minister of the Imperial Household and to the Prefect of Police, both at Paris and in the departments, the Minister of the Imperial Household being also the Minister for Fine Arts. Article 2 is to the effect that builders of theatres must conform to the decrees and regulations made from time to time for their security, and for the health of the public. Article 4 abolishes all monopoly on the part of the legitimate theatres, all privileges, in fact; it is virtually the same as the Act called by us theatrical people, Bulwer's and Talfourd's Act, which abolished patent rights in England. Article 6 (to which I wish particularly to call attention, as it relates to the point on which I was in error) leaves such public entertainments as are not theatres, properly so called, to the regulations of the police authorities of the district where the theatres may be. The legal effect of this is to vest in each prefecture a separate jurisdiction, to be exercised at its own discretion, leaving the nature of the buildings to be determined in each prefecture. I have been given to understand (but that is mere hearsay) that, under this clause, theatrical representations have been permitted by the police in certain places.

4251. Chairman.] I see in the "Moniteur" it says that the cafés chantants, and so on, remain subject to the same regulations as existed before; that is in Article 6?—I read the word règlements as meaning police regulations.

4252. That is your interpretation of it?—No; I am aware of the fact; that is the intrepretation I get from there.

4253. Mr. Locke.] Are you aware of any cafés chantants giving performances of the stage?—I could only be aware by having seen them; I have never seen any performance of the stage at a café chantant; I very rarely go to the cafés chantants.

4254. You have not been there since that decree?—I have been there once since it was passed; but I do not suppose that I have been to more than two of those cafés chantants in my life.

4255. But you are told, in fact, that an alteration has taken place, and that performances of the stage are now permitted at cafés chantants?—Yes, at cafés chantants.

4256. Chairman.] Have you obtained it from authority that performances of the stage are permitted at cafés chantants; it is contrary to other evidence that we have had before us, I think?—I can only speak from what I hear from my agents in Paris, who are persons connected with theatres. I put in also Extrait de l'Ordonnance of July 1864, concerning theatres; this was issued by the prefect of police.

4257. Mr. Powell.] Was that published in the "Moniteur"?—I presume it was; it is signed "Boittelle," prefect of police, and the secretary general, "G. Jarry:" it is a Government document, and not a copy.

4258. Mr. Locke.] What does it contain?—It contains all the rules and regulations with regard to the theatres.

4259. Have you anything further to add?—No, nothing.

4260. Mr. Du Cane.] I think you stated, in your evidence on a former occasion, that there is no licensing system or supervision of theatres in America?—None.

4261. Are there many American dramatic authors?—No, very few.

4262. I mean, of course, Americans bred and born?—No; there are very few persons living in America who write plays; they take them from our stage, where they get them for nothing.

4263. Are there many good actors who are Americans?—Very good; those actors who have made any great hit here during the last five years have all come from America, Mr. Sothern, Mr. Jefferson, and Miss Bateman.

4264. Mr. Sothern is an Englishman, is he not?—Yes, he is an Englishman, but he left this country 12 or 14 years ago; then he occupied a very subordinate position in a country theatre here; he created himself on the American stage.

4265. Is Mr. Jefferson an American?—Mr. Jefferson is an American born.

4266. Is there any law of copyright in America?—Yes, a law of copyright whereby the printed book and the play are preserved to the author. There is also a law that I was instrumental in passing through Congress in 1856, which gave dramatic authors a right in the representation of their pieces, which is a much more stringent law than exists here.

4267. But the great bulk of plays performed in America are English plays, which have undergone the censorship in England?—Yes, certainly.

4268. Have you ever seen a piece performed in the United States which would be rejected in England on the score of immorality or any objection that might be taken to the piece by our Lord Chamberlain?—Never on the score of immorality; I cannot tell what objections there might be taken politically.

4269. Have you ever seen a piece with any strong political allusions in it?—Yes, a play called "Jack Cade," that might have been objected to in England on the score of political allusions, though they were not so strong as those in "Arrah-na-Pogue," I think.

4270. Did not the "Octoroon" excite some feeling?—Not on the part of the audience; but there were outsiders and a certain portion of the press that made remarks with regard to it.

4271. With regard to the number of theatres in America under the American system, do you think there are a greater number of theatres in New York and other large towns in proportion to the population, than there are in London?—I never made a calculation, but it seems to me that the number of theatres in the West-end of London is small, in comparison to the number of persons who come to the centre of amusement in London, which is generally the West-end.

4272. Are the American theatres generally larger and more comfortable than the English theatres?—Yes, very much more comfortable and larger, and better ventilated; they are better in every respect; they have wider entrances, and so on.

4273. Do you attribute that to there being free trade in theatres?—I should hardly attribute it to that exactly; the American theatre altogether is more airy. I suppose they began with a better model.

4274. Do you agree with what has been said by other theatrical managers about the dearth of young and rising actors on the English stage?—There is a dearth of young and rising actors, but I do not attribute it to the same cause as those other managers appear to do.

4275. But you admit that there is a dearth?—Yes.

4276. To what cause do you attribute that dearth?—I attribute it to the same cause as the decline of the drama, and the decline of the fine arts generally, and literature itself, both in France, England, and America; that is to say, the lower classes during the last 30 years have received great intellectual development, and the consequence has been, that they are greater consumers of thought, and thinkers have condescended to supply the market; so that in that way literature has descended, and the theatres have reduced their prices to meet the demand. All kind of literature has reduced its price, even standard literature has been issued in penny editions; every possible means has been resorted to for the purpose of supplying this enormous demand, from the rising of the lower classes of people into a better intellectual condition, and the result is, that the drama itself, in all its forms, has equally gone down.

4277. You say that the drama, dramatic authors, and actors generally, have stooped to the lower classes, rather than that the lower classes have risen?—The lower classes cannot rise, but we can stoop; that is, the lower classes cannot at once rise to a high standard of the drama, but we can stoop and raise them gradually.

4278. But if the music halls were allowed to give dramatic representations (pursuing the same argument), would not a further degradation of public taste take place?—I am rather inclined to think that if the music halls were allowed to give (and already all their entertainments are illegal every night) a better class of performance, it would raise the taste of those persons, as it has already done, to a certain extent, and the theatres themselves would be benefitted by it. All the large fortunes that have been made by theatrical managers during the last ten years in London and the principal provincial towns, have been mainly owing to the music halls that have catered for them.

4279. Mr. Clive.] They have fed them?—Yes, they have fed them; they have caused a want on the part of the lower classes for a certain amount of intellectual entertainment.

4281. You cannot say that you think the public taste would rise so far that the proprietors of music halls would be likely to ask for that class of play that you would take pleasure in writing?—They could not play it; it is physically impossible; they could do burlesques, ballets, and things of that character, where the eye is more addressed than the ear, but if the entertainment was of such intellectual order that the mind of the audience must be concentrated on it to enjoy it, it could not take place in a music hall, where there is constant movement among the people.

4282. I need hardly ask you whether, supposing they could not profitably perform such pieces, it would pay them to engage such actors as yourself?—No, they could not afford it.

4283. Colonel Sturt.] I think you have said that you are not aware of any piece being played in America that had been refused by the Lord Chamberlain in this country?—I do not, of course, know what has been refused.

4284. But I mean a piece that would be likely to be refused on the ground of immorality?—I do not go fully to that extent, but I say that I have seen no piece performed in America that the Lord Chamberlain would be justified, on the ground of immorality, in refusing.

4285. I have been assured that the same version of the "Dame aux Camelias," which the Lord

Lord Chamberlain refused to license for Mr. E. T. Smith, was given for a long time in America?—And the same version was given here.

4286. It was refused a license, was it not?—But it was given here at the Lyceum Theatre; they changed the title of the piece, but I understand it was the same piece that was played in America, and was played here by the lady who made so great a sensation in America in the part.

4287. Do you know the difference between the piece that was sanctioned by the Lord Chamberlain and the piece that was refused?—No, I am not aware. As it was given in America, there was nothing in the piece that might not have been very fairly licensed here.

4288. Mr. Miller.] I believe that the Americans have neither licenses nor supervision: supposing that a play was performed in a theatre of a very flagitious character, how would it be stopped, or would it be stopped at all?—It could be stopped in two ways: in the first place, it would be stopped by the audience if they chose to exercise their right, which they generally do, under those circumstances; and it would be stopped at common law, in the same way that you can stop the publication and sale of any immoral book.

4289. Whose duty would it be to originate proceedings at common law?—I believe they call him the State officer; the Attorney General.

4290. To that extent there is supervision over plays?—Only to the same extent that there is with regard to all evil actions here. I believe that if anything indecent were to be done on the stage, either by gesture or otherwise, it could be stopped by common law, as contra bonos mores in this country.

4291. Mr. Selwin.] You said just now that you thought the music halls would not be able to perform any dramatic pieces; that they could not perform them in their houses, and that it would not answer their purpose to do so?—Not dramatic pieces of a certain class; they could do ballets and burlesques, and pieces that address themselves more to the eye than the ear.

4292. Then how do you account for the great desire of the music halls to do away with the present restrictions?—The music hall proprietors only want to perform those very small pieces; they wish to draw a line which I think is impracticable.

4293. According to those ideas which were submitted to us with regard to the framing of a Bill for them, they wanted permission to act pieces with only five or six characters in costume; that would be a dramatic performance, would it not?—Undoubtedly a burlesque is a dramatic performance; small operas they might play very well.

4294. You think that they would not perform parts of plays on the stage?—I do not think that they would find it to their interest to do so.

4295. Mr. Powell.] With regard to the licensing by the Lord Chamberlain, do you see anything in the present constitution of the Lord Chamberlain's office which should make him free from the control of public opinion, which must, whatever be your officer, be the court of ultimate appeal?—I think (though I do not speak of the present Lord Chamberlaim, but of the office at large), that within my experience of the stage, which is about 25 years, the Lord Chamberlain has shown a certain amount of caprice and unsteadiness in the discharge of his office, and his deeds seldom reach public opinion.

4296. But why should the deeds of any other officer who might be substituted for him be more within the control of public opinion?—Because I would have an appeal from that person to the Home Secretary, because the Home Secretary is the head of the department in which such an officer must be. A special case, where there is a doubt, should be submitted to the Home Secretary, who is always amenable to the House of Commons.

4297. But is not this one of those points of a strictly executive character, involving a large amount of discretion, with which the Legislature has always been very slow to interfere?—Undoubtedly.

4298. Do you know how many plays Shakspeare wrote?—As well as I can recollect from 32 to 36.

4299. Do you think that the average of dramatic writers have the wonderful power which has enabled you already (though not passed the prime of life) to write 200 pieces, or do you think that the ordinary class of dramatic writers attain only to the power of producing 36 or 37 pieces like Shakspeare?—I think there are very few men who have adopted the course that I have done. I commenced as a dramatic author at 18, and I have never quitted it up to my present age, which is 43. I have never done or attempted anything else.

4300. You consider yours an exceptional case?—Yes, not a very exceptional case; there are persons who could do it; but I have got a certain facility.

4301. I presume that there have been cases where pieces of yours have not been produced owing to the failure of some negotiations between yourself and managers in London?—Rarely.

4302. But there have been such cases, I suppose?—One or two.

4303. Your pieces have been performed in America and Australia, and different parts of the world, have they not?—They have.

4304. In that edict from the "Moniteur," to which you have made a reference, is there anything abolishing the laws previously existing?—Yes.

4305. Will you point out the passage which does that?—There is one very important clause abolishing the theatres where children were the actors.

4306. Will you kindly read that article?—It is Article 5: "Les Théâtres d'acteurs enfants continuent d'être interdits." There was a theatre in the Passage Choiseul, in which children were taught to be actors. Pieces were expressly written for children, and it appears that those theatres are now entirely suppressed.

4307. Does that passage prove that all previous laws relating to theatres are abolished?—The articles of this decree are preceded by the recital of several previous decrees and ordinances:—Vu les décrets du 8 Juin 1806 et 29 Juillet 1807. Vu l'ordonnance du 8 Décembre 1824. Vu l'article 3, titre XI. de la loi des 16 et 24 Août 1790. Vu les arrêtés du Gouvernement des 25 Pluviose, et 11 Germinal an 4, 1^er^ Germinal an 7, et 12 Messidor an 8. Vu les ordonnances de police des 12 Fevrier 1828 et 9 Juin 1829. Vu la loi du 7 Frimaire, an 5 et le décret du 9 Décembre 1809, sur la redevance établie au profit profit des pauvres ou des hospices. Vu le décret du 30 Décembre 1852; and then follow the articles of the present decree.

D. Boucicault, Esq.

4308. But which is the passage which abolishes those previous laws; will you kindly point out that abolishing clause?—One of the abolishing clauses is the remainder of Article 6, the first abolishing clause; the decree first recites previous decrees, and then they are abolished in detail by the articles. Article 1 abolishes one of them, with a saving clause at the end for the subvention theatres.

4309. You have stated, in answer to a previous question, that the previous laws were abolished?—Yes, those articles in detail abolish those laws that are recalled here at the commencement of the decree.

4310. Certain articles abolish certain laws?—Yes, those are recalled here for the purpose of being abolished in the articles that follow, as I understand it. Of course I have not got those laws; I merely refer to them as I am instructed.

4311. As you are instructed by whom?—As I am instructed by my agents in Paris, from whom I have just received this document.

4312. You do adhere to the previous answer, that all the previous laws were abolished by this edict?—The laws recited here are abolished by this edict.

4313. They are abolished, so far as appears by the statute itself?—So far as appears by the statute itself.

4314. But there are not necessarily any further laws entirely abolished than appears in the edict?—The decrees that are abolished are cited for that purpose.

4315. That is so, in your judgment, according to the instructions you have received?—Yes, according to the instructions which I have received.

4316. Will you read the 8th Article?—That abrogates all dispositions, decrees, ordinances and rules of whatever kind that are contrary to the present decree.

4317. You were asked, at Question 4138, "Are there any other regulations of the theatre that you can speak of in France as different from ours?—I do not think there is any other." Do you mean that all laws affecting the French theatres are the same as our own?—Yes, I adhere to that. I do not think that there is any other; but that is the result of a number of questions which I had been previously asked, I believe.

4318. Do you adhere to that, then, in the full sense?—I do not think that there is any other sense.

4319. Then I call your attention to the 6th Article of this edict of the 7th of January. Will you kindly read that, beginning at the 2d paragraph?—"Always these different establishments (meaning spectacles de curiosité, de marionettes, cafés chantants, and others of the same kind), shall henceforth be freed from the redevance or tax established by Article 11 of the Ordonnance of 8th December 1824, in favour of the Directors of departments, and they shall not be liable to furnish any contribution except the tax for the benefit of the poor and the hospitals."

4320. Now here is the Ordonnance of the 8th of December 1824, which is evidently kept alive. Will you kindly look at that (handing a book to the Witness), and read the heads of the 2d and 4th titles?—"Troupes sédentaires," and "troupes ambulantes."

4321. Now is there anything at all analogous in the English law to the troupes described in those words or to the provisions with regard to the troupes which follow the headings?—No, there are no laws in England whatever that affect them.

4322. Then so far as that ordonnance goes, there is a difference between the English law and the French law?—Yes, certainly there is a difference.

4323. And probably, if other French laws were produced to you, you would say that corresponding or equivalent laws did not exist in England?—Certainly; my view related more to what difficulties were thrown in the way of the English managers and the French managers.

4324. Do you consider that the French managers under such an ordonnance as that, and the other ordonnance is a freer man than the English manager?—I believe that this ordonnance has been done away with; I am speaking of the condition of the law as it is, since January 1864.

4325. On what reason do you found your statement that that law is abolished?—I have been given to understand so, particularly since the liberty of the theatres.

4326. But you have done us the favour of laying before us the edict establishing the liberty of the theatres, and there is nothing in that edict abolishing the law of 1824, is there?—You must understand that I only obtained those edicts since I gave my evidence on the last occasion, and consequently I was not so familiar with it as I am at present, but I was under the impression which I conveyed to the Committee that the effect of this edict was that that ordonnance, so far as related to spectacles de curiosité, marionettes, cafés chantants, and every place except theatres, was abolished, so far as the most important portion of it goes, namely, the taxes.

4327. Before the passing of the law for the liberty of the theatres, might the cafés chantants, and the rest of those places, give a dramatic performance, if they chose?—I believe not; but on that subject I am not sufficiently aware of the facts to give a precise answer.

4328. You think it was not allowed?—I believe not.

4329. Seeing that that edict in the 6th Article expressly maintains the old law with regard to those establishments, how comes it that they are freer now than they were before?—Pardon me, it does not sustain the old law; there was a positive law before, I believe, which prohibited them.

4330. But the edict distinctly maintains the existing law?—Pardon me, it maintains the regulations, but not the law; it is a question of police regulation.

4331. You adhere to the statement that this law, establishing the liberty of the theatres, made a tabula rasa of the previous laws with regard to theatres?—Yes.

4332. Do you wish for any copyright in favour of dramatic authors in England different from that which exists now?—None whatever.

4333. Would you like to abolish that which does exist, and make it all free?—No, I would not abolish the law protecting dramatic property.

4334. Do you wish to maintain, or to extend, or to narrow that law?—To maintain it as it is; but I should desire to have a more ready method of obtaining one's rights under it; we have now to go to chancery for that purpose.

4335. Do

4335. Do you know the state of things (whether by what you describe as police regulations or by law) with regard to smoking in theatres in Paris?—The police regulations in Paris, as I have been instructed since last Monday, do not prevent any of those things in Paris; drink may be supplied to the audience in all parts of the theatre, there is nothing whatever to restrain it; I have that from the manager of a principal theatre.

4336. In what sense supplied?—In every sense, they may consume it wherever they please.

4337. It would be competent in the pit, stalls, or gallery, for three or four men to club together and take a chop, and smoke, and have their claret; is that what you mean to say?—I believe there is no regulation to the contrary. The only regulation in the theatres generally with regard to the stalls is an arrangement between the manager and the person called the limonadier.

4338. Mr. Selwin.] But smoking does not take place, does it?—I never saw it; I believe it would be stopped.

4339. Would it be stopped by the police?—Yes; they would immediately make a regulation, which they are competent to do; those are the regulations to which I refer.

4340. Mr. Powell.] You are aware that the 54th section of the Ordonnance of the 1st of July 1854, expressly forbids smoking "dans les salles de spectacle et sur la scene," I suppose?—I am not aware of that; but that is a police regulation; it is not a law.

4341. I do not ask you the question with regard to police regulations alone, but I ask you with regard to law in the widest and fullest sense; whether by edict or otherwise, which compels obedience? — I was not aware that such an Ordonnance existed.

4342. Mr. Clive.] You seem to me to have given two answers which are rather inconsistent; you said that the lower classes cannot rise, but that you can descend?—Yes.

4343. Then again, you said that the music halls had fed the theatres?—Yes.

4344. I presume, then, you would qualify that answer about the lower classes not rising; they must have risen to some extent, or they could not have fed the theatres?—I mean this: that if you give an entertainment to the lower classes which is now considerably above their taste, they cannot immediately rise up to it and appreciate it; in the course of time, and by gradual means, they will get to that point, but it is only by gradually giving them something a little higher that you can bring them up to that level; but I know, from experience, that the pits and galleries of theatres have been fed very largely from music halls, during the last 10 years, and the fortunes made by the west-end theatres have been mainly attributable to that fact.

4345. Then as far as that goes the lower classes have risen in power of appreciation?—Distinctly.

4346. And they may rise more in proportion as the entertainments at the music halls, are improved, I suppose?—No doubt.

4347. Mr. Locke.] Upon that question with regard to what is a stage play, or not, has your attention been called to the decision in the case of Russell against Smith?—Yes.

4348. It was an action brought by Mr. Russell, the author of "The Ship on Fire," against Mr. E. T. Smith, for pirating his work?—Yes.

4349. For singing that song at Crosby Hall? Yes.

4350. Now, it was held that the singing of the song, called "The Ship on Fire,"; which was sung at Crosby Hall, an ordinary lecture hall in Bishopsgate-street by one man in simple evening dress, and who accompanied himself on the piano, was a representation of a dramatic piece?—Yes.

4351. Is it your opinion that this decision would render nearly every performance at concerts at music halls illegal?—Undoubtedly it was a representation of a dramatic piece within the definition of what the drama is.

4352. That was under the Dramatic Authors Act?—Yes; under the Dramatic Authors Act.

4353. Not under the 6th & 7th Victoria?—No, under the Dramatic Author's Act; I think the judge reserved the 6th & 7th Victoria; he gave no opinion.

4354. But the judge having that opinion, with regard to the singing of that song, and holding it to be a representation of a dramatic piece; are you of opinion that that would bring it within the meaning of the 6th & 7th Victoria? — Undoubtedly, because, in the early times of the drama there was only one actor. They were composed of one speaker alone, but that does not prevent one of the early tragedies of Eschylus being a dramatic piece.

4355. Then a fortiori taking a soliloquy out of Shakspeare's plays, and delivering it at a literary institution, would be an infringement of the 6th & 7th Victoria?—Undoubtedly. Anybody may read a play, even in costume, and read it with a scene behind him, with all the appliances of a theatre; but if, instead of reading the character, he gesticulates, and pretends to be the character, immediately he begins to act, and the drama is constituted.

4356. Therefore, the prohibition of the 6th & 7th Victoria extends to every place of that kind, whether there be a magistrate's license for spirits or not, provided money is taken at the door?—Yes, if there is an imitation of an action it constitutes the drama.

4357. Chairman.] You have spoken of the fortunes made by theatrical managers of the theatres at the west-end of London?—Yes.

4358. Have theatrical managers generally realised large fortunes?—Yes, they have realised very large fortunes within the last 10 or 12 years; the success has been so very great, that what they now consider a very indifferent house, they then considered a very large one; and the rents of many of the theatres, especially at the west-end, have increased beyond measure.

4359. Can you point to four or five theatrical managers who have retired with large fortunes?—I can point to several who have made their fortunes, and who might have retired if they had pleased.

4360. Have they done so?—They have not been wise enough to do it.

4361. Do you mean that they have lost those fortunes again?—Not always; I can point to several who still retain them.

4362. But you mean it would have been better if they had retired?—What I meant was this, that they may have speculated with their money, and some few of them have lost it.

4363. You mean that they have lost it in theatrical speculations?—In and out of theatrical speculations.

D. Boucicault Esq.

4 May 1866.

4364. But surely if you took a large number of managers, you would find as many unsuccessful ones as successful ones, would you not?—Not nearly so many. I could name, if you pleased, the managers throughout London and Great Britain who have made their fortunes during the last 15 years.

4365. Are you speaking of London or the provincial theatres?—I am speaking both of London and the provincial theatres. There are among the provincial theatres, I believe, during the last 10 or 12 years, managers who began with nothing, but who are now men of fortune; gentlemen holding the fee simple of their theatres.

4366. Then the drama, on the whole, has been flourishing in the provinces?—Very flourishing indeed in the principal large cities.

4367. There is no falling off in the prospects of the drama in provincial towns?—It is very evidently the other way in the large towns.

4368. Is the public taste increasing for theatrical performances, do you think?—Yes, very much, and new theatres have been built to supply it.

4369. What is the law with regard to those provincial theatres?—They come under the law of the 26th George the Second; the magistrates' licenses are granted to them, they being generally granted more freely than the Lord Chamberlain's license.

4370. Do the theatres in London fill very well now?—Very well.

4371. Do you think that there would be room for more theatres?—Yes, for double the number.

4372. And that they would be prosperous?—I think they would be prosperous, but I do not know that they would be so prosperous as the few that now exist.

4373. Would you be able to find actors for that number of theatres?—I believe that the question of demand would always rule the supply; the present supply not being sufficient, it is very likely that to give us good companies all round, good actors would demand better salaries; but that is what we are working for.

4374. How is it that there are not good actors now if the demand is so great?—There are a number of persons who should be on the stage who are now in the music halls, where they receive more money.

4375. But if the theatres are flourishing, and they have plenty of audiences, could they not afford to pay more to these actors?—They do pay very nearly double what they paid 15 years ago, but the music halls pay four or five times as much.

4376. But if you had double the number of theatres; why should that create a demand for good actors if the present increased attendance at the theatres does not do so?—I speak now particularly of the theatres at the west-end; not so much as to the theatres in the outskirts, which are looked upon almost as provincial theatres. There is a great desire on the part of actors to come to the west-end theatres, to be seen by a higher and better class of people; it is those theatres that particularly enjoy the monopoly of good acting; there is a great number of very good actors who have been drawn off to America; very large salaries are offered them to go out there, where they occupy a high position in their profession; they go there, and also to Australia.

4377. Still, notwithstanding the salaries that can be paid by the managers who make their fortunes, and notwithstanding their houses fill, there are not sufficient good actors to supply those theatres you say?—The fact is, that first-class actors now have descended as the drama has descended, and as other arts have also descended to the tastes of the lower and lower middle classes. But there are plenty of actors such as they are.

4378. Do you think, on the whole, that the acting is better in America than it is here?—I think it is.

4379. In America does the public taste differ much from the taste here?—I think it is purer; they have a great desire to see what is commonly called legitimate drama; it is more frequently played.

4380. In questions of stage morality, are they more or less particular than they are here?—I think they are about the same; in some cities they are more particular than they are here. I think they are more particular in Boston, and less particular in New York.

4381. But generally in the Northern States are they more particular than they are here?—No, I think they are about at a fair level with us.

4382. I suppose you are aware that the laws with regard to enforcing public morality (in such matters as bad publications) are much more stringent in America than they are here?—I hardly think so; there are not many of such bad publications there, I think.

4383. Do you think that performances there would be stopped by the police that would not be stopped here?—I think that the police would be inclined to interfere there more readily than here, because here they would imagine it was the Lord Chamberlain's business, and no business of theirs, but there was a case where the police did interfere in Liverpool, in a matter that was permitted by the Lord Chamberlain.

4384. You stated that they would be stopped at common law in the performances if there was anything indecent?—If any public indecency were to be permitted on the stage, such as the law could take hold of, the parties would be amenable to the law elsewhere, and I think it would be equally so on the stage.

4386. Is there one general law which regulates them?—No, in the United States each State has its own particular laws and its own legislature, which makes laws for itself; indeed, the legislature rarely interferes with theatres, but allows the City itself, that has almost a legislature of its own, to determine that question.

4387. So that, according to the particular taste and feeling in any given city, so will the regulations be with regard to theatres?—Yes, there was one State at one time that abolished theatres altogether; that was Connecticut.

4388. Is there any State in which there is any kind of censorship?—None.

4389. The censorship is practically exercised by the police?—I never heard of their interfering, but the public interfere themselves when anything is distasteful to them.

4390. Is that frequently the case?—It happens occasionally, not so much with regard to plays, as they come from this country, but with regard to the manner in which the actors fill their parts.

4391. In your answer to Question 4042 you say, "We have been greatly disturbed in consequence quence of the Lord Chamberlain having different opinions on the same subject, both with regard to plays and with regard to theatres. Some plays have been licensed and have been withdrawn after eight or ten years." Now, there was one play, "Jack Sheppard;" which you mentioned; could you name any other besides that one which had been withdrawn after eight or ten years?—There were others named by Mr. Ponsonby, I think; Mr. Ponsonby stating at the same time, that they were plays of a similar character.

4392. Do you know that of your own knowledge?—With the exception of that one play, I do not; I cannot remember at present that there were any more of that kind, but there are many that have been refused a license in the first instance that have been licensed afterwards, and it was to those particularly that I referred.

4393. You say that the drama is in a higher condition in America than it is here; do you mean the acting or the pieces performed?—I alluded there to the taste of the public, which encouraged a higher class of dramatic literature, but clearly their taste is higher for the legitimate drama.

4394. But still they are forced to fall back on the plays of this country?—They are forced to fall back on the plays of this country, but they exercise their taste in choosing the highest and best of them.

4395. But nearly all the plays performed in America have passed through the Lord Chamberlain's office here, have they not?—Very nearly all of them.

4396. In France there are five theatres which receive a subvention, are there not?—I believe so.

4397. Why did they receive that subvention, what is the policy of it?—The policy is that they support a school of either music or declamation.

4398. Does not that constitute a kind of protection against other theatres?—It did, but it does so no longer; they then had the monopoly of the legitimate drama, but since that edict was passed they do not possess that monoply.

4399. But can the other theatres that have no subvention compete with those theatres which have that subvention?—On the contrary the theatres that have no subvention make their fortunes, and the theatres that have the subvention soon lose them.

4400. How is that?—The theatres that have the subvention have it in consequence of playing a higher class of performance exclusively; that does not amuse a sufficient number of the people to make them come in paying numbers. The other theatres make more money by catering for the public than they would if they received the subvention.

4401. Though they try to nurse the drama there, they cannot get sufficient audiences to make it pay without State assistance?—They cannot do it.

4402. At Question 4149 you were asked, "Is there any difficulty in obtaining a license now under Lord Sydney"? you answered, "I am hardly aware of that; I have never gone so far as to apply for a license, but when I was about to apply for a license I was told that there would be a difficulty about it, and I thought it very unfair; I was told that the other managers would be called together in the west end, to say what reasons they could allege for my not having a license; I think it is unfair if a person wishes to go into an enterprise that those persons who are in competition with him in the same enterprise are to be brought together and to be asked if they object." Did you hear this?—So I heard.

4403. Who told you?—It was the general opinion that was established outside among theatrical people as to what would be the result. I believe I was told it by two managers.

4404. Because they told you you thought the Lord Chamberlain would do so?—I was told that that was the usual course.

4405. But you did not get that information at the Lord Chamberlain's office?—No; I asked for no information with regard to that.

4406. Did you think it sufficient to take hearsay evidence on that point when you were going into a business transaction?—No; that business transaction was defeated by another branch of the Government, not by the Lord Chamberlain.

4407. Which branch of the Government was that?—The Woods and Forests.

4408. What was the objection?—I had bought the lease of very large premises in the Haymarket, and two days after I bought this lease I received a letter from Mr. Gore, of the Woods and Forests Office, stating that he had heard I had made such a purchase with the intention of turning it into a theatre, and that he warned me that he would not allow a theatre to be built there. I said that the Government were ground landlords of two theatres in the same street, and that I was going to sweep away a number of objectionable tenants in the Haymarket, but Mr. Gore stated that he would prefer the property to be left in that condition, and that he would not grant any permission to have it altered for the purposes of a theatre.

4409. It is not through the Lord Chamberlain's office, or any member connected with that office, that you were prevented from building a theatre?—Certainly not.

4410. Now with regard to dramatic authorship, I understood you to say that you could supply the whole of the London theatres with pieces yourself?—The west-end theatres.

4411. And that it is rather hard on the other dramatic authors, their trade being limited by there being so few theatres?—Yes, it is very much limited.

4412. You have said that the number of theatres might be doubled, and that they would still fill?—Yes.

4413. Would you be able to supply pieces for twice the number of theatres yourself?—No.

4414. But if there was one other author who was as fertile as you, he would be able to supply all the rest of the theatres?—Yes.

4415. So that the whole result would be to give scope for one more dramatic author?—If he had the same facility in producing works that I have, certainly that would be the case.

4416. You stated at the last meeting of the Committee that "a great many deserving authors are kept out entirely because there is no room for them," but there would be really room for only one more dramatic author?—One dramatic author of that kind.

4417. Can you tell us anything about Germany?—Nothing whatever, except what one sees in travelling there. I know nothing about their laws, except that they have more liberty there than they have in France.

4418. Will you look at your answer to Question

D. Boucicault, Esq.

4 May 1866.

tion 4216. You were asked whether the same thing occurred in France with regard to the taste of the public, and you said "yes, and in Germany and Belgium?"—That means this; that in Germany and Belgium they play a certain kind of dramatic performance in the music halls. If you refer to Question 4213, you will see that that is the connection.

4419. I think that the upshot of those questions was that the taste of the public was sufficient in America to regulate the matter, and that inconvenience had not resulted from that either in France, Germany, or Belgium. You could not speak to Germany from your own knowledge?—Only that in Germany and Belgium they give dramatic performances in music-halls and "cafés chantants."

4420. Do you know whether those dramatic performances are licensed or not?—I do not.

4421. Mr. Du Cane.] Has any one of your plays been performed at more than one London theatre at one time?—The "Colleen Bawn" was played at two theatres at the same time.

4422. Suppose that a piece was very popular, and the number of theatres was increased, would there not just be more representations at the same time of the same piece?—It was played at the Britannia Saloon, in Hoxton; it was a matter of understanding between myself and Mr. Webster that that theatre was so far off that it would not interfere with the attraction of the piece at the Adelphi; but no author permits his pieces to be played simultaneously within a certain radius of a theatre where it is first produced.

4423. Mr. Locke.] How can he prevent that?—He has the power in his own hands; he can stop it by an injunction.

4424. When you brought out the "Colleen Bawn" it was brought out at the Adelphi, was it not?—Yes.

4425. You entered into an arrangement with Mr. Webster, did you not?—Yes.

4426. Mr. Webster was to have the performance of that play at the Adelphi?—The arrangement was one which was generally understood rather than a distinct arrangement between the manager and the author; it is generally understood that the theatre at which a play is brought out at the West-end shall have the exclusive privilege of performing that piece either for a long or a short time.

4427. Who regulates that?—The author.

4428. How many years have you in that piece?—We generally sell to the manager a piece for one year or three years.

4429. But is the author's copyright limited?—No, it is the whole length of his lifetime, and 30 or 40 years afterwards.

4430. When they perform one of your pieces in the country, is it necessary to ask your permission?—Yes.

4431. Any piece that you bring out is your own property?—Yes.

4432. And it is with your sanction only that it can be performed anywhere?—Yes.

4433. Mr. Clay.] You are in favour of unrestricted competition?—Yes.

4434. You believe it to be quite impossible to draw any line between legitimate theatres and music halls, which would not lead to constant disputes and litigation?—Yes, quite.

4435. You ask for nothing but police regulations which will secure safety in theatres, and decency in the performance and the audiences?—Yes. I should desire that any theatre that is properly built, and certified to be fit to receive the public with safety, should receive a license, as a matter of course.

4436. And you ask for nothing but police regulations, to secure decency?—That is all; only I think that the license should not carry a wine and spirit license, as it does now under the Lord Chamberlain's Act.

4437. You would have no prohibition of smoking, would you?—That is a matter which a manager can dictate himself, and does dictate; there is no prohibition now.

4438. You consider it would be quite sufficient for any manager of a theatre to write up, "No smoking allowed"?—Yes, as he does now.

4439. But I understood you to say that even that was not necessary, because people would never smoke where there was an intellectual performance going on?—When a theatre is very full, and there is in the gallery a very large block of people all together, and it is impossible for the police to get in among them; and therefore there have been cases where a large placard has been put up in the gallery, to say, "No smoking allowed," because certain persons would light their pipes or cigars there.

4440. Would you, as manager of a theatre, prohibit smoking?—Yes, I certainly would prohibit it.

4441. Lord Ernest Bruce.] You said that one reason why the Lord Chamberlain's jurisdiction is not agreeable, is that he is an officer who changes with the Ministry?—Yes.

4442. And that, therefore, if there is a Lord Chamberlain who has approved of the building of a theatre before it is opened, there may be a change of ministry, and the next Lord Chamberlain might disapprove of it?—Yes.

4443. But have you known that to occur?—No; there has been no new theatre built in the west-end for the last 25 years.

4444. But you are aware that one high officer in the Lord Chamberlain's office always remains, that is to say the Controller?—Yes.

4445. Do you not think that the Lord Chamberlain is very much influenced by his opinion?—I should say so; I am speaking of what he could do within the limit of his power; I think the office in minor matters has shown caprice, and it is entitled also to do so in all matters. The Lord Chamberlain, I think, has lately overridden an Act of Parliament.

4446. But you have never known that in any very important matter?—No, if that be not an important matter.

4447. The present Lord Chamberlain has allowed the theatres to be open every night in the year, except Ash Wednesday, Good Friday, and Christmas Day, has he not?—Yes.

4448. That was thought by a very strong party in the country to be a very great innovation?—Yes.

4449. It is not likely that any future Lord Chamberlain will alter that, is it?—I am not sure of that; Lord Sydney is a very liberal Lord Chamberlain, and Mr. Donne is one of the most liberal censors that we have ever known; really his power is more like the presence of a lady at a dinner table of gentlemen to control in a delicate way the subjects spoken of; but he very rarely interferes, and then he does so in a very gentle manner.

4450. But you admit that you have no reason to complain of the way in which those duties are performed?—Not at present.

4451. You think that it is very liberally done?—The present Lord Chamberlain is liberal and the present censor is very liberal indeed.

4452. Are you aware that the opinion of the Controller very much influences the Lord Chamberlain, whoever he may be?—True; but there was a Lord Chamberlain a short time ago who held that there were enough theatres in London, and who had an objection to any more theatres being built; we have now a Lord Chamberlain who does not think so, and who does grant fresh licenses, which shows that there is a difference of opinion in the office. It becomes extremely difficult to obtain new capital to go into such enterprises, when things are so uncertain.

4453. Then, if the jurisdiction is maintained, you would wish it to be a permanent officer?—Yes.

4454. That is to say, irrespective of any change of Government?—Yes.

4455. Now you have mentioned, with regard to the number of houses, that you would like to see, as many theatres as anybody would like to build?—Yes.

4456. But surely there are quite enough theatres, are there not?—No, I do not think so.

4457. Then, how do you account for the fact that the English Opera was closed the other day?—That was opera.

4458. Do you think that there are operas enough in London?—I think that there are too many to pay.

4459. You had Astley's Theatre for some time, and you did not find it profitable?—When I took it, I took it not with the intention of managing it; I took Astley's Theatre with the intention of altering the theatre, and exhibiting it as a model of how a theatre could be arranged better than other theatres were managed with regard to ventilation and the comfort of the audience, and yet the theatre would hold a large sum of money. I did it with that sole object, and with the intention of disposing of it.

4460. You made that a very beautiful house, but I fear that it does not pay Mr. E. T. Smith?—That is a question of situation; if it was in Piccadilly or at the top of the Haymarket, I think it would pay.

4461. As you bring theatres towards the west end, have you not observed that they do worse; take the St. James's Theatre, for example; it now does better than ever it did, but I believe there is a good company, with no audience?—In the first place, no "first-class" theatre has ever been known to pay; but the St. James's Theatre has attempted to give itself a character for elegant performances, and such a theatre does not pay, because the class that it appeals to does not support in sufficient number. Besides, you must not take a theatre too far west; it must be in the centre of the pleasure-seeking population, a certain portion of London which may be almost bounded on different sides by Drury-lane, the Quadrant, Oxford-street, and the Strand. One theatre feeds the other; the Lyceum I have known feed on the overflow of the Adelphi, and vice versâ.

4462. You would not think that a new theatre in Belgravia or Tiburnia would answer?—I would not advise any friend of mine to build a theatre there.

4463. St. James's Theatre is in the district you mention, but it has been a losing concern?—It has been a losing concern, but it is not within the district I named, it is a little too far west.

4464. It is a good company, but no audience?—This season, I believe, they have done very well.

4465. You would allow any number of theatres to give any performance that they please here?—Yes.

4466. You have stated that this is the case in America?—Yes.

4467. And you have also mentioned France, Germany, and Belgium?—Yes; I know it is the case now in France.

4468. But they cannot give every sort of performance in France, can they?—Everything; they have done away with the privilege of the theatres.

4469. Could Molière, Racine, or Corneille be acted at the Ambigu Comique?—That was done; "Tartuffe" was the first piece played under the new liberty of the theatres. The edict destroyed the privilege at the Théâtre Français and the Odéon. The instant that came into operation, the Porte St. Martin immediately played "Tartuffe."

4470. But I suppose the Grand Opera and the Opera Comique are different; or could they give "La Dame Blanche" or "Robert le Diable" at those small theatres?—I believe they can.

4471. Mr. Miller.] You object to the Lord Chamberlain, on the ground that he is a changeable officer, though you recommend that the Home Secretary should be constituted a court of appeal?—Yes.

4472. Did it occur to you that the Home Secretary is also a changeable officer?—Yes, but he is only used as a court of appeal; simply in cases where political allusions, or things improper, with regard to morality or decency, are supposed to arise, and he is always amenable to the House of Commons.

4473. But being, equally with the Lord Chamberlain, a changeable officer, how can the Home Secretary be any more fitted to decide in a case which is always of more importance, namely, a case of appeal?—The objection I have to the Lord Chamberlain is the principle on which each Lord Chamberlain acts, being different in each case.

4474. Might not the Home Secretary act differently in each case?—The Home Secretary would not, under those circumstances, have an opportunity of dealing.

4475. Would you have him act on any fixed rules or regulations?—I do not think that it would be necessary.

4476. You would take your chance, though it is a changeable office, of getting justice from the Home Office in case of appeal?—Yes, but such cases of appeal would be rather unusual.

4477. And that chance you would not take from the Lord Chamberlain in the first instance?—No, because there is no appeal from him.

S. Brooks, Esq.

4 May 1866.

SHIRLEY BROOKS, Esq., called in; and Examined.

4478. Chairman.] YOU are a Dramatic Author, are you not?—Yes, I may call myself one, though I have not lately been writing for the stage. More than 15 years ago I wrote half-a-dozen or a dozen pieces which could hardly claim the dignified name of dramas, perhaps.

4479. You have not signed the dramatic authors' petition?—No.

4480. But we should like to have your views on the subject of these restrictions that are placed upon the drama at the present time, on the one hand, by the censorship exercised by the Lord Chamberlain on plays, and, on the other hand, by the limitation of the number of theatres in London?—I have not prepared a careful answer to that question, but perhaps I may venture to give the Committee, off-hand, some of my ideas upon the subject. I have not been writing for the stage for 15 or 16 years, but I have been much connected with theatrical people, and I am very much interested in theatres, both as a dramatic critic and otherwise. With respect to the censorship of the Lord Chamberlain, I once had a curious experience of my own, which induced me to think that the interference of that high official is not sure to be exactly of a beneficial kind; I speak, of course, with regard to the office itself, and not as to any particular individual exercising its functions at a given time; I think those functions are exercised with a certain amount of caprice, and I will give you a little illustration from my own experience. When I was a young man, Mr. Disraeli had just brought out his brilliant novel of "Coningsby"; I was at that time very intimate with the Keeleys, who were the managers of the Lyceum Theatre, and they thought, that, in accordance with the custom of the day, it would be a good thing to put the story of that striking book on the stage in the shape of a drama. I did not quite see my way to dramatising the story, but being at the age when we are ready to undertake difficulties and almost impossibilities, I did do it; I put in a character or two, and invented a few scenes, and we really thought that we were going to do very well with the piece; we had got a tolerably good Coningsby, and we had a splendid scene of the montem at Eton, and every thing was very nearly ready, when I suddenly received an intimation that the piece would not be allowed. In a great state of consternation I went down to see the Lord Chamberlain about it. He received me with the greatest courtesy, and proceeded to say, that he thought there were many reasons for which it was undesirable to produce this piece, and, after some consultation, we agreed to go through the piece, act by act, if not scene by scene, and the singular objections that were taken by the Lord Chamberlain to points in that piece, which appeared perfectly harmless, astounded me. After a tenth or twelfth effort to get over some of the small points which he raised, I very nearly gave it up as a hopeless business. The Lord Chamberlain said, "You see that you are writing a kind of quasi political piece, and here you are exhibiting a sort of contrast between the manufacturing people and the lower classes; do not you think now that that would be a pity"? I ventured to explain to him, that over the water at that very time there was a right honourable villain in almost every piece that was played in one of the theatres there, who was always sending poachers to gaol, and always seducing his inferiors' wives, and that that person was exhibited on the stage with a star or a garter or a ribbon, or something of that kind, on his breast, the whole object of this transpontine drama being obviously to bring the aristocracy into unfavourable comparison with another class. Now, in my own piece I had an aristocrat, who was behaving rather better in a scene where a mill was burning, or something of that kind; however, that had to come out. Then, this was not to be in, and that was not to be in; something might be construed with an allusion to some family in Shropshire; Mr. Holloway's ointment was not to be put in as Mr. Highgate's ointment, because really Mr. Holloway was an industrious tradesman, and employed a good many people, and so on. Of course, a series of things of that kind places a dramatic author in a very unfavourable position, but that was the only time when I had a difficulty, and that was about the time when "Coningsby" had caught the top of the tide.

4481. I suppose, then, it must have been about the year 1837 or 1838?—It was in 1845.

4482. Have you had any personal experience since then with the Lord Chamberlain?—No; I soon learnt my lesson and made my satire out of milder materials.

4483. Would you be in favour of changing the present system of censorship, or of doing away with it altogether?—I shonld be disposed to do away with it altogether; at all events, so far as the prohibition goes. I would have an officer who should be appealed to in case of any question of public indecency or scandal, but his functions should go a great deal further than a mere alteration of a word.

4484. You would have the fault committed before the interference took place?—Yes, I would leave it to the audience. I believe that the British public are tolerably fastidious, as far as questions of public indecency go, and I think you might leave such matters to them.

4485. You speak now with regard to the theatres, I suppose?—Yes.

4486. But coming to a lower class of audience, do you think that their taste would be a sufficient check, say, at the east end and at the transpontine theatres?—I think so; I think it would be difficult to go very much lower than we have already gone with any chance of keeping a decent order of people together, to listen or to see a theatrical entertainment. I think that there is a large mass of good strong feeling in the English public which would stop anything that was very bad.

4487. Would there, in your opinion, be any change in the class of pieces performed, if the censorship were withdrawn?—I think not.

4488. With regard to religious subjects, for instance, what view would the public take of the performance of quasi religious dramas?—I have not had that view presented to me before, but I should think it would be eminently distasteful, and would have no success at all. Do you mean pieces where two creeds are brought into collision, as in the "Huguenots"?

4490. With regard to political matters, we have had evidence given, in the course of the sitting of the Committee, on a piece which Mr. Buckstone told us was suppressed; that the House of Commons was to be presented, and he was to personate Lord John Russell; do you not think that such a piece as that would be very popular?—I think it might be very popular, and I do not feel sure that the Aristophanic drama would be such a very bad thing to restore.

4491. The taste of the public would not check all political pieces, you think?—No, I think not.

4492. The question then would turn on the policy of representing political pieces, because the public taste would rather like political squibs on the stage?—I think so. I am not at all prepared to say that there are not certain political vices which are open to very legitimate stage exhibition.

4493. Do you think that, practically, dramatic authors feel hampered by the present regulations?—No, I do not think so; I do not think that the dramatic authors of the present day have given their attention very much to that kind of drama to which you are alluding.

4494. Can you tell me why that is?—For this reason and the only point on which I think my evidence is worth hearing is about the supply regarded in a literary point of view. I venture to express my opinion that the extreme badness of the drama is not to be met by any precautionary measure, such as checking the extension of licenses. You have reduced the art, both in a literary point of view and in a histrionic point of view, to almost its lowest pitch. I do not think that a dramatic author who tried to do an original bold thing of the class you alluded to would feel it within his range to do so; and, besides, you cannot cast a high comedy in London at this moment.

4495. To what do you attribute the low state of the drama in both points of view?—In a histrionic point of view, to having an immense number of theatres in which the audience are content with what they can get, namely, one good central figure, while the rest are stocks and puppets.

4497. It is rather the free trade in theatres than the limitation which has produced those results, you think?—It is a limited free trade at present. You have got bad pieces, bad actors, and, though it is an unpleasant thing to say, you have got bad criticism.

4498. Do you think that the decline of the drama is due to the number of people who go to theatres being a class that do not appreciate the highest kind of drama, or would you attribute it to the fact of there not being sufficient scope for dramatic writers?—No, I do not believe in there not being a sufficient scope for dramatic writers. I think that the public is satisfied with an inferior article, and you cannot blame the manager for giving it.

4499. Do you think that there are as many theatres as can be well supplied with good actors, good audiences, and good pieces?—I think there are, if we may judge by the proofs before us, seeing that there is no single company now which is wholly composed of good actors.

4500. You would not say from your knowledge of the theatrical profession that we could provide double the number of theatres with good actors or good audiences?—Unquestionably not.

4501. Is there any feeling among authors generally that there are not sufficient channels in which to dispose of their plays?—I do not think that. I think that the authors, generally speaking, are men of the world, and see the real solution of the difficulty. The object of the managers now is to produce a drama with some one or more great effects which shall run 100 or 200 nights, or even for two years. During that time of course every other dramatic author is excluded, and I may also say that the majority of the London public is excluded, because however eager playgoers people are, you cannot very well go to see a piece more than three times.

4502. With regard to the production of plays, do you think that one or two dramatic authors could supply the whole of the theatres in London with good pieces for long?—If the present system abides, I do not see why they should not. Multiply the present producers by three or four, and the work is done.

4503. But you are not aware of any feeling existing among the authors that the limitation of the number of theatres, or the legislation that prevents dramatic pieces being acted in music halls, acts injuriously on dramatic authors?—I do not believe in it myself; and I should not believe in it under any circumstances.

4504. What is your view with regard to dramatic performances at music halls; do you think that pieces of any high merit would be likely to be performed at music halls if they were permitted to enact them?—I do not think they would, generally speaking.

4505. The Committee have had some rather conflicting evidence given before them on the taste of the public; some of the theatrical witnesses believe that the taste of the public is as good as it used to be, and that it is in favour of the legitimate drama; are you of that opinion?—No, I do not believe that for a second. I do not believe that the legitimate drama, by which (though it is difficult to jump at a definition) I suppose may be meant drama in which the interest arises out of passion rather than out of situation or scene, is popular at all.

4507. Now, is dramatic literature generally remunerative; I mean the production of plays?—It would not be remunerative to a man whose literary occupations were various. If a man wrote novels and had a considerable connection with the newspaper press, it would hardly answer his purpose to bring plays on the stage, unless he did it on the system which has recently been introduced of sharing the profits with the manager.

4508. But if the dramatic author shared the profits with the manager, on the average the remuneration would be higher?—His remuneration would be very large indeed. Of course, it is no particular secret that in two or three recent cases which have been spoken to in this room, the author has carried a very large sum to his bankers.

S. Brooks, Esq.

4 May 1866.

4509. A successful author of dramatic plays is able to find a good market for his plays?—Yes, if he is really a successful author.

4510. Mr. Locke.] With regard to the sharing of profits, that must be a speculation which the dramatic author enters into; because if there should happen to be no profits he gets nothing?—Precisely.

4511. Therefore it would only be a dramatic author who felt himself quite secure that his piece would run who would enter into that arrangement?—You never can be quite secure. Take a piece that has had a very long run, and which has brought in a very large sum of money to both the manager and author, a piece written by a friend of mine, a very eminent scholar, and a first-rate novelist; I mean Mr. Charles Reade's play at the Princess's Theatre; there was in that piece a scene of the interior of a prison as it used to be in the olden times; the first night a certain portion of the audience set themselves very strongly against it, and I suppose that in other days that would have been accepted as what is called damnation; but the manager did not recognise the right of the audience to pronounce any such opinion; he pushed the piece on, and gradually the public came, and at last you could not get into the theatre at all. That is an instance of the uncertainty of success.

4512. But an author who had not written for the stage before could not enter into such an arrangement as that?—I suppose that the manager would not make such an arrangement with an untried author.

4513. And the author would hardly be glad to make that arrangement with the manager?—An untried author is like every other man in other branches of business; he must work his way steadily up, taking the rough with the smooth.

4514. It could only be with those who had established themselves that such an arrangement as that could be made?—Yes; and the moment a man has established himself, he has the ordinary chances in this as in other matters.

4515. You condemn the stage pretty freely: you say that there are bad pieces, bad actors, and bad criticism?—Yes.

4516. And likewise you said that the taste of the public had very much deteriorated?—I think so.

4517. Now, whenever there have been eminent actors come out, do you not think that the public have patronised them?—Applauding a single eminent actor and appreciating the drama are two very distinct things; and the success of a man whom I would not call an eminent actor, but only a reasonably successful quack, has been just as great. I do not value the opinion of the public at the present moment (with their present lights) at all, with regard to good acting.

4518. If John Kemble were to come on the stage at the present day, would he be hissed?—No; but that style of lofty declamation would not take.

4519. Take Edmund Kean?—I suppose that the tremendous power of Kean would carry him through, but that is a case of once in a century.

4520. But you are of opinion that we have no very eminent actor on the stage?—Exactly.

4521. How do you account for that?—The public are quite content with what they have and you have no school of the art.

4522. Do you not attribute it rather to this, that there are very few men born into the world who are calculated to become great actors like Edmund Kean?—Of course you cannot educate a man into genius, but you can educate a man so as to make him a good actor, presuming that he has the necessary gifts and graces.

4523. But if you look back to the time when the stage was well patronised, and when the audiences were admitted on all hands to be good judges, how very few eminent actors you had then?—Suppose we refer to Mr. Hazlitt's and Mr. Leigh Hunt's criticisms. At that time the best minds were brought to bear on dramatic criticism, and the least of the parts in a play were reasonably well acted. The critics picked out the blemishes and defects, and the actor was kept up to his mark; a very severe watch was kept on every actor, and of course he profited accordingly.

4524. You attribute the alleged decline of the drama partly to the want of good criticism?—I think that better criticism would do a great deal of good.

4525. I recollect very well the way in which the "School for Scandal" was in old days put on the stage; every part was well done?—Yes; that play has lately been put on the stage, and it has had a great success; a great many people have gone to see it as a new piece; persons in the stalls have told me that the fall of the screen caused just as much surprise as if it had never been seen on the stage before.

4526. Mr. Buckstone told us that at his theatre he could fill all the parts properly, but you doubt that?—Of course a manager knows the force of his company; I do not know that sitting in the stalls I should say so, but two or three of the parts would be very well played indeed.

4527. How do you account for the fact that the number of good actors has fallen off?—Because you have no school for the art in London. Formerly the country was your school, and a man did not dare to present himself to a London audience unless he had gone through the course. There was the York circuit, and having gone that circuit he would go to Bath, and having gone to Bath, where they were supposed to be very fastidious, they came to London. We are told that the drama flourishes in the provinces, and I read in the "Era" every Sunday that various plays are magnificently performed in the country, but we never get any of those men up to town.

4528. Have you been to the Brighton Theatre lately?—Not for some time.

4529. There are several actors in London; one, certainly, who is playing at the Prince of Wales's Theatre from the Brighton Theatre; that theatre is going on in a flourishing way, I believe?—The Right Honourable Chairman suggested a very admirable test, I think, of what we should expect in a high-class performance, say a comedy involving certain political allusions. Of course, a comedy of mere politics would not be tolerable; but suppose you mixed up the ordinary intrigue of life with certain political references, what would you want? You would want one or two persons who could adequately represent Members of Parliament, or those who desired to become so; a banker perhaps, a lady dowager, two or three young ladies, and some young men fit for "genteel comedy." I do not think that you could get that cast together in London at all. The underplot you could get in very great strength, because we have got five or six exceedingly amusing comic actors; but what must be the state of the drama when you cannot get a cast together for such a comedy?

4530. Do you not think that that may have arisen from the doing away with the privileges of the patent theatres?—I make no doubt of it whatever.

4531. But still is it not the fact that before the privileges of the patent theatres were taken away the stage then had very much fallen off?—I dare say it had, but I am old enough to recollect two or three fine old comedies extremely well played.

4532. But did not Kemble introduce elephants on to the stage, and play pieces that it used to be said should only be played at Astley's; and was it not therefore said that it did not rest with them to prevent other theatres performing the legitimate drama?—Over that word "legitimate drama," we have had a great many struggles; but if you performed a procession directed by Shakespeare, or say, in Dryden's "Indian Queen," I see no reason why you should not make it as good as you could. I think that objection about bringing beasts on to the stage was absurd. When you had Drury Lane given over to Van Amburgh and his lions, that was another thing.

4533. But take the procession in "Richard the Second," or anything of this kind, there would be no objection to "Henry the Fourth" and "Richard the Second" coming in on horseback, of course?—None whatever, of course. And supposing you were acting "Coriolanus," could there be any objection to a Roman triumph from coins or arches; you might surely have elephants there. I think that Charles Kean's processions and set scenes did not at all exceed "legitimate" limits.

4534. Now, with regard to the music halls, do you think that they have caused any deterioration of the drama, or had any effect whatever on it?—Not the slightest.

4535. Suppose the music halls were to be permitted to act any pieces they liked, do you think that they would deteriorate the drama?—I do not, indeed; I do not believe that you would, generally speaking, get any high class drama there. You might get an occasional scene; and some actor, not perhaps of the highest rank, might be engaged to go through his celebrated scene, in, say, "Richard the Third," but I do not believe that the public would stand much of that at the music halls.

4536. But if you introduced a scene here and there it would raise the taste of the public, or, at all events, raise it in comparison with some of the performances which they have there now, such as mere tumbling, and so on; do you not think so?—I have not been a very regular attendant at music halls, but I have looked into several of them, and I have heard very pretty music pleasantly performed, with all the favourite things, such as comic songs, and the rest of it, and I do not know that we have any right to interfere with persons amusing themselves in their own way; the only point which I may add is that I do not think that Parliament need be afraid of doing the drama any injury by any kind of free trade measure, because the thing has got as low as it can go.

4537. Colonel Sturt.] I understood you to say that Mr. Charles Reade's play at the Princess's was not altered in deference to the opinion of the public, but that the piece has gone on just the same?—No, I think the manager withstood the clamour, but he altered a little here and there, perhaps.

4538. Mr. Boucicault said that the crank scene was taken out after the first two or three nights, and the prison scene omitted after, I think, 30 nights more?—I think I remember that there was a strong protest advertisement on the part of Mr. Vining, and I am certain that the scene in some way was retained to the end of the drama, though I do not recollect how it may have been modified.

4539. Mr. Clay.] What is the latest period at which you would say the best of our comedies could have been well cast in London?—My last recollection of seeing a play reasonably well cast is some 12 or 14 years ago, but I cannot say exactly without reference to the playbills; the clever actors have been gradually distributed one by one over the mass of theatres, and, by consequence, any single theatre is weakened; the Haymarket is the strongest; there, no doubt, you see something like comic acting.

4540. Are you aware that this complaint of the decadence of the English stage is very old indeed?—Yes.

4541. Should you be surprised to hear that more than 40 years ago, those who recollect the "School for Scandal" and other comedies being played by Bannister, Miss Farren, Munden, Dowton, made exactly the same complaint of the decadence of the stage which you do now?—Yes; but there is such a thing as comparative goodness and positive goodness; any person who will take the trouble to go and see a comedy played now will see how very inferior the actors are to a very ordinary idea of good acting; then it may have been otherwise, but I do not know that it was.

4542. Do you not think that the great reason is that the theatres have increased more largely in number than the dramatic talent of the country can supply?—No doubt that is the case; but I say that the reason why the dramatic talent of the country does not supply the demand is, that you have no means of providing a school for your actors.

4543. But is it not that the actors are divided among so many more theatres than existed some 40 or 50 years ago?—Yes, no doubt.

4544. If we had (so to speak), except the transpontine theatres, only the two theatres, Drury Lane and Covent Garden, do you not suppose that you could find two first-rate companies to fill those theatres?—I think that you would gradually get them together; but even that would be difficult, though I should be glad to see it done.

4545. Holding that very dismal opinion, have you ever turned your attention to any means of improving that state of things?—The only thing that I can think of, and I suppose it is of no great use to suggest it, is a subsidized theatre under Government control.

4546. Would you extend to that theatre the system adopted at the Théâtre Français, of taking from other theatres, with their own consent, any actors that they chose to take?—Certainly.

4547. Mr. Clive.] You stated just now that there was very little real criticism of acting at the present time?—Yes.

4548. Do you apply that remark to the upper class of audiences, or to the whole?—The entire bulk of the audiences.

4549. To the upper classes of audiences as well?—Yes.

S. Brooks, Esq.

4 May 1866.

4550. Do you not think that the immense amount of business now done by large numbers of people, prevents their giving that attention to dramatic art which they did once?—When people go to see a particular form of amusement, they could bring their best faculties to bear on the criticism of it. When we go to-day to the private view of the Royal Academy, we shall find the best class of people giving their opinion about the paintings, passing by bad ones and recognising good ones.

4551. Does not that require a considerable amount of artistic education?—I think it requires nothing more than the ordinary social knowledge which belongs to a very large mass of people.

4552. Mr. Miller.] What do you think of the state of what I may call professional criticism; are there in the present day professional critics equal to those of former days?—I believe them to be perfectly equal, if not superior; but I think that they are hindered from exercising their powers by a variety of causes which I could explain, if the Committee thought it proper that I should do so. Three or four of the leading critics of the present day are men of high accomplishments and scholarship, far more capable of producing good criticism, in fact, than Mr. Hazlitt or Mr. Leigh Hunt; but we do not get it.

4553. You gave it as your opinion that the taste of the public for good acting has declined in the present day; how can you arrive at any comparison unless you have the same class of actors in the present day that you had in former days?—My remarks applied as much to the material of the drama as to the actors, and that we can all judge of for ourselves; formerly people would listen to high class comedies, in which plot and passion were the elements; the present generation go for a full year together to see a house on fire, or a lady thrown into a pond.

4554. But take Shakespeare's plays, for instance, and let them be performed at the present day by a man equal to Edmund Kean, do you not think that the theatres would be filled as much as they once were?—I am not prepared to say, because I think that that fine old type of drama has, perhaps, worked itself out; the people of the present day do not like to listen to long declamations.

4555. But I apprehend that you could form no decided opinion on that point, unless the theatres were supplied with similar actors?—I have formed a decided opinion that if Edmund Kean were to re-appear to-morrow, the houses would be crowded to suffocation, because it would be Edmund Kean; but it would be from no love of the drama.

4556. Chairman.] Do you remember the case of Mr. Emery bringing an action against one of the newspapers for a criticism?—Perfectly well.

4557. Do you remember the result of that action?—Yes, I do, quite well. Do you mean that that should be an awful warning to critics?

4558. Is criticism possible under such circumstances. The case was, that the criticism alleged that Mr. Emery's part had been very well spoken by the prompter?—That was a severe way of putting the thing, but I am perfectly certain that if I had been the critic of the "Morning Chronicle," which I was for many years, I could have said the same thing quite as plainly, without exposing my proprietors to an action. This was a smart gentleman trying to say a clever thing.

4559. But it must make criticism rather difficult, if the critic is pulled up for something so simple as that?—Yes, and here is another matter. At the same time that I was writing the criticisms in the "Morning Chronicle," I was bringing out pieces. It may be wrong, but it is not human nature to be in daily intercourse with people, profiting by their labour, and possibly being in social relations with them, and then to go off to your desk, and say, Mr. Brown's acting is weak, and Mr. Johnson's declamation is vulgar. I felt myself disqualified from giving that form of opinion; I could not do justice either to the public or to the actor.

4560. That is an irremediable evil?—I think it is, and for a simple reason which no person seems to understand; unless the critic is mixed up with theatrical people, he will hardly be qualified for his task, and if he is much mixed up with them, he seems very liable to all such influences.

4561. Mr. Powell.] What is your opinion with regard to the existing state of the law of copyright, as affecting dramatic literature?—It is a matter which is very much under discussion in the Dramatic Authors' Society, and in which they are interested; but I have had so little to do practically with it, that my opinion is worth nothing. Most of the plays that I have written are played in the country, and I get my money for them. Nobody has attempted to pirate them.

4562. Therefore, practically, you have no reason to complain of the existing state of the law?—Not the slightest, but I believe that many men have, who have a right to be heard before this Committee.

4563. Chairman.] Is there any other subject connected with this enquiry which you would wish to direct the attention of the Committee to?—No, I think not.

HORACE WIGAN, Esq., called in; and Examined.

H. Wigan, Esq.

4564. Chairman.] You are Manager of the Olympic Theatre, I believe?—Yes.

4565. And a dramatic author?—Yes.

4566. Have you written many pieces?—I have had about a dozen successful pieces produced in London.

4567. Has the censorship of the Lord Chamberlain given you any trouble?—None whatever.

4568. Have you had any passages in your plays changed or modified?—No.

4569. Do you think that the censorship acts in the way of hindering the efforts of dramatic authors?—No; on the contrary, I think it extremely beneficial.

4570. Do you think that that is the general view of the dramatic authors?—I think so.

4571. You have not heard many complaints of pieces being either cut down or rejected by the Lord Chamberlain?—No, very few.

4572. Are the pieces sent to the managers before they are submitted to the Lord Chamberlain?—Yes, as a rule.

4573. Suppose that a piece were sold or proposed for sale to a manager, would he pay for it before before it had been submitted to the Lord Chamberlain?—Whether he paid or not he would make his arrangement for paying before that.

4574. Would the payment be made dependent on the piece passing the Lord Chamberlain's ordeal?—Yes, it would be understood that it would be a playable piece. I do not know whether such a case ever arose as the Lord Chamberlain refusing a piece which had been bought, but as a matter of ordinary practice, I should buy a piece before it was sent to be licensed; it is usual to send for a license of a piece about a week before it is produced.

4575. Have you ever in your arrangements with authors had to make any distinct arrangement, when you bought a piece, that the bargain would be cancelled if the piece did not pass the Lord Chamberlain's supervision?—No; no such thing has ever come under my notice.

4576. Might not a disagreement arise between the author and the manager, if, after a piece had been bought and arranged for it were rejected?—It would be regulated like any other contract; no man is to be held to impossibilities, and if you buy something not playable you have not bought a play.

4577. You might buy it with all faults?—Yes, no doubt.

4578. I presume that you are familiar with the evidence given before this Committee, up to this point?—I think so.

4579. What is your view with regard to the sufficiency of the number of theatres; your view might be rather a biassed view, might it not?—No; I am not only interested as manager, but as author and actor, and therefore I have no bias.

4580. Do you think that there is room for a good many more theatres in London?—I think that the present number of theatres is amply sufficient for the actors, and for the theatrical public; but I am not prepared to say that if there were more theatres it might not create a wider taste in the English public; I think perhaps it would.

4581. Would it create actors?—I do not think that they require creating; I think that there are plenty of actors.

4582. Do you think that there are plenty of actors to supply the whole of the theatres that you might have?—Plenty.

4583. Are the salaries as high as they used to be?—They are very much higher, particularly in the country, where they have increased 30 or 50 per cent. within a few years. I remember the time when a guinea a week was considered a good salary in the country; but there are very few men at the present time in the country, with any responsible duties to perform, who would not get three times that amount.

4584. I see that you have said that the alleged monopoly of theatres maintained by the Lord Chamberlain's jurisdiction has no existence in fact?—Yes.

4585. How is that?—Simply, that if a man will conform to the regulations of the Lord Chamberlain with regard to the construction of the building, he can obtain a license. There is no instance of the Lord Chamberlain refusing a license where a building has been constructed according to his regulations.

4586. Are you familiar with the proceedings adopted by the Lord Chamberlain when he is called upon to give a license?—Yes, he surveys the building.

4587. Does not he consult the inhabitants of the neighbourhood?—I do not know of his doing so; I think not; I think he is quite irresponsible in those matters, and that he acts on his own discretion. I believe there was an application some years ago, in Leicester-square, to convert what was Miss Linwood's Exhibition into a theatre, and I believe that the parishioners opposed it; but I do not think that the Lord Chamberlain consulted the parishioners with regard to the propriety of granting a license. I think that the license was refused on the grounds of there not being the required approaches, and no possible means of making them.

4588. Is it a notorious fact that theatrical managers generally have, on the whole, realised large fortunes lately?—I think you would find that most of the metropolitan theatres have been profitably carried on for some time, for periods varying from 12 to 15 years ago.

4589. Are the profits of theatrical managers larger now than they used to be?—I should say that they were.

4590. Do you attribute that to the existence of a monopoly?—Not at all.

4591. Has the play-going public increased?—I think it has increased in London, very much so, and it is constituted of an entirely different class; that is to say, I do not believe that Londoners support the London theatres; they are in very great proportion supported by the population viagère.

4592. With regard to the metropolis, if the theatres are more lucrative than they used to be, you would not hold that the music halls have interfered with the profits of the theatres?—I do not think they do.

4593. If they were allowed to act stage plays, would they, in your opinion, be likely to interfere with the profits of the theatres?—I think they might interfere both directly and indirectly; but I think more indirectly than directly.

4594. Why indirectly?—I think that they would tend to bring the art and profession of the stage into disrepute; it would lower the standard of actors, make it disreputable, and consequently injure it.

4595. Have you known actors who have refused to go to music halls to act pieces there on account of its being a less dignified position?—I cannot say that I know any particular instance; but I know that the general opinion of actors has been that it is rather infra dig., and that they have a great aversion to it; I know that actors, as a class, are not so much amenable to moneyed influences as other classes; they very often refuse a good position wholly irrespective of remuneration; it is a calling that a man's personality is mixed up with a good deal. Men frequently throw up their situations in theatres because they are cast for parts beneath their dignity. A man who was 25 years ago a star actor at Drury Lane Theatre for many years is now in very humble circumstances; he has since come down to a very low position, and two years ago he was taking checks at the Lyceum Theatre; he was once engaged for three weeks to go to the East-end to act subordinate parts, and he said, "No; the great So-and-so, who has acted So-and-so, will not do that," and he declined to go. That is what I may call the physiology of the dramatic character. Actors generally, in my opinion, have a great great aversion to act before smoking, eating, and drinking, and clinking of glasses, and so on. I should myself strongly object to do so.

H. Wigan, Esq.

4 May 1866.

4596. I suppose that the feeling among the actors is that men who are smoking, eating, and drinking, do not sufficiently appreciate the acting?—Yes; and I think that they have also an intuitive knowledge that that kind of thing in this country would tend to make the calling disreputable, and send it down where it was 30 years ago.

4597. Then if the music-halls were to have the power to act pieces they might have a difficulty in finding actors?—No; they would find actors, no doubt, and there would arise an injury to the stage; they would find low-class actors, and a very large class of the public would get accustomed to a very low sort of thing.

4598. Have you known cases that you could cite of actors of any position going to music-halls?—No; I have known some cases of singers, but they have always done so with great regret, and they have some of them expressed a wish to return.

4599. Do you mean operatic singers or concert singers?—Operatic singers.

4600. Do you know enough of the music-halls to form any opinion with regard to whether it would be desirable to place them under a kind of censorship?—I should think it would be highly desirable.

4601. Do you think it would be possible?—Quite possible.

4602. Do you think, from the nature of their performances, ballets, and so on, they could be submitted to any kind of supervision?—Yes, their ballets are now submitted to supervision.

4603. In what way are they supervised?—By the Lord Chamberlain.

4604. Have you known any case in which the Lord Chamberlain has interfered?—I cannot speak of one; but when Mr. Mapleson had Her Majesty's Theatre for a short time, complaints were made of the shortness of the ladies' dresses, when the Lord Chamberlain did interfere, and it was altered.

4605. But you have never had any case, within your personal knowledge, in theatres with which you have been connected?—No, I think not.

4606. Do you think that is a sufficient market for theatrical pieces?—Yes, quite; there is a much greater demand than supply.

4607. If any dramatic author wrote a good piece now, would there be a market for it?—I should think there would; the managers would fight for him.

4608. Has there been any competition of that kind?—Good pieces are and always have been a very rare commodity, and from the nature of things they must be so. There has been a great deal said about the decline of the drama; I differ entirely from what has been said on that point; I believe that the pieces are as good or better than ever they were, and I think that the public are coming round to my opinion. I think that the best quality of a piece is that it should be playable, and that the literary portion of it is a secondary consideration; it may be good to read and uncommonly bad to act; but in the quality of playableness the pieces of the last 20 years are vastly superior, and even those of the last seven or eight years are better than those that preceded them.

4609. What do you mean by "playable"?—I mean plays attractive to the public; that they shall not be merely theatrical literature, but also playable.

4610. Are you of opinion that one dramatic author could supply the whole of the London theatres with good plays?—If you could get a man like Shakespeare or Alexandre Dumas, perhaps you could do so; but I do not know of any such man. I cannot get any good plays, and I have offered a very large sum of money for them.

4611. You know of no such fertility as would be able to supply 20 or 30 pieces a year?—No, I know of no such person.

4612. Has the price that managers pay for a good piece risen?—Yes, very much.

4613. How much per cent. has the price increased?—I do not know. A new system has arisen altogether. Plays are sometimes paid for down; but more frequently that is made conditional on the success, and so much per night is paid for them during their run.

4614. Have you ever made an arrangement with an author by which half of the profits have gone to the author?—No, but I have tried to do so. I had a negotiation with Mr. Boucicault to write a piece for me, and I have a letter from Mr. Boucicault on the subject, which I think I may read. His letter was to the following effect: "My dear Sir,—I should be very glad to write for you, but the terms you propose leave no margin of profit sufficiently large to tempt me to do so. Your terms are very nearly the same as those of the Princess's, Adelphi, and Lyceum, while in these theatres I consider 130*l.* a poor house. You will say that if I drew 100*l.* houses my share would be 120*l.* a-week;" and that is what I did say. "You will say that if I drew 100*l.* houses my share would be 120*l.* a-week, and this should satisfy me. I enclose you two returns from Manchester and Glasgow, where you will see that they pay me nearly 200*l.* a-week, my share. Mr. Vining has paid me from 240*l.* to 400*l.* a-week on the 'Streets of London' and 'Arrah-na-Pogue.' New York alone paid me 500*l.* a-week for 11 weeks past. I am now engaged on dramas for the Princess's and for the Adelphi, and I should be glad to write for the Olympic if I can see a margin; say share after 35*l.* These are not your expenses; but you will, I hope, pardon me if I say they should be." The negotiation, thereupon, fell off. I thought those terms very exorbitant.

4615. Those terms that you offered appeared to be pretty fair and liberal?—Yes, I thought the terms I offered were so.

4616. But, generally speaking, the terms obtained by Mr. Boucicault are pretty liberal, are they not?—I think that those terms would be very remunerative indeed.

4617. Mr. Miller.] I suppose it varies with the size of the house?—That letter of Mr. Boucicault means that the manager should cover his ordinary expenses.

4618. Chairman.] Are those the usual terms that dramatic authors obtain; are there other authors who get as high terms?—No, I do not think there is any other person who gets such terms.

4619. The supply of such pieces is not great?—No, the difficulty is very great; in fact, the chief difficulty London managers have to contend with is the difficulty of getting good pieces.

4620. You

H. Wigan, Esq.
4 May 1866.

4620. You do not think that there is any complaint on the part of dramatic authors that they have no market?—There are no dramatic authors in this country; there are one or two, perhaps, who write for the stage, but none of them who profess themselves to be dramatic authors to any extent; you could not number 30 of them; their plays are generally adaptations or translations from the French; and their fertility or sterility depends on the French stage. With very few exceptions, perhaps I should say for the last 120 years, at least 90 per cent. of all the pieces produced in this country were of foreign origin. Dramatic authors are at a very low ebb here, and have been so for a long period. It is incredibly difficult to write a piece that is playable. Charles Dickens tried it, and failed; Mr. Thackeray tried it; he wrote a piece that was refused by my brother Alfred and Mr. Buckstone; and Sir Walter Scott tried to write a dramatic piece, and could not do it. It is difficult, for this reason, that it not only requires fancy and literary ability, but it requires the knowledge of a particular technical art which very few people have time or opportunity of studying. Almost every beginner in literature commences by writing a play, and it is almost always unsuccessful.

4621. Mr. Miller.] What do you say of Sheridan Knowles's plays?—He was an actor all his lifetime; some of his plays were very good.

4622. Mr. Clay.] What do you think of Bulwer's plays?—I do not think that he wrote good plays; but that is a matter of opinion.

4623. The public has thought so?—Some of them have thought so.

4624. What do you think of the "Lady of Lyons?"—I think it is very poor trash; but I should like to put it up for my benefit, for it would draw money.

4625. Chairman.] What is your view with regard to the taste of the public; you differ from Mr. Buckstone and Mr. Webster on some points?—With regard to the prosperity of the stage, I understand that the tenour of their evidence was that the school of acting, which is a thing I never heard of as existing anywhere, has died out, and that there are no actors, and no prospect of getting any. I should like to say in contradistinction to that, from what I have learnt, and I can give you the most positive information, and point out where you can get more, that the salaries of actors in the country have very much risen, and that actors are more independent and more litigious. They stand on their rights, they are personages, and you will find that all the theatrical cases in the law courts have arisen of late years. For a great many years actors, as a rule, have been remarkably sheepish and willing to put up with anything; there have been no cases of the rights of actors tried until of late years, and actors have risen in social importance. I think they are not so illiterate as they were, and that altogether their position is very much higher than it was, and the prospects of the stage are therefore better; there are more young men now turning their attention to it in consequence of the less precarious nature of the occupation than ever there were; therefore I think that the prospects of the stage are rather rising than going down.

4626. With regard to the taste of the public, do you think that taste is improving?—I think it is. The alleged "decline of the stage" is a misunderstanding. The public now are better informed, and are more critical than they were; and when people say that actors have fallen off, they do not take into consideration that a different state of things prevails in theatres. Formerly actors had not so many calls on them; their versatility was not so tried; men devoted their attention to one particular thing; now an actor is called on to play a great many parts of a very difficult character; and almost every man is influenced, besides, in a very great degree by his recollections of the first performance he ever saw. There are many persons who say, "Ah, he is not like So-and-so"; and he may not be like; but he may be quite as good, if not better.

4627. Do you think that the taste of the public would sufficiently check any immoral pieces without the interference of the Lord Chamberlain?—I do not think so; I think that the taste of the public would not control anything of the kind. I think that the Lord Chamberlain's jurisdiction is not even severe enough. There is a passage in the 5th act of "Much Ado About Nothing," which is played at the St. James's Theatre; and which, if it had come under the Lord Chamberlain's jurisdiction, would have been excised.

4628. You think that, generally speaking, the public would not condemn such pieces?—That is my opinion. The passage to which I allude, in "Much Ado About Nothing," is in the 5th act, the 4th scene.

> "Don Pedro—Good morrow, Benedick.
> Why, what's the matter,
> That you have such a February face,
> So full of frost, of storm and cloudiness?
> "Claudio—I think he thinks upon the savage bull.
> Tush, fear not, man; we'll tip thy horns with gold,
> And all Europa shall rejoice at thee,
> As once Europa did at lusty Jove,
> When he would play the noble beast in love.
> "Benedick—Bull Jove, sir, had an amiable low;
> And some such strange bull leap'd your father's cow,
> And got a calf in that same noble feat
> Much like to you, for you have just his bleat."

That is said nightly in the St. James's Theatre. I do not think if it had been under the censorship of the Lord Chamberlain that that would have been permitted.

4629. There are no modern pieces so broad as that, are there?—I think not.

4630. But you have not found the public object to that at all?—Not at all.

4631. You took an active share in the prosecution of the music halls, did you not?—I took no more active share than this. I was the youngest London manager, and I suppose it is regulated on the principle of courts martial, where they ask the youngest officer's opinion first, in councils of war. They put my name down first, and I said that I had no objection. They told me that the music halls were acting pieces in the winter of 1864, and I went round to several of the music halls, and I found that it was so. I found that the Lord Chamberlain could not interfere, and that he had no funds to do so; that the police were unwilling to do so: it was a very uneasy state of the law, and I consulted my brother managers, and they said that any certainty was better than a total uncertainty, and I asked for protection on public grounds. I knew none of the proprietors, and they did not interfere with me. I should perhaps of all the London managers be the man who would suffer the least if those those contemplated changes were made. I was merely the nominal prosecutor.

4632. On what grounds did you prosecute; what were your chief objections?—I wished to ascertain the state of the law, and I wished to prevent what those contemplated changes would, I think, bring about; namely, the degradation of this particular calling which I follow, namely that of a player.

4633. Now, with regard to the consumption of exciseable articles, drink, and so on, what proportion do they bear to the profits of the managers?—I can tell you, so far as my theatre is concerned: I have four saloons; the nightly rent of them all appears to be 16*s.* 8*d.*; that is all I receive; 5*l.* a week.

4634. That is 250*l.* a year?—No, it is only while the theatre is open; it is a nightly rent.

4635. Those who pay that rent look for a profit on it?—Yes; the man says he sells more soda water, ginger beer, lemonade, and bills; they go to the extent of two-thirds of the whole of his profits; and one-third is derived from beer, wines, and spirits; he says, that in one week the consumption is nine gallons of beer, two and a half gallons of wine, and three gallons of spirits; that of course is for the six nights.

4636. Now, with regard to the music halls; have you seen any evidence that the profits in the music halls on drink bears any large proportion to the profits of the entertainment?—It is very much larger.

4637. In other theatres that you know of, have they large profits at all on the sale of drink?—I have inquired, and I do not believe they are benefited by it.

4638. Would you object, as far as the profits are concerned, to the sale of intoxicating liquors being prohibited in theatres?—I should like it exceedingly.

4639. Are other managers of the same opinion, so far as you know?—I think so; as it is, we have no liberty to sell those refreshments as they are sold in music halls.

4640. In what way have you not that liberty?—There seems to be a misapprehension about that. You are aware that of course theatrical managers are indeed licensed victuallers; that is to say, they have a license for the sale of wines and spirits, and everything but tobacco; that is obtained by Treasury warrant, and the Treasury warrant is only obtained on the production of the Lord Chamberlain's license. It has been maintained that we are on the same footing as the music halls, and that it is purely discretionary with us in what portion of the building we consume those refreshments. When I waited on the Lord Chamberlain as a deputation from the theatrical managers, I asked the Lord Chamberlain this question: "It has been said that it is discretionary with me, and that I can sell those matters in any part of the house I like, and that I could have a mutton chop and a glass of brandy in the stalls. I wish to ask whether that would be a violation of your regulations, and whether in such a case you would be called upon to interfere officially?" He said, "I should not like to answer your question in a hurry; I will take time to consider it." I gave him time, and after a long discussion with the clerk he said, in the presence of the other managers, that it would be a distinct violation of the regulation, and that I should forfeit my license; that I had no right to consume such things in the body of the house.

4641. Do you know a good deal about the French theatres?—Yes.

4642. You have been in Paris?—Yes, for many years.

4643. Have you acted there?—Once or twice.

4644. Are you acquainted with the French theatrical people?—Very much.

4645. What is your view with regard to the cafés chantants; can they perform stage plays?—Certainly not; that clause in the "Moniteur" clearly proves that.

4646. But if you had not seen this clause in the "Moniteur" would you have been of the same opinion?—I know as a fact that they do not, and cannot perform stage plays.

4647. Is there any complaint about that in Paris among dramatic authors?—No, not at all; since the liberty of the theatres every body is perfectly satisfied.

4648. But are the cafés chantants fit for the performance of small pieces?—No; they have neither scenery nor dresses.

4649. So that if they were empowered to act them they would have to be reconstructed?—Yes; my opinion is that the state of the law in France is precisely similar to the law here; that the liberty enjoyed by the proprietors of theatres in France is the same. You must show, for instance, that the building conforms to the police regulations, and if it does you get your license as a matter of course.

4650. Would you say that here you get your license as a matter of course?—I should say so, decidedly.

4651. Mr. Locke.] License for a theatre, do you mean?—Yes; I am not aware of any case of refusal where the proper regulations were carried out.

4652. You have had a long time to consider this question; do you think that any privileges ought to be extended to music halls or literary institutions, and other places that are not licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, but which merely have a license for music, or music and dancing, with regard to the performance of plays?—I see no reason why they should not, if they want to act plays, conform to the actual state of the law, and turn themselves into theatres.

4653. Take the Beaumont Institution, in the Mile End-road; can you see any reason why they should not be enabled to act farces at that place?—Not if they conform to the law.

4654. They have got a music license, why should they not act plays?—I do not know why they should not, if they conform to the law. If a building is properly constructed, I do not see why they should not have a theatrical license from the Lord Chamberlain or any other officer who has the control of that department.

4655. Take a place that has two licenses; a music and dancing license, and a magistrates' license for the sale of wines and spirits. What is your objection in that case?—I have no objection. I stand in that position myself.

4656. You have a magistrates' license, you mean?—No, I have no magistrates' license, but I have a license for the sale of wines and spirits.

4657. But you have no music or dancing license?—No, but the Lord Chamberlain's license would cover that.

4658. What is your objection to the music halls performing plays beyond what they do now?—My —My objection is simply the one that I once had the pleasure of pressing upon you at your house; you said at the time that you had been present, I think, with your family at Amsterdam and other places where you had seen plays performed with persons smoking, eating, and drinking. My reply is, that it is all very well; that is the custom of that country, and there is no harm in it. I see nothing immoral in a man smoking, eating, and drinking, even at church; it is a matter of taste; but inasmuch as I know it is not the custom of modest women to frequent places in this country where smoking, eating, and drinking goes on, then I say if you surround theatres, or any other exhibition of art in that way, it will preclude their visiting them, and you have done a material injury.

4659. But do you not think that they might have one place where they had eating, drinking, and smoking, and another where they had not, so that tastes of every description might be accommodated?—No doubt their tastes might be accommodated, but I do not think that their taste would gain much.

4660. But some would go and others would not go?—No doubt that would be so, but the persons who follow that calling would be injured by the absence of respectable persons.

4661. There are music halls now established to the number of 33, I think, and there are about 25 theatres?—Yes.

4662. An enormous sum of money has been expended in those halls and buildings; it represents 1,677,000 l.?—Yes.

4663. Now the performances at those music halls at the present time are singing, ballet, tumbling, and different other things of that kind?—Yes.

4664. Do you think that if they were permitted likewise such performances as would be consistent with eating, drinking, and smoking (of course, they could not enact a long play), it would be detrimental to the manners of the persons who frequent those places, or that, on the contrary, it would elevate them?—Of course it might elevate them, with proper supervision, and so on.

4665. Then what objection can there be?—I have another objection; my objection is not a commercial objection; I do not contend for a moment that a licensed victualler who now has a music hall would not gain by making up a more attractive programme, but I say, as a person interested in the art, that an injury to the art would follow.

4666. But still you say that if you were to elevate the music halls by giving them better performances, you would elevate the audience too?—I think not; I think that the persons who go to music halls go for an object quite ulterior to the entertainment. To call them music halls reminds one of a man in Mathews's entertainment; "Why are the men who wait about the hackney coach stands called watermen?" And the answer goes, "Because they open and shut the doors of the coaches." There is no music to be heard at those places, though there is much noise.

4667. You think that if there were no music and no ballet and nothing on the stage, then, inasmuch as people go for an entirely different purpose, they would go just the same?—No; I do not go to that length; the eye can be entertained when the ear cannot. No doubt a man might sit and smoke and look at something; it might be a diorama, moving pictures, or anything that requires no very great exercise of his attention with it.

4668. But you said that those things were not the attraction?—I think they are not.

4669. Then why do people go?—To smoke, drink, and make appointments to see women of the town.

4670. That they might do without any performance on the stage, or anything else?—Yes.

4671. Do you think that people would come just the same without the music and ballet, and do you think that the managers of those music halls would expend a large sum of money for the purpose of putting a ballet on the stage if they would?—I do not say that they would come there just the same without it.

4672. Then it is attractive?—The ballet is attractive; there is no question about it.

4673. The ballet is attractive, and the singing is also attractive, is it not?—I think not much; comic singing may be attractive.

4674. Then it is only the ballet that is attractive, you think?—I should think it was by far the more attractive.

4675. What objection have you to the performing of a ballet. That was what you prosecuted for, was it not?—Not because I am an admirer of the ballet, or wish to see ballets associated with theatres, for I should be very glad to-morrow if they were strictly prohibited in all the theatres. It was the only entertainment at that particular building that I happened to select. What I say is this, that if those men may infringe the law with impunity in one particular, there is no reason why they should not do it in all.

4676. Then you have not really any objection to the performance of ballet at those music halls?—I have, so long as it continues to be a theatrical exhibition. I should like to see the ballets expunged from the theatres altogether; but so long as the law stands as it is, and it is a theatrical performance, then I should wish to see it taken away from places where smoking, eating, and drinking goes on.

4677. But take the ballet quâ ballet, the thing itself; what objection is there to performing it at music halls any more than in theatres?—There is no more objection to performing it in the one than in the other.

4678. Then so long as ballets are done at all, would you allow the music halls to do them?—No, I am directly opposed to it.

4679. Is it your reason for objecting, these ballets interfere with the theatres?—No; my reason is that it is a stepping-stone to something else.

4680. To what else?—To further infringement of the law.

4681. But suppose it stops there, would there then be any objection to ballet being performed at the music halls?—Then I should have no objection, perhaps.

4682. What is the precise performance that you object to in music halls; is it dialogue on the stage?—Yes.

4683. But if there are actors who are willing to act at music halls, and persons who are willing to go and see them, what objection have you to that; is it the dignity of the drama, as it is called?—Yes.

4684. That is the reason, is it?—Yes. I have no objection to free trade in theatres whatever; I do not care how many theatres there are.

4685. But you object to any theatrical performance

H. Wigan, Esq.

4 May 1866.

formance (that is to say, dialogue) where there are refreshments furnished in the body of the theatre; is that so?—Yes, I do object to that.

4686. On what is your objection founded?—I think that it tends to bring my particular art and calling into disrepute.

4687. Throughout the whole country?—Yes, I think so.

4688. But if you do not choose at your theatre to have any eating and drinking in the auditorium, how did it degrade your house; if you do not introduce it at the Olympic, how is your house degraded by that, when it is done somewhere else?—One black sheep must discredit the whole flock.

4689. But if he never comes near the rest of the flock, how then?—He must come indirectly near the rest of the flock.

4690. In what way must he come near the rest of the flock?—If nine theatres out of ten get into disrepute, surely some of that odium would reflect on the tenth.

4691. But if a person goes over and over again to those places, and likes it, how do you get into disrepute with the persons who frequent them?—You are speaking of an experiment which has not been tried.

4692. But there are more music halls than theatres, are there not?—Yes; but there are not many music halls that have infringed the law so as to enable us to judge what the effect would be; there are none where there is acting to any extent.

4693. But it used to be so generally; at the "Eagle Tavern," for instance, did it not?—It was a saloon for some time.

4694. That is where Mr. Robson came out, is it not?—No, it is a mistake to say that he came out there.

4695. Where did he come out?—He was a very experienced actor before he went there. The Eagle was not a saloon when he acted there; the first license for that saloon was in November 1843, and Mr. Robson did not appear there until 1844. I can give a list of the places that he played at. The first place he acted at was a minor theatre in Catherine-street, Strand; the second was the Bower; he was then in the Kent circuit, the Bedford circuit, the Oxford circuit, the St. Alban's circuit, Jackman's Company, Tonbridge Wells, Chester's Company, Rogers's Company, the Standard Theatre, and the Grecian Saloon. Then he went to Dublin to the Queen's Theatre, and then to the Royal Theatre; then he came to Mr. Farren, and then to me. I was very intimate with him. He was never a waiter; it is quite a mistake to say that he was; he was an engraver's apprentice in Bedford-court, Covent Garden, and he used to go to that minor theatre which I have referred to in Catherine-street, Strand.

4696. He went to the Grecian, and likewise to the Bower?—Yes, when they were theatres; at least, the Grecian was a theatre.

4697. There was smoking, eating and drinking going on, was there not?—No, not when he was there.

4698. Not at the Eagle?—No. The first license was in November 1843; the tables had been removed in 1844. The tables had been put outside the theatre.

4699. The tables were round about outside?—Yes, formerly there was a slab to put the glass on, and that was carried out. Mr. Robson was not the production of music halls at all; he was a regularly educated actor, who had to go through all the misery of the early part of an actor's career.

4700. With regard to the ballet, and with regard to the censorship at the different theatres, you have stated that Mr. Mapleson was interfered with when he had Her Majesty's Theatre, on account of the shortness of the dresses of the ladies, and that in consequence of that interference they were lengthened.

4701. Another alteration has taken place, I believe, since then, when Mr. Mapleson was there; the ballet dancers had not what are called skirt tacks under their dresses, had they?—I do not know.

4702. I was going to ask whether it was before or after that, that complaint was made of Mr. Mapleson?—I cannot say; but there was an interference on the part of the Lord Chamberlain. I was asked before the bench of magistrates whether there was a case in which the Lord Chamberlain had interfered with a ballet, but very much more might have been said on that subject; because if it were worth while to inquire into it, it would be found that up to the period of the passing of the 6th & 7th Victoria, he always did license every ballet performed in this country; the license was applied for and paid for, and I believe his books will show that.

4703. Do you recollect Taglioni?—I can only just recollect her.

4704. You do not know what change has been made in the dress of the ballet since her time?—I remember that I have been to see Taglioni in the ballet called "La Circassienne." I know that she came out from the bath (I can see her now) in an exceedingly tight fleshing dress all over, with just a shawl wrapped round her loins; it was almost nudity.

4705. I am told that there are what are called skirt tacks, which have been lately introduced into ballet dresses?—I think not everywhere.

4706. You say that the stage is as good as it used to be in former days, and that the performers are as good now as they ever were?—I think that they are better than I ever remember them. I think that the plays now are, on the whole, supplied with a better cast, and all the subordinate parts are better done than they used to be.

4707. What times are you speaking of?—I can remember the stage from 25 to 30 years ago.

4708. Do you recollect Jones, the light comedian?—Yes.

4709. Do you recollect Elliston, and Charles Kemble, and Fawcett?—Yes.

4710. Do you recollect half a dozen or eight of them acting together?—I do not remember that. I saw Elliston twice, and I have seen Jones. I never saw Fawcett. I saw Liston twice; but none of them together. Liston was at the Olympic Theatre, Jones was at the Drury Lane Theatre; they were all scattered.

4711. You have had no experience whatever of the patent theatres when there was a full company to act tragedy or comedy at each of the theatres?—Yes, I remember Mr. Macready's management.

4712. That is since the time I want to refer to; but you recollect that, do you?—Yes.

4713. You recollect Charles Kemble and Macready acting together?—No, I never saw them acting.

acting together; I saw Charles Kemble act with Macready, I think.

4714. Do you mean to say that there is a cast at this time that could perform the "School for Scandal," taking all the performers at all the theatres together?—I think that the "School for Scandal" could be quite as well performed by the performers of the present day as it was done by any players within my recollection.

4715. Though you have never seen the other people do it; how can you speak to that?—I started by saying that actors, in my opinion, were better than I ever remember them.

4716. You only recollect the state of the case when the patent theatres were done away with; that was in the year 1832, was it not?—I can scarcely remember them so long as that.

4717. Mr. Du Cane.] During what portion of the year is your theatre kept open?—My theatre has been kept open nearly all the year round. I have only been manager of the Olympic Theatre for 18 months, and I have never closed it; but I have been stage manager of the Olympic Theatre for a great many years, and the average season for the last 10 or 12 years was about 10 months. I have looked about to ascertain the length of the duration of the seasons at the other London theatres, and I have found that almost all of them are open for about seven or eight months, on the average. I have letters from all the managers; Mr. Fechter, for instance, and the Surrey. Mr. Webster sometimes keeps open the whole of the year; Mr. Buckstone keeps his theatre open about nine months; Drury-lane about eight months, and so on.

4718. Do the theatres usually close at the same time of the year, or do they select different times for closing?—They generally close about the same time.

4719. What is called the dull season of the year; what time is that generally?—That is in the summer.

4720. Have you ever heard of complaints of the want of theatrical performances during that time of the year?—No. The theatres are closed at that time because it is no longer profitable to keep them open.

4721. Do you suppose, if there were free trade in theatres, more theatres would start up, and keep open during that time of the year in other parts of London?—I think not; there is free trade in theatres now.

4722. You contend that there is no want of theatres now?—I think not. I do not deny that if there were more theatres it might widen the taste for theatrical performances. I do not say that it would, but it might be so.

4723. Do you know any instances of the Lord Chamberlain refusing to license a properly constructed theatre?—I do not.

4724. A statement has been put into the hands of most of the Members of the Committee, with regard to the morality of theatres generally?—Do you mean before or behind the curtain.

4725. Both before and behind. "There are no private boxes" (this refers to the Alhambra) "on upper tiers, beyond the reach of audiences and actors, commonly known in theatrical circles as 'cock-and-hen' boxes; no 'kept women,' or their keepers, are ever allowed to purchase 'first appearances' on the stage of the Alhambra, as they are occasionally, at west-end theatres?"—I thought I was very learned in theatrical slang, but I never heard that before, and I do not know what it means.

4726. Nothing of the sort has ever occurred at your theatre, nor do you know of anything of the sort ever occurring at any west-end theatre?—No. I know this, that the pigeon-hole boxes, at the top of the house, you cannot see into from the stage, but in all the other private boxes you can. A short time ago two people went into a private box, at the Olympic, and began to smoke, during the performance of the "Ticket of Leave Man." I was told of it from the stage, and I waited till I went on the stage; and I could see into the box. I went forward, and remonstrated with them. I could have seen anything that was going on in that box.

4727. You say that you would exclude all ballet performances from the stage?—If I had my own taste, I would exclude anything that tends to demoralise the people. I believe that the ballet is meretricious. I do not believe in the poetry of the dance. I believe that men simply go there for the pleasure of looking at the women's legs; there is no art, or anything else in it, and I would, if I could, altogether exclude it. Of course, as a purveyor for the public taste, I am obliged to introduce ballets, but it is done as little as possible.

4729. Mr. Du Cane.] Do you include burlesque in the same category as ballet?—No, a burlesque may be a very legitimate entertainment. I think that burlesques of late years are very poor performances; in fact, it is hardly fair to call them burlesques; they have become a hybrid kind of things, called extravaganzas; but burlesques proper may be a very clever and entertaining performance.

4730. Do you think that the performances at music halls have in any way tended to create a bad style of burlesques?—I cannot say, but I cannot see what influence they can have had on it.

4731. Colonel Sturt.] Has not one of the results of the music halls been to raise the salaries of those engaged at the theatres, particularly the ballet, on account of the increased demand for their services?—I think that since what was supposed to be a breach of the law has taken place a larger number are employed. Ballet is going out very fast at the theatres

4732. But I mean, are not the salaries of people generally engaged at the theatres increased in consequence of the music halls?—I think not in consequence of the music halls.

4733. Take the singers?—I have known singers who being unable to find (the English Opera scarcely existing here) employment for their talent have gone to the music halls, but they have gone there with mauvais coeur.

4734. You do not think that the music halls have tended to raise the salaries at theatres?—No; it is in consequence of the prosperous state of the theatres, and the great number of people who visit theatres who formerly did not.

4735. That is not in consequence of the increased demand occasioned by the music halls?—No.

4736. Mr. Clay.] Is there any truth in the insinuation which I find in a paper before me, that ladies occasionally appear and act at theatres without any salary, their inducement being that they

H. Wigan, Esq.

May 1866.

they may be seen and admired?—I would rather that you would put it much more broadly.

4737. There is a class of ladies to whom it is a matter of importance to be seen and admired as much as possible?—Yes.

4738. Do you know any instance in any theatre where those ladies have been allowed to act without receiving any salary?—You put a question to me that I should have very great difficulty in replying to without throwing stones at my neighbours; but I have heard that theatrical managers have received sums of money to allow ladies to appear.

4739. That is in substance what is stated in this paper?—I have often had large sums of money offered to me for that purpose, and I have always refused; but I do not know whether it is true that any such sums have been accepted elsewhere.

4740. Do you think that music is not the attraction at the music halls?—I would not go the length of saying that music is not attractive, but I do not think it is the principal attraction at the music halls.

4741. Are you aware that the principal music halls pay very largely for those performers who do their selections?—I believe they do.

4742. Is it not probable that the managers of music halls would not do that unless it were found to pay?—I only found my opinion on what I have observed by being present at music halls. It always appeared to me (and I have visited them personally in connection with this inquiry) that music was the last thing the people seemed to be thinking about. There is a great deal of conversation going on, clinking of glasses, and moving and rushing about. The only thing that appeared to attract any attention at most of them was the comic song; that seemed to have a particular charm because it was not of a very correct nature.

4743. Are you aware as to the three chief music halls which have made the most money, the Canterbury Hall, the Oxford, and the Alhambra, that those are the places at which there is the best selection, as it is called?—I believe it to be so.

4744. Is not that a presumption that the music is a performance which draws?—I suppose it is a presumption to that extent.

4745. Are you a musician yourself?—Yes.

4746. Have you heard any of the best selections at the Oxford?—Yes, I think I have; I have heard some very good performances there; so far as the selection of music went, if it had been properly executed.

4747. But was it sufficiently well executed, the music being good, to have a tendency to elevate the popular taste for music?—Yes; I think under other surroundings, it would. I think in any other place it would have done so; but so far as my own knowledge goes about the music halls, the musical public do not go to the music halls; they go to the Monday Popular Concerts, where it is performed in an excellent manner. Musical people, as a rule, are very great enthusiasts and fastidious too; people who would not like to go to music halls.

4749. Lord Eustace Cecil.] You have said something about the comparative profits of the theatres and the music halls from the sale of refreshments. Without giving the Committee any private information at all, what in your belief is the proportion of profits from the sale of spirits and refreshments in music halls?—I have made no calculation with regard to that. I have heard the evidence of Mr. Strange and others; he said that refreshments made 50 per cent. of his receipts.

4750. You have no reason to believe that it is more, have you?—I should think that that was an understatement.

Monday, 7th May 1866.

PRESENT:

Lord Eustace Cecil.	Mr. Locke.
Mr. Clay.	Mr. Taverner John Miller.
Mr. Clive.	Mr. O'Beirne.
Mr. Du Cane.	Colonel Sturt.
Mr. Goschen.	Mr. Walpole.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE GEORGE JOACHIM GOSCHEN, IN THE CHAIR.

TOM TAYLOR, Esq., called in; and Examined.

T. Taylor, Esq.

7 May 1866.

4751. Chairman.] YOU have written a good many successful plays, and you can tell the Committee something with regard to the views of the dramatic authors?—I should be happy to give you my own views. I do not know that I have any authority to speak for my confrères.

4752. Did you sign the petition which several of the dramatic authors signed some time ago, which petition has been presented to the House?—No, I believe not.

4754. Has it ever happened to you in plays which you have composed that any erasures have been made by the Lord Chamberlain?—In very trivial matters. Allusions to contemporary persons have been objected to sometimes. Sometimes the objections have been persevered in, and sometimes on remonstrance they have been withdrawn.

4755. Have you had experience of the working of the law through the reign of several different Chamberlains?—Yes, my experience extends from the year 1845 to the present day, about 23 years.

4756. Have you found any inconvenience from difference of views on the part of different Lord Chamberlains?—Practically, I may say, that my experience is that the interference of the Lord Chamberlain is null.

4757. Both for good and for evil?—Both for good and for evil. I have not perhaps tempted it very severely; it may be that my pieces have been free from objectionable matter.

4758. Do you think that in the lower style of theatres the taste of the public is a sufficient check?—No, I do not think so at all. With regard to taste, certainly not.

4760. We have understood from the witnesses generally that there are three points on which the Lord Chamberlain interferes, namely, immoralities, political allusions, and religious allusions. Do you think it would be necessary to keep that restraint in action in all respects at some of the theatres?—If my impression is correct, it should extend to all the three points of interference. In the west-end theatres, I believe, practically, the interference is null; that is to say, where the taste of the public is a restraint on the authors; but there are classes of theatres at which it would be absolutely necessary; I mean the penny theatres, and the theatres such as we have had described in Whitechapel, the gaffs.

4761. Is the Lord Chamberlain's license, so far as you are aware, at all effectual there?—I am not aware.

4762. Now with regard to political allusions, do you think there is any caprice on the part of the Lord Chamberlain?—In my experience, I only remember one case, and the interference was rather with the actor than the author. That was a piece of my own, in which Mr. Alfred Wigan represented a French naval officer dressed, as it was said, as the Prince de Joinville. The Lord Chamberlain interfered, and the costume was changed; but the only effect, I was given to understand at the time, was that the costume was made more correct, and the portrait improved.

4763. Do you think that it is necessary to maintain any kind of supervision over the pieces, with regard to political allusions?—Practically, I cannot conceive that that is necessary at the present day.

4764. As a matter of fact, are there very few plays with political allusions?—Very few; and where there are, such matters, if fit for the purposes of the stage, must have been so thoroughly thrashed out in the newspapers beforehand, that it would seem quite superfluous in a licenser to meddle with them.

4765. Colonel Sturt.] Do you mean that the audience would check such things?—No; but, practically, there can be no objection, because such a thing must be already a matter of free public comment,

T. Taylor, Esq.

comment, otherwise it would not be effective on the stage.

4766. Chairman.] But to put public men on the stage might be very popular at times, perhaps?—I can hardly conceive that.

4767. We had a case laid before us, in which Mr. Buckstone was to have personated Lord John Russell?—I never heard of such a case as that. I can conceive that Mr. Buckstone, as Lord John Russell, would be very attractive.

4768. With regard to the present position of dramatic authors from a remunerative point of view, would you say generally that the prices paid for dramas are as high as they used to be, or that they are lower?—I am sorry to say that where they are settled in the usual way, and not made dependent on the run of a piece, they have not improved, in my experience.

4769. Is there a smaller demand for plays than there used to be?—I have not experienced that practically.

4770. Do you attribute the comparatively small demand which there is for dramatic literature to the small number of theatres?—No.

4771. You think that, so far as you know theatrical matters, there are sufficient theatres from the point of view of the demand?—Yes, there are more theatres than can be supplied with attractive pieces.

4772. Therefore, you do not hold the view, that at present dramatic authors are interfered with by the existence of certain restrictions on the performance of dramatic pieces at music halls?—Practically, it is possible that a different class of pieces might be brought into demand by the opening of the music halls; but having regard to the class of pieces at present acted, I do not think so.

4773. You do not think that on the whole the market is glutted with excellent plays?—Certainly not; from my own experience, and what I hear from the managers, I believe that there is a difficulty in getting plays.

4774. But if two or three of the first theatres have got a piece which has a very long run, does not that stop for a time all fresh production?—Yes, no doubt; but at the same time it should bring a profit to the author, and to the manager of the theatre, and so act for the encouragement of other authors.

4775. You think that it rather stimulates authors?—Yes, I should say so; I can conceive of nothing more likely to stimulate an author than the large rewards which we have heard have been obtained for successful pieces.

4776. Those rewards are larger than were ever previously obtained, were they not?—Yes, certainly; they have been promoted by good business management on the part of the author, and where he has been able to make his terms wisely he has profited very largely.

4777. I suppose there is quite sufficient competition for good pieces, so that the authors are not at all at the mercy of the managers?—If they are it is their own fault.

4778. I mean a successful author?—He certainly ought not to be at the mercy of the manager; there may be necessitous men who are at the mercy of anybody.

4779. There are a sufficient number of managers who are ready to buy good plays if they are produced, you think?—Yes. Of course I am supposing the plays to be adapted to the taste of the times.

4780. What is your view with regard to the taste of the public at present; is it improving, or is it declining?—I believe that the British public seldom fails to recognise, in the long run, a good thing, and to reward it; but I believe the average audience is essentially incapable of distinguishing off-hand between good and bad; that is to say, they are liable to be imposed on at first, and to take paste for diamond. This is true, and I believe it has always been true, in a great measure.

4781. Do you think that if they performed dramatic pieces at music halls, it would tend to the degeneracy of the drama?—I really can hardly answer that question. I believe that if a class of good pieces were presented at such places, it would be better than listening to nigger minstrelsy and seeing questionable ballets; but I have no reason to believe that better pieces would be attractive. What is most offensive in those performances is, I apprehend, that which most attracts; and so I fear that if they had dramatic entertainments they would go in for a low order of pieces, such as a person of taste could not approve.

4782. The Committee have had the view expressed that actors would degenerate by meeting a public there whose taste would be very questionable; would you think that that would be the case?—I should think that it might be so, believing, as I do, that the class of pieces accepted at such places would be a lower class of pieces; I believe that the actors would tend to deteriorate.

4783. But, on the other hand, would it not by competition rather stimulate men to whom there is not a sufficient opening at present to enter the theatrical profession?—The theatrical profession is like that of the dramatic authors', it wants good stuff; we have not good actors enough to supply the present demand.

4784. Not sufficient good actors to supply the majority of the London theatres?—I do not believe that there is a theatre in London manned as a theatre should be.

4785. Do you hold, speaking in a broad sense, that both actors and actresses are suffering from the present monopoly of certain theatres?—No, I do not.

4786. I understand from your evidence that there are sufficient theatres to supply the theatre-going public?—I think so.

4787. But at the same time you would see no objection to granting licenses for new theatres?—No, if they are properly superintended, and under proper control with regard to the safety of the public and their accommodation, and if they are not made mere drinking shops. I would advocate the abolition of everything that tends to make theatres public-houses.

4788. You think that the combination of the two things is not desirable?—I think so.

4789. You think that the public-house element rather destroys the dramatic element?—I think so.

4790. But does not the dramatic element at the same time rather destroy the public-house element?—At present the two are separate; a man must choose between the two; if he wants to see a play he must go where he cannot smoke, eat, and drink, but if the two were put together there are many men who would go where they could have both; so far, I have no doubt, that enjoyment among a certain class would would be increased by the opening of music halls for theatrical performances.

4791. Would you in the interest of literature see any objection to the opening of music halls for theatrical performances?—As things are, I doubt if the interests of literature would be permanently affected.

4792. I do not mean whether it would be right or wrong to have those performances at music halls, but simply with regard to the question of fact?—As things are, free trade having gone so far as it has, I do not know that any real positive harm would be done by carrying the thing a step lower, supposing the music halls to be under proper restrictions.

4793. You would extend the restrictions of the theatres to music halls?—I do not think, so far as the literary part of the question goes, there would be much harm; but I think there is harm in associating theatrical performances with drinking and smoking, and the other adjuncts of those places.

4794. Do you think that the drama has suffered from free trade in theatres?—I think so, very much; I have a very strong opinion on that subject. I do not think that this is a matter in which the taste of the public can be safely left to itself.

4795. You think that it requires a little nursing?—Yes, I think so.

4796. Do you think that in France the throwing open of the theatres will rather tend to a decline in French acting?—If it operates as the withdrawal of the patents in this country from the Royal theatres, it will deteriorate the quality of dramatic writing and of acting too.

4797. Then you think that the drama flourished more under that monopoly than it does under free trade?—I think so.

4798. Can you account for that?—Those theatres were goals for the ambition of actors and dramatic writers; they were patronised by the higher classes; they charged higher prices; they kept alive a high standard of excellence, both in authorship and acting, which has not been maintained since they ceased to hold their patents.

4799. Then I gather from you that you think it is rather the absence of the two leading theatres, that dramatic writers and actors might look up to as the highest points, than the presence of other theatres, which has done the mischief?—Yes, quite so; those two leading theatres tended to keep up the notion of something like a model theatre; the ideal of a properly managed and well manned theatre.

4800. You think that if you had two model theatres it would answer all purposes?—Yes.

4801. You might have other theatres side by side with them?—Certainly.

4802. Are you aware of the present system in France?—I do not know how far the subsidy system has been affected by the liberty of the theatres; but up to a very recent time there were particular theatres for particular classes of performances; Molière could only be performed at the Théâtre Français and the Odéon, which were subsidised for the purpose. They were much like our patent theatres, except that our patent involved no subsidising. I am quite aware that it would be frantic to expect any such thing as the subsidising of our theatres; but if we had it I believe it would be public money well spent, and do more good than anything else with regard to the theatres.

4803. Mr. Locke.] Do you think that the Théâtre Français, up to the time of the alteration, had upheld its former position?—It had always held the highest position.

4804. But was that position as high as it was formerly?—I am not aware that it has materially declined. I do not know that it has ever had better actors than Rachel, in tragedy; or, in comedy, than Regnier and Sanson. Sanson is very old, but he still acts, and Regnier; and then there is Got, and Delaunay, and Plessy. I have not, however, been at those theatres within the past year.

4805. But with regard to the pieces produced, what do you say?—They have a certain literary cachet; there is still an ambition among those who write plays for the Théâtre Français, and a high standard is maintained by the Comité de Lecture.

4806. Whether or not the Théâtre Français has upheld its position, altogether you still think that it is higher held at this time than any other theatre in France?—Yes.

4807. Now with regard to the patent theatres in England; I think it was in 1831 that the Committee sat on the opening of theatres; are you aware that the patent theatres had at that time ceased to hold the same position in England which they had held before?—They might have felt their share of the general causes of depression, but still I conceive that in so far as the monopoly operated at all, it operated to their good.

4808. They did not confine themselves to the legitimate drama at that time either, did they?—They always had high class pieces there, as well as melo-dramas and farces.

4809. They used to play operas, did they not?—Yes.

4810. They never confined themselves to tragedy, as the Théâtre Français did?—No; they had afterpieces and melodramas, the same class of pieces as they had at the minor theatres, but the minor theatres were debarred from acting tragedies.

4811. Was not that the very complaint which the minor theatres made, namely, that while the patent theatres performed this class of pieces, they were not permitted to perform legitimate drama?—The minor theatres made that complaint; my theory would go to advocate restraint to the length of restraining the model theatre from performing burlesques and pieces of that class.

4812. Do you think that one model theatre would be quite enough, and that two was too much?—Yes, one would be quite enough.

4813. Probably you do not recollect that whenever a piece was brought out at Covent Garden they invariably produced the same piece at Drury Lane?—Yes.

4814. Take Terry (who Sir Walter Scott said had "terrified" him on to the stage, &c.); he introduced "Rob Roy" at Covent Garden, and immediately they had another edition at Drury Lane, and the one at Drury Lane failed; there was competition between the two patent theatres for the legitimate drama and competition in music?—Yes.

4815. That would be against your theory?—Entirely.

4816. Your theory is, that if there were a model theatre, there must be one only?—Yes, limited to tragedy, comedy, and farce.

4817. The Haymarket was a summer theatre in former days, was it not?—Yes.

T. Taylor, Esq.

4818. It was not open at the same time as the two others?—No.

4819. There were two theatres open during the winter, and one in the summer?—Yes. My notion, of giving a model theatre a subsidy, would not debar other theatres from acting the same class of pieces. I would only confine my model theatre to the acting of high class pieces. There must be a subsidy, because such a theatre would, to some extent, be hampered in its competition with its neighbours. I would, in that theatre, maintain a school of dramatic art, in fact.

4820. Would you give them the same privileges that they have in France, namely, to go and claim any actor or actress from a minor theatre if the actor or actress chose to come?—I believe that that would be a very wholesome provision.

4821. But with all that amount of privilege, I believe that the Théâtre Français does not pay?—Of that I am not aware.

4822. I believe that there is a difficulty in keeping it open in the midst of all these "advantages"?—It is quite possible; and my model theatre might be in the same predicament.

4823. The Odéon has a subsidy, has it not?—I do not know; perhaps I ought to explain to the Committee that I speak entirely in what I conceive to be the interest of art, and not with regard to the facts of political economy.

4824. If the subsidy were not sufficient, and audiences did not come, would you increase the subsidy?—No; I suppose that the subsidy is fixed on certain conditions, and that those conditions are adhered to.

4825. Something must be done by the theatre for it; good pieces introduced, and good actors engaged?—Yes; but I do not say that the French idea could practically cohere with our system. That is only what I should desire in the interest of art.

4826. You have been asked whether you think, supposing there were no restrictions with regard to political pieces being put on the stage, the production of those pieces would take place, and would not be at all encouraged?—Unless they were on highly popular topics, with regard to which the utmost freedom of opinion was already exercised through the newspapers and otherwise, they would not be introduced, because they could not be understood.

4827. But can you account for the historical plays of Shakspeare being so popular as they must have been in those days?—At that time, it must be remembered, that they were only one of several other classes of plays. At that period of immense dramatic activity everything was turned to the purposes of the theatre; even such things as a murder occurring at the time, and incidents of contemporary history in other countries. In Marston's "Game of Chess" he introduced Gondemar on the stage as the Black Knight; the run of the play was stopped by the Council, and the author laid in prison for it. Shakspeare found in the theatre certain historical plays which had been already acted, threw in something of his own, and brought them out among the other stock attractions.

4828. But they were attractive?—I do not know; the only play which we have any special record of as being attractive is that very play which I have mentioned.

4829. Is there no such record of "Henry the Eighth"?—I am not aware of such a record.

4830. But that was coming very close, putting the father of the Queen on the stage; was it not?—Yes.

4831. And bringing the infant on the stage?—Yes; but it was all done in such a way as to please those in authority, or else the author would have been laid up by the heels for it. No censorship would have prohibited those things.

4832. Do you think that no censorship would prohibit those things now?—I do not think the censorship would prohibit it because it was political, if it was not treated in an unbecoming manner.

4833. Suppose the late Duke of Kent was put on the stage?—Of course during the lifetime of the Queen the public taste might object to that.

4834. But the censor would object, would he not?—Yes; but he would only do what the public taste would ratify.

4835. Do I understand you to say, you do not think that, in the present state of things, and having regard to the actual taste of the public, the giving of theatrical performances at music halls would tend to depreciate the style of dramatic performances?—I think that combining the purposes of the music halls as houses of refreshment with the purposes of the theatre would, in so far as it had any operation on the class of pieces, tend rather to bring them down.

4836. Do you think that it would tend to deteriorate the plays produced at theatres?—I do not see how that is to be done.

4837. Why not?—The class of entertainment that is peculiarly popular now is so unsatisfactory to any cultivated taste, that it is difficult to believe it could deteriorate. How could the music halls go lower than some of the low modern burlesques?

4838. You do not apprehend any danger from that?—No, not from that.

4839. Are you aware that very excellent music is performed at the music halls?—Yes, very good music as well as very bad; I suppose, in fact, they appeal to all tastes.

4840. They go through a whole opera sometimes, but they are not allowed to have costume?—No.

4841. Can you see any objection whatever to their having costume, although the audience do sit at tables to eat and drink?—No; my objections to the opening of music halls arising from the quality of the performance, or the taste of the public, are very trifling indeed; but I do think they would tend to enlarge a market which is large enough, and that they would tend to deteriorate the theatres by drawing off good actors; there is not enough good writing or good acting to supply a larger market.

4842. But would not that produce more actors, and probably better ones?—My experience does not suggest that; it is not as if the music-hall theatre would be under the restraint of anything like taste; the entertainment would be in the hands of men who have no taste whatever, except for filling their pockets; it is rather difficult already among managers of theatres to find anything else; but the proprietors of music halls would be a grade lower than ordinary theatrical managers, and therefore the general tendency would be to consult a constantly lowering taste, rather than a better one.

4843. You think that the action of the Lord Chamberlain, or some other officer with power to license pieces, would make no difference in that result?—I think not; because pieces would not be be produced that would call for the interference of the Lord Chamberlain.

4844. There would be nothing improper produced, you think?—No; only what you have now, but tending lower; not indecent; not offensive; not such things as the Lord Chamberlain could interfere with.

4845. But it would be better to have even such pieces than mere negro melodies and tumbling, would it not?—Possibly.

4846. Therefore it would not tend to lower the taste of a very large portion of the public, but rather to raise it?—I cannot help thinking that if the theatres could be maintained and managed as they should be, they would have no occasion to fear competition; but at present they have great difficulties in getting a sufficient supply of good pieces and good actors; and I should object to whatever tends to lower the profession in public estimation.

4847. There is a great body of people who do frequent those music halls?—Yes.

4848. You would not deprive those people of amusement, would you?—Certainly not.

4849. Therefore it would be advantageous to make it as good as possible?—Yes, certainly: the enjoyment of a certain class of people would be increased; but if you enter into considerations of taste you come to a different class of question entirely.

4850. But still, by doing away with the patent theatres, we have left taste to take care of itself, have we not?—Yes.

4851. It would not be possible to hark back, would it?—No.

4852. Mr. Du Cane.] Your pieces, I believe, have always been in the first instance, performed at first-class theatres?—Yes, generally at the west-end theatres.

4853. Do you think, if the censorship of the Lord Chamberlain was done away with, there would be any great demand at the minor theatres for the class of pieces that you write?—I should imagine not, but I should be very glad to find it so.

4854. You say that if the censorship of the Lord Chamberlain was withdrawn, there would be no danger of pieces of immoral tendency being represented at the higher class of theatres?—I think not.

4855. Are there not a great many pieces, either translations, or adaptations from the French, at the high-class theatres?—A great many; not so many as is said; out of 60 of mine there are only about 10 from the French; but no doubt the French theatre does largely supply our own, and has done so for the last 200 years.

4857. You think that if the censorship of the Lord Chamberlain was withdrawn, French pieces of that class would not be more literally adapted than they are now?—I think not. The only instance in point I ever heard of was that of the prohibition of a very popular French piece, the "Dame aux Camélias;" that was allowed at the Opera House, but not as a drama, in this country. Yes, I once heard of a version of "Orphée aux Enfers" being forbidden.

4858. Colonel Sturt.] Mr. Boucicault told us that the "Dame aux Camélias" was played at the Lyceum Theatre?—I never knew that it had been acted here.

4859. It is at question 4286. Mr. Boucicault was asked, "It was refused a license, was it not"? and he said, "But it was given here at the Lyceum Theatre; they changed the title of the piece, but it was the same piece that was played in America, and I understand was played here by the lady who made so great a sensation in America in the part"?—I never heard of such a thing.

4860. With regard to political pieces, I think you are the author of a piece called the "Contested Election"?—Yes.

4861. Had you any trouble in obtaining the Lord Chamberlain's license for that piece?—None at all; the satire was general.

4862. It was not considered a piece of political tendency?—Not in the least; it was merely noticing what every newspaper was attacking.

4863. Lord Eustace Cecil.] That piece has never been reproduced, has it?—Yes, it has been reproduced in the country, and it was played by Mr. Charles Matthews in town, too. It belongs to a country manager, to Mr. Knowles, of Manchester, and I have no control over the acting of it.

4864. There was no prohibition put to it after it first came out?—No, it ran for 100 nights, at first, I believe.

4865. Mr. Du Cane.] Do you conceive that a play on any political question, in which party feeling was running high, would not draw a full house?—I do not think so. Managers are very shy of any political allusions, because they know that party feeling is so divided, that if they made the theatre a political arena, the house would become a battle field, and they would call forth as much antagonism as applause.

4866. Do you think managers would be as shy of politics if the Lord Chamberlain's censorship were withdrawn?—Practically, I believe the censorship is null for the west-end theatres.

4867. Do you think that the general performance of burlesques has tended in any way to depreciate the public taste for legitimate drama?—I think it has interfered with it; it operates in various ways; it operates on the actors, for they are injured by the practice of playing in burlesque, and fitting themselves for it; and it tends to introduce a lower class of actors; whatever does that, tends to deter a better class from the profession, or a class that would furnish better actors. Whatever deteriorates theatrical performances, by way of lowering the standard, injures the demand for a better class of plays, and vitiates the taste of the public pro tanto.

4868. Chairman.] Do first-rate actors not act in burlesque?—Only peculiar actors, like Mr. Robson, for instance; but acting in burlesque injures them all, I think. I do not mean to say such burlesque as used to be written formerly, where the actors required intelligence to speak their parts, but the present burlesque, which goes in for Nigger-dancing, punning, and singing, which merely requires a certain aptitude for grimacing, and a peculiar kind of activity.

4869. Mr. Du Cane.] Do you think that the style of burlesque has deteriorated very much within the last 20 years?—Yes, very much.

T. Taylor, Esq.

4870. The burlesques played now are inferior to Mr. Planché's, for instance?—Obviously.

4871. Do you think that the performances at music halls have had any effect on burlesque?—Pro tanto, they have operated to encourage the same kind of thing; the style of performance is the same as at the music halls.

4872. Mr. O'Beirne.] I gather from your evidence, that though you say the censorship is to some extent null, that observation applies to the west-end theatres?—Yes.

4873. Can you give any recommendation with regard to the manner in which the censorship might be made more effectual?—I am afraid I cannot. I conceive the inspection is kept as a rod, hanging up, to be used when necessary.

4874. Would you withdraw it?—No, I would keep it in terrorem.

4875. You think that the existing powers might be useful?—Yes.

4876. They are sufficient, you think?—They are sufficient, as far as I know.

4877. You cannot suggest any improvement?—I have no practical suggestion to offer on that point.

4878. Will you tell us what was the precise operation, in your mind, of the patent for the old Royal theatres?—By reserving a particular class of theatre for a particular class of performance it made necessary a company that was capable of giving that kind of performance; it was an object of ambition to an actor to belong to such a company; when he once belonged to it he remained a member of it, and had a certain social status as well as a business one; is created an aristocracy of the profession. Men of education entered the profession, and were regularly trained up to it in country theatres with a view of entering one of those great London theatres; their position was then secured for life, and they did not change from one theatre to another. At present there is no such thing; the different companies are perpetually fluctuating; the practice is to make up a company of one or two good actors and a lot of sticks; it is exceedingly difficult to get any play, which involves any number of good characters, well acted in any theatre in London; I speak without exception.

4879. Mr. Miller.] You are an advocate for keeping up the system of licensing both to theatres and to music halls?—Yes.

4880. Could you tell the Committee what description of license you would give to each?—It would all turn on the question whether you are to extend the power of giving theatrical entertainments to music halls.

4881. Would you recommend that that should be done?—I should not recommend it, but at the same time I do not believe, having regard to the present state of things, it would do any great harm.

4882. Supposing it were done would you give them the privilege, which they now enjoy, of setting down the audience to eat and drink during the performance?—It appears to me that that involves the whole question. If music halls are to be turned into theatres, cadit quæstio; if they are to get the power of giving dramatic representations it is to be in combination with this smoking, eating and drinking. I do not think the combination would be wholesome, but at the same time I do not think it would operate in the way of direct depreciation of the quality of the entertainments at the theatres. Still it would tend downwards, because the caterers for such places are, generally speaking, of a lower class than the managers of theatres, and they would probably cater for even lower tastes. Again, no respectable woman of education, I assume, would go to such places as music halls. But ladies are the great staple audience of theatres, and they are the great restraint in matters of taste and propriety, and at any place opened as a theatre to which ladies could not resort, there would, I think, be a tendency to degradation or deterioration in the performances.

4883. But, taking all the circumstances into consideration, would you recommend that a license should be granted to the music halls, and that they should have the power of performing dramatic pieces, with the continual drinking that now goes on?—I should not recommend it.

4884. Will you inform the Committee what privileges you would grant to the music halls, and what license you would give to them?—I have not looked to that question; I have looked only to the one part that is immediately before you, namely, to dramatic performances; I have formed no idea of what performances should be allowed or prohibited.

4885. But, at all events, you would make a distinction between the license granted to theatres and the license granted to music halls?—I should. But I hope I am understood as speaking from my notions of the indirect influence of such a distinction, rather than from any notions of its direct influence.

4887. Chairman.] Should you not say that that was rather the case in England than on the Continent?—The only places on the Continent where theatrical performances are given with such accompaniments, and where the companies are at all good, are the summer theatres at the German watering places; in France, I believe, there is no such place; the cafés chantants are simply for singing.

4888. But there is a rather high class of theatrical performance in some of the German summer theatres, is there not?—Yes; I have seen them, many years ago, not lately; and I dare say it is so. Of course, we must look to the habits of the population; and the habits of the German population are very sober, and comparatively refined. Smoking is their universal habit; they smoke in the regular theatres; and as many of the people in the gardens would be drinking wine or coffee as beer, the chances are it would be a perfectly sober audience.

4889. They would be able to appreciate the performance and attend to it?—Yes, they would; the German people are different from the English, and the circumstances that would be unfavourable to the one, would not necessarily be unfavourable to the other.

4890. Do you belong to the Dramatic Authors' Society?—Yes.

4891. How many authors belong to that society?—The secretary would be able to tell you; perhaps 50 or 60.

4892. Is the petition before the Committee signed signed by conspicuous members of the society?—Some of the conspicuous members of the society are there. Mr. Boucicault is not a member; there are six or seven of the conspicuous members of the society who sign.

4893. Do those names, so far as you see, embrace the chief of the dramatic authors?—Some of them are highly respectable.

4894. But others are left out who are as important as those whose names are contained in the petition, I suppose?—Yes, certainly.

4895. Have you seen the petition?—Yes, I saw it last year. T. Taylor, Esq. 7 May 1866.

4896. The petition is this: "That your petitioners have found that the existing legislation concerning theatres operates as a restriction upon their industry, while it has not in any manner supported or elevated dramatic literature." You do not think it is a restriction on their industry?—I do not think so. There is no man capable of writing good pieces who cannot find ample employment, so far as I know.

4897. Have you anything further to add to your evidence?—I think not.

Horace Wigan, Esq., recalled; and further Examined.

4898. Mr. Locke.] Do you wish to explain a previous answer of yours?—Yes. An answer which is reported here, in reply to Question 4738, which was asked by the Honourable Member, Mr. Clay: "Do you know any instance, in any theatre where those ladies have been allowed to act without receiving any salary?—You put a question to me that I should have very great difficulty in replying to without throwing stones at my neighbours; but I have heard that theatrical managers have received sums of money to allow ladies to appear." What I meant by that was that I was not in possession of particular knowledge, and that I could hardly be called on to propagate scandal which I only knew as part of the chronique scandaleuse. I am not, in fact, in possession of any such positive knowledge; and all I meant was that I did not wish to repeat what I had heard. There is some information that I wish to tender to the Committee with regard to the subsidies to the French theatres. It has been said that those theatres do not pay, but the French theatres do not receive the subsidy for that purpose, but for the purpose of maintaining art; the Théâtre Français and the Odéon are nurseries for art, and the Government subsidizes them for the purpose of supporting the institution called the Conservatoire as a nursery for art. The aspirant for dramatic honours goes up on a certain day, when there is a concours, and says, "I wish to act and qualify for the Théâtre Français in the Conservatoire." They examine him in certain things, so as to be able to judge of his fitness, and they say, "We will take you"; then he is entitled to a salary of 60 francs a month, which is paid by the Government; or he is boarded, lodged, and clothed, if he is a musical aspirant. I believe that the extreme probationary term is three or four years. If he shows no disposition for gaining a prize, he is excluded; but if he goes up for one, then, on gaining a first-class prize, he is, as a matter of right, entitled to three appearances at the Théâtre Français, which is subsidized for the purpose; and then, if he stands his ground, he is entitled to a salary. If he gets a second prize, he is entitled to perform at the Odéon, and also to a small engagement. So that the French Government, while it gives the liberty of the theatres (though not to a greater extent than we do here), also fosters art, and is continually draughting into the profession a number of competent men. Fechter, Got, Regnier, and Sanson, were all pupils of the Conservatoire. The French Government, by the policy of subsidizing the theatres, keeps those places as nurseries for art.

4899. Chairman.] In fact, they apply the principle of competitive examination to acting?—Yes, they have competitive examination for acting; the pupils are maintained at the Government expense during the probationary course, and they are constantly turning out well-qualified actors, and they maintain a fixed standard of art. H. Wigan, Esq.

4900. Mr. Du Cane.] You mean to say, that it is a matter of perfect indifference whether it is a paying concern or not?—Yes, quite so; the Government does not look at it in that light at all.

4901. Mr. Locke.] But suppose it is not a paying concern, do you not think that would show that the taste of the public in France has somewhat deteriorated?—I do not think so.

4902. Or, at all events, that they do not care about the performances at the Théâtre Français, and that they would rather go to other theatres, such as the Palais Royal, which is full every night, and pays very well?—The taste of the Paris public for many years has been changing very much as it is here; they no longer like or care to see Molière or Racine, they prefer the modern style of piece; but the Théâtre Français is a school, and from the very fact of their turning out good actors the other theatres are obliged to compete with them.

4903. You think that a school is necessary?—No, not necessary, but highly desirable.

4904. You think that it has a good effect?—The best possible effect.

4905. It produces very much better actors than theatrical free trade, you think?—Yes, I think that the French actors are incomparably superior to ours.

4906. Lord Eustace Cecil.] You think that it is one of the duties of a Government to elevate the taste of the public?—I should conceive that it was the duty of a Government to foster art in every way.

4907. Mr. Locke.] Have they anything of the sort in Italy with regard to singing?—I believe so.

4908. We have an academy for music in London?—Yes; and music has advanced very much since its establishment.

4909. Chairman.] Are you acquainted with the Austrian system?—No.

4910. There is a State theatre there, like the Théâtre Français, is there not?—I have heard so.

4911. Have you heard whether the actors receive pensions from the State there?—I have heard so; just as at the Théâtre Français, but I cannot tell.

4912. Can you tell us anything with regard to the country theatres; you have visited them much, have you not?—Yes, some years ago.

H. Wigan, Esq.

7 May 1866.

I have been in London now for 12 years; but whenever I have a holiday, I always go, if in the country, to the theatres, and see how they work; but you cannot do better than inquire of one of the most respectable theatrical agents. I can only speak as an occasional spectator.

4913. Can you tell the Committee how the system of licensing works in the country?—The country theatres are licensed by the local magistrates.

4914. Have you ever heard of any caprice on the part of local magistrates with regard to the licensing of theatres in the country?—No; I have heard (but I am afraid it is not an instance in point) that in Scotland when the Prince's Theatre in Glasgow was about to be licensed, there was a very strong opposition, and the lessee boasted that he took the Act of Parliament in his pocket, and compelled the magistrate to grant the license; at all events, he obtained his license.

4915. Have you ever heard of difficulties on the part of lessees in obtaining licenses in any of the provincial towns?—Yes; I think there was a difficulty some time ago at Ramsgate, but they did obtain their license ultimately.

4916. Can you tell the Committee the circumstances?—No, I cannot, but they are reported.

4917. You do not remember on what ground it was objected to?—It was bigotry, I think.

4918. Does it lie within the discretion of the magistrates whether they will allow a theatre to be opened or not?—I am not lawyer enough to know; but my impression is, that they have no such discretion; I think, that if a person gives proper security, the granting of the license is compulsory.

4919. Have you ever had an interest in a provincial theatre?—Never.

4920. Mr. Miller.] Can you draw any comparison between the effect of a license granted within the Lord Chamberlain's province and a magistrate's license?—I think it would be highly desirable that the licenses should all come from one officer, and for this reason, that a bench of magistrates are a changeable body.

4921. If a central officer in London (say, the Lord Chamberlain) were to grant licenses for the country, do you think it would improve the drama in the country?—I do not think that the question of the improvement of the drama arises thereon at all, because all the pieces in the country are under the Lord Chamberlain's censorship, though the licenses for the theatres are not.

4922. Then what advantage would there be in removing the licensing from the magistrates to the Lord Chamberlain?—It might be less capricious.

4924. Lord Eustace Cecil.] Would you have a system of central inspectors, and a system of inspectorship in the provinces, or how would you provide for knowing whether a theatre was building in a particular locality?—According to my view, no such matter would arise, because I am a free-trader. I contend now that in London, where there is one officer, free trade does exist. I do not believe, if I were to build a theatre to-morrow, with proper regulations, that the Lord Chamberlain could or would even dare refuse to grant a license; it would be a matter of course. And I presume that if the same officer had the superintendence of the country theatres, it would be the same thing; at all events, I think, it ought.

4925. He must have somebody to supervise the theatres in the provinces?—Yes, he must have a proper staff.

4926. He would require a large staff?—He must have the requisite staff, of course.

4927. You would have assistant inspectors for the provinces, under the central inspector in London?—Yes, to say that such a theatre is properly constructed, safe, and so on; and then there should be no question about the license.

4928. You would not allow the municipal or country magistrates to have any voice in the matter?—None; it should be unrestricted.

4929. Colonel Sturt.] Would you not propose the same system for Scotland and Ireland?—Yes.

Nelson Lee, Esq., called in; and Examined.

N. Lee, Esq.

4930. You are Manager of the City of London Theatre?—I am; I have been manager of Sadler's Wells Theatre, lessee of the Pavilion Theatre, lessee of the Standard Theatre, and I have had the City of London Theatre for 18 years.

4931. So that you have been for many years connected with the theatres?—Yes, I had a travelling theatre previous to that, and I went through provinces.

4932. You are also connected with the Crystal Palace?—Yes, on festive occasions.

4933. On these occasions do you arrange the performances?—Yes, I arrange the amusements.

4934. Could you tell the Committee something about the time when you had a travelling theatre?—Yes, that was 29 years ago.

4935. What kind of license did you have for that travelling theatre?—I had no license; I used to visit the different towns, and wait on the magistrates to obtain their permission.

4936. You took a company round with you?—I took a company round with me, and remained sometimes a month and sometimes six weeks, at such towns as Reading, Oxford, Dartford, Ealing Green, and places where there were no theatres.

4937. Can you tell the Committee how many actors you took round with you?—I took a regular company. When I became lessee of the theatre, during the time I had that theatre, I used to close my own theatre and sublet it for the summer, and take my own company.

4938. Has that system gone out of fashion?—Yes; there are travelling companies who go round, but there never was any so large as mine.

4939. What kind of license would now be necessary for a travelling company?—I have heard lately that parties performing have been summoned before the magistrate and fined, but I avoided that by obtaining a distinct permission before I commenced.

4940. From the bench of magistrates?—Yes.

4941. Have you ever had cases where that permission was refused?—I think not.

4942. Used

4942. Used there to be a discussion on the point?—I always had very strong credentials when I left a town. The magistrates used to give me letters speaking of the respectability of my company. I had them from clergymen, magistrates, mayors, and so on; and I used to send them before I went, and I was never refused.

4943. Do you know much about the state of the drama in the provinces; has the taste for dramatic performances increased in the country?—I have been confined to London for many years now; therefore, I can tell you little of the state of the drama in the provinces.

4944. What kind of pieces are generally performed at the City of London Theatre now?—It varies; I consider the principle of my theatre is for domestic drama; and after sensational pieces became the vogue I resorted to them, and found them the most profitable.

4945. How many new pieces do you produce in a year?—When I am in full swing, I should say 10; now the railroad is coming through me, and I have sublet my theatre.

4946. Have you found a difficulty in procuring pieces fit for performance at your theatre?—Recently I have. There are no fresh sensations to be got; you cannot throw a man off a rock every day.

4947. Have you ever been in the position that you have had five or six good pieces offered you, and you did not know which to choose?—Never. I had at one time the late Mr. John Wilkins on a salary, and he wrote one piece a month. I have several of his plays which were never acted; he was an excellent author, and if he had lived he would have been a very first-class man.

4948. Have you paid as good prices for pieces lately as formerly?—Yes, but our remuneration at the East end of London has not been very great; but still we have paid a good sum for pieces.

4949. Now, with regard to the taste of your audience there; have you ever had any trouble with the Lord Chamberlain?—Never; I have always received the greatest courtesy from him. If there was a line that was immoral or bad, it was always cut out; and if there was any question about its being cut out, he sent an officer to see if it was attended to.

4950. Have you ever noticed any capricious decisions on his part?—No, not at all. If the word "God" is used, I generally cut it out myself, or anything political I always cut out.

4951. Do you remember cases where you have felt annoyed at erasures being made?—Never.

4952. Have you ever sent in a piece for the Lord Chamberlain's supervision that has ever been refused?—No, never.

4953. Now, supposing that the pieces were not passed by the Lord Chamberlain, would you rely on your audience checking every allusion or immorality that should be cut out; would they stand anything that the Lord Chamberlain would cut out: would the public be as particular as the Lord Chamberlain?—No, certainly not.

4954. You do not think that some of those things that might be cut out by the Lord Chamberlain would so offend the taste of the public that they would insist on its being stopped themselves?—No, certainly not.

4955. Then, as the proprietor of a theatre, are you against the continuance of the system of licensing plays?—No, I think it is just. I am not against it by any means.

4956. Do you think it necessary?—Positively necessary. I think that many pieces would be played that would be very injurious if the licensing system were abolished.

4957. Your audience would not hoot an immoral piece off the stage, you think?—I think not.

4958. Would it rather draw an audience?—Sometimes it might.

4959. Are there many music halls in your neighbourhood that compete with the theatres?—Very many. There are some as low as a penny, twopence, or threepence.

4960. What are your own lowest prices at your theatre?—The prices are, gallery 3*d.*, pit 6*d.*, boxes 1*s.*, and reserved seats 1*s.* 6*d.*

4961. Do your galleries fill generally?—Yes.

4962. Have you found any difference in their filling since the music halls have become so fashionable?—Yes, a great difference.

4963. They do not fill so well now?—Certainly not.

4964. If a man has got 3*d.*, which would he prefer, a theatre or a music hall?—Tastes differ; if he likes his pipe he would go to a music hall.

4965. Is there any eating and drinking in your theatre?—Not any in the auditorium, nor is there any drink taken round the theatre, nor any smoking.

4966. Cannot they get beer in the gallery?—Yes, by going to a room at the back of the gallery which is used as a bar.

4967. Do they frequently drink much beer between the acts?—Not very much. I get a very trifling sum for it; it is so nominal that it is hardly worth mentioning.

4968. A man who wanted to drink would be more likely to go to a music hall?—Yes, there is more freedom about it. I have police regulations in the theatre, and there is no noise. Now, in music halls there is a general conversation going on during the performances; many do not care a pin about the performances.

4969. Have you been to some of those music halls in your neighbourhood?—Yes.

4970. Then you speak from personal experience?—Yes.

4971. What is the chief attraction in those music halls?—The chief attraction is the music, comic singing, and acrobatic performances.

4972. Have they ever tried, at the east end, semi-dramatic performances?—Yes, duologues.

4973. Spoken?—Yes, between two men.

4974. Have they been a favourite part of the performance?—I do not go often enough to say; generally I go when there are acrobatic performances, to see if it is worth engaging for my country fêtes and Societies' fêtes, and the nobilities' fêtes, which I get up in the summer.

4975. Would you see any objection to allowing dramatic performances at those music halls at the East end?—Yes, most unquestionably; it would be an injury to them, and bring ruin on them; and for the time being it would ruin the theatres.

4976. Do you think if the music halls had permission to perform pieces, they would do it?—They would endeavour to compete with the theatres, involve themselves in a world of expense, and not accomplish their object at last.

4977. Then you suppose that they would act in a foolish way?—Yes; in fact, I hear from several of the music-hall proprietors that they have no desire to perform pieces.

N. Lee, Esq.
7 May 1866.

4978. Then if they had the power granted to them, they would not necessarily do it, would they?—They would be obliged to do it if their neighbours did.

4979. Therefore they would ruin themselves in a body?—Yes, I seriously think so.

4980. As a theatrical manager, would you be afraid of ruined music halls?—I think it would degrade the drama, and do an injury in every way. I should be very sorry to see it.

4981. You think that if they were to act the same kind of pieces as you give at the City of London Theatre, it would degrade the drama?—It would do it an injury.

4982. In what way would it do it an injury?—Because there would be drinking, smoking, and eating, and the people could not pay attention to the context of the piece from the noise and buzz of gentlemen walking about at those places; the piece would be mutilated.

4983. And you think that would tend to spoil the acting?—Yes, I think so.

4984. Is your audience attentive?—Very attentive when there is a good piece being performed. I had a piece called "Waiting for the Verdict," that ran nearly a whole season; that was very profitable, and several pieces of the late John Wilkins are equally attractive. "Civilization" with Mr. Anderson in it. "Zenobia, Queen of Palmyra," and various other pieces of the kind.

4985. Are the audience at your theatre as attentive as a West-end audience, on the whole?—Not on the whole; I cannot say that.

4986. But there is much less conversation at your theatre than there is during the performance at the music halls?—Yes, certainly.

4987. Mr. Locke.] Do you think that the music halls would produce a class of pieces that would suit their audience, if they had the privilege of putting on the stage whatever they liked?—That I cannot answer. I should be very sorry to see it; it would not increase their attraction in any shape, because at the music halls drink is the chief object.

4988. But do you not consider if the music halls had the privilege they would merely produce that which would be attractive; is not that what you do yourself?—Certainly.

4989. Have you any reason to suppose that the proprietors of music halls would not do exactly the same?—They might.

4990. Do you think that they wish to ruin themselves?—No, I do not think so.

4991. It is not the desire of anybody to do that, is it?—But I have heard several of the music-hall proprietors say that they would rather be left alone; they do not wish to meddle with the theatres.

4992. They would not do it unless it suited their purpose, I suppose?—There are sufficient number of theatres in London; and if the music halls were allowed to perform dramatic pieces, there would be no difference between the two.

4993. You would rather have a monopoly?—I think music halls ought to be music halls, and theatres theatres; they have the advantage over theatres 20 per cent.

4994. But nobody is compelled by law to open either a theatre or a music hall?—Certainly not; but if they play pieces, and have drink too, they have an advantage over theatres.

4995. Would you prohibit drinking at your theatre, or would you like to have it?—Not under any circumstances.

4996. It would not be to your interest, perhaps?—If it was granted I would not have it; nobody could sit down in front of my stalls with drinking, eating, and smoking going on and listen to a serious piece; if you go to the Adelphi and see "Rip Van Winkle," you can hear a pin drop; or go to the Olympic and see the refined acting of Kate Terry, if anybody sitting next to you was even to speak a word, everybody would look round, and say "silence."

4997. Do you not think that acting such as that, in pieces such as those, would always command an audience who would not wish to eat, drink, and smoke at the same time?—Yes, it should do so; but there are some people who would have it, whether or not.

4998. But it would not be to your interest to have a certain number of people coming there to interrupt others, would it; it would be your wish to have your house filled by lovers of the drama?—Yes, but if the same play was being played at a music hall close by me, if they had the advantage of eating, drinking, and smoking, a great many would go there.

4999. They would like both things together, you think?—Yes.

5000. But still you would have enough for your own theatre, would you not?—That has got to be tried.

5001. After all, it comes to this: that you do not like to have those places giving dramatic performances, because they may interfere with you?—I am not so selfish as that; I am speaking for the general good, and for them as much as myself.

5002. Are there not a great many persons who like eating, smoking, and drinking, who would be benefited, and somewhat elevated in taste, by having better performances put before them than the music halls are now allowed to place on the stage; would not it do them more good to see a vaudeville than a man jumping about with his face blacked?—During the time I am speaking Hamlet's soliloquy, perhaps a man asks for potatoes and a kidney.

5003. Even if Hamlet's soliloquy did not help him to digest his kidney, it would not do him any harm, would it?—They have got sufficient; they have got ballets.

5004. But do you think that they should be allowed to perform ballets?—I have no objection; it is part and parcel of my living. I have written hundeds of pantomimes; one season I had them played in nearly every theatre in London, in the country, America, and Australia. I was induced to stop writing for other London theatres, thinking it would be a great benefit to my own theatre; it had the reverse effect. I did not stop for the purpose of enabling other authors to get a living; I stopped, because I thought that people would come to my theatre more. When I did it for various theatres, they used to go and see them; and then say "we will go and see his own, for that must be better still"; and then when I applied to be re-instated at other theatres, they had got other authors, perhaps, better than myself, so I have not written so many lately.

5005. Then if music halls did ballets, you would get a fresh start, would you not?—It would be against human nature to say that I should refuse it.

5006. You have no objection to ballet then?—None whatever; particularly if they were pantomime ballets.

5007. You would furnish the music halls with materials if they wanted it?—Certainly.

5008. Then it comes to a matter of self-interest, does it?—I am not so selfish as all that. I only say what I think for the moment. I would waive all my self-interest to hear that it is not granted.

5009. What, besides ballets and pantomimes, should be done at music halls, do you think?—It is only sketches; I would not write a complete pantomime for a music hall.

5010. Farce would do very well there, would it not?—No, I think not.

5011. Why not; not a broad farce?—No; there are plenty of broad songs.

5012. Have they broad songs?—I never heard them.

5013. And a broad farce, you think, would not do?—It would be very broad I am thinking; when a party has had a few glasses, any joke, with the slightest double entendre, goes down.

5014. They have doubles entendres sometimes on your stage, have they not?—Yes; but the audience are too refined to notice it.

5015. Have you such doubles entendres as your audience cannot understand?—They let them pass; they would make no joke upon them.

5016. Your double entendre is above the heads of the audience, is it?—Perhaps it is above their intellectual powers.

5017. I suppose you have a select few in the boxes who do understand?—I am very careful in that particular; I do not have many.

5018. Mr. Du Cane.] Do you wish to see the censorship of the Lord Chamberlain continued?—Most unquestionably; I have always received every courtesy from him, and at the same time he has cut out those matters that I conceived myself, on reflection, are very justly cut out.

5019. You think that it has had a beneficial effect with regard to the morality of the pieces?—Yes, I think so.

5020. I suppose you never introduced, on your own stage, any performances similar to those given at music halls; acrobat, or Ethiopian performances?—Yes, in pantomimes I have.

5021. Do you think that the music halls, in your neighbourhood, could afford to put on the stage the same style of play as you do, with as good scenery and as good a cast of actors?—No, certainly not; they have not got the convenience, and the expenses would overwhelm them. It would destroy their character as music halls, and they would have to launch into great expenses.

5022. But I thought you rather dreaded their competition in that way; you seemed to think that both kinds of places might represent the same kind of play?—No, I was speaking about ballet sketches and pantomimic sketches, which are very light affairs, occupying about four people.

5023. Have you ever, at music halls in your neighbourhood, heard indecent or immoral songs?—No, not particularly in my neighbourhood; but it has been communicated to me that there have been indecent songs at various places; they are published, and you can read them.

5024. Colonel Sturt.] Do you think that you have suffered, in a pecuniary point of view, by the establishment of music halls in your neighbourhood?—Certainly; Fridays and Saturdays we used to have a great quantity of Jews, and since the establishment of music halls the Jews, who are passionately fond of music, go there, and I cannot blame them, for they have what they like; but I have suffered in that way very materially.

5025. Your prices are rather lower than the prices at the West-end theatres, are they not?—Half as much.

5027. Would you object to a pantomime or burlesque being given at a music hall, provided the number of persons on the stage were limited to two or three?—I think I should have no objection to that.

5028. You would allow smoking, eating, and drinking to go on?—Burlesques I should have a greater objection to than pantomime and ballet, anything of speaking brings it more to a theatre.

5029. But you would not object to a pantomime or a ballet being given at a music hall provided the number of performers was not more than three?—They do duologues now.

5030. Would you object to three?—It is cutting it very fine.

5031. Would you object to four?—Yes, I should object to that, they could do a great many farces with three or four.

5032. But you would not object to ballets?—No, I do not think there is the slightest objection to ballets so long as there is no speaking.

5033. Mr. Clive.] We had Mr. Boucicault examined here two days ago, and he said this, "I am rather inclined to think that if the music halls were allowed to give (and already all their entertainments are illegal every night) a better class of performance, it would raise the taste of those persons, as it has already done, to a certain extent, and the theatres themselves would be benefited by it. All the large fortunes that have been made by theatrical managers during the last 10 years in London and the principal provincial towns have been mainly owing to the music halls that have catered for them." You see that Mr. Boucicault is of opinion that the music halls contributed to the welfare of the theatres by catering for them and raising the taste of the people who go there?—I do not know what he means by "catering" for them.

5034. He means by bringing up the public taste, "feeding" them is his expression?—I beg leave most respectively to differ from him.

5035. Mr. Clay.] I think you have stated that you have never heard any indecent or immoral song at the music halls?—No.

5036. Could you send us any witness here who has?—No, I should not like to make it my business to do so. The song books are published.

5037. I suppose you have never heard from anybody whom you would trust that they had heard indecent or immoral songs at music halls?—No, I never have.

5038. Now, suppose it was left entirely to you to draw a line of distinction between music halls and theatres, what would your conditions be; what would you allow and what would you prohibit?—It requires some reflection: I could draw out a draft of what I think the music halls should do. What the theatre does is fully established. The music halls now do selections, comic singing, acrobatic performances, and they might do sketch ballets, and so on.

5039. Would you allow them, instead of having selections from operas, which makes a sort of concert, to perform the operas themselves, with dresses?—No; I should think that would be interfering, body and soul, with the theatres: we could not live if that was done; it is quite out of the question.

5040. Does not it occur to you that the prohibition makes it more difficult for the music halls to live; live and let live being a good maxim which cuts both ways?—To counteract that prohibition they get 20 per cent. by the drink, that is an enormous qualification.

5041. Do you believe it possible to draw any line between music halls and theatres, with regard to the performances which should be permitted at both, which will not lead to constant disputes and litigations, the music halls naturally wishing to go beyond the line, and the theatres wishing to repel them even from coming exactly up to that line?—I think, with the volubility of evidence that you have had, you will be able to draw a line.

5042. But no one as yet having pretended to say that it would be possible to draw a line which would not lead to litigation and disputes, I ask whether you can suggest any line of demarcation which would not lead to constant disputes between music halls and theatres?—It would be a very difficult thing for me to do; I should not like to undertake that.

5043. Chairman.] Do you wish to add anything to your evidence?—No.

H. J. Turner, Esq., called in; and Examined.

H. J. Turner, Esq.

5044. Chairman.] You are a Theatrical Agent, are you not?—I am.

5045. Can you tell the Committee what business that involves?—Receiving from managers their instructions with regard to what actors or actresses they require, and furnishing them with them.

5046. The managers let you know what kind of actors or actresses they require?—They do.

5047. You act between the two?—Yes.

5048. Do you act in the same way for the music halls?—Very rarely; sometimes I do.

5049. I suppose there is no man who is more acquainted with the general scale of the salaries of actors and actresses than you are?—I should say that few men are better acquainted with them than I am.

5050. Do you act for the provinces?—I act both for town and the provinces.

5051. Now, on the whole, have the salaries of actors risen or fallen within the last few years?—I should say, in the provinces they have risen from one-third to one-half.

5052. And there is a great demand for both actors and actresses, I suppose?—There is a great demand. I find a very great difficulty in supplying the managers, either in town or in the country, with the ladies and gentlemen they require.

5053. There is not any large number of unemployed actors or actresses, is there?—I think there are very few good actors or actresses unemployed.

5054. If there were many more theatres, would it be difficult to supply that larger number with actors and actresses?—I think it would.

5055. Do the numbers increase in the theatrical profession?—I should say not. There are a great many theatres built, but the numbers of the profession have not increased in the same ratio.

5056. Are there many actors taken away by the music halls?—There are a great many subordinate ones; young men who can sing a song. The payment is much better in music halls than in theatres.

5057. I presume that the establishment of those music halls has been very satisfactory to the theatres?—I should think that it is very unsatisfactory.

5058. Has it raised the salary of the performers? Not the general profession; only those who have attached themselves to the music halls.

5059. But it has lessened the number of actors, has it not?—Yes, it has lessened the number of actors.

5060. If it has lessened the number of actors, surely it has given more employment and more remunerative employment to those who remain over?—That state of things is not desirable, because many young men, instead of devoting themselves entirely to the profession, have been withdrawn from the theatres simply because they could get more money in the music halls, whereas otherwise they would have proceeded with their theatrical studies, and perhaps have matured into good actors and actresses.

5061. But taking the point of view of actors and actresses, it seems pretty certain that your view is, that the establishment of music halls has tended to raise the salaries of actors?—I am not certain that that has been the sole cause, but I know that since the music halls have been established the salaries of actors and actresses have increased.

5062. It has also diminished the number of actors, you say?—Yes, I think so.

5063. But generally, in a profession, is it not the fact that the fewer there are in it the more remunerative it is for those who are in it?—Generally it is so.

5064. If there were any employment that were to take away a number of gentlemen from the bar, would not that be satisfactory to those who remained?—It would require a very large number to be taken away from the bar to make it satisfactory to those who remained.

5065. In the same way, if a large number were taken away from theatres by music halls, would not it be satisfactory to those who remained in the profession?—Not altogether; I do not think the performances are so well given as if subordinate parts were entrusted to the hands of clever men, consequently it may operate to deteriorate the opinion entertained of the profession by the general public.

5066. As a matter of fact, whatever the result may be, the music halls are unpopular with actors and actresses, are they not?—I think so, generally.

5067. And in the profession generally it is considered rather a pity that those music halls have come so into fashion, is it not?—Yes.

5068. Would an actor go to a music hall for the the same salary as that for which he acts at a theatre?—I think not.

5069. Though the salary might be higher at a music hall, would that induce him to go?—To induce him to leave the theatre, the salary would have to be much higher, I think.

5070. You know, I suppose, that the salaries are better at music halls than at theatres?—I believe that they are very much better.

5071. So that it is a profitable employment to actors?—It is profitable to those who engage in it. They are not all actors; they are recruited, not simply from the stage, but any young man who can sing a good song obtains employment at the music halls.

5072. It is considered infra dig. for an actor to go to a music hall?—Certainly; the theatres are never recruited from music halls.

5073. It has been stated that Mr. Robson came from the Grecian Saloon?—The Grecian Saloon was a theatre at the time Mr. Robson was there.

5074. You know of no other cases?—No; but Mr. Robson's is scarcely a case in point.

5075. When was the Grecian Saloon a music hall?—There are two buildings; one in which concerts are given, and the theatre proper; at the theatre proper, the performances are carried on as in every other theatre.

5076. Are you aware that Miss Carlotta Leclercq sprung from the Grecian Music Hall?—I cannot think so; that is very unlikely. I knew her father many years ago; he was then in a theatre. I do not know that he ever left the theatre to go to a music hall. I should think she has been cradled in the profession.

5077. It is not correct then to say that Miss Carlotta Leclercq sprung up from a music hall?—It is very incorrect, I should say.

5078. Or Miss Marie Wilton?—Her father was a provincial actor, and she was also one; she was cradled in the profession, and she played children's parts until she came to womanhood, and then became an actress. I have heard (though I do not know) that she had been engaged in the ballet somewhere or other.

5079. Have you ever heard that she was said to have sprung from the Sunderland Music Hall?—No.

5080. Now, generally, do you think that the music halls supply theatres with actors, and that they can be considered at all as a school for actors?—I should think it impossible that they could constitute a school for actors.

5081. You think that the music halls would spoil actors rather than otherwise?—I am quite sure of it.

5082. Why?—I have always noticed in the performances that the songs given have been of a low order.

5083. Is the taste of the audience at music halls different from what it is at theatres?—Essentially so.

5084. What would constitute the chief difference?—Those who go to theatres go to listen to poesy in the language of our best authors, whereas those who go to the music halls go to gratify their sensual tastes in eating, drinking, and smoking; and it is incompatible with eating, drinking, and smoking, listening to a good author.

5085. You think that the public go to theatres to listen to the best authors?—Yes.

5086. Do they not sometimes go to listen to the worst authors?—They may be compelled if it is part of the programme.

5087. But sometimes at a theatre the audience is not always in proportion to the merit of the author?—I think that may be the case among the less intelligent portions.

5088. I speak not only of the West-end theatres, but of the East-end?—I do not know much about the East-end theatres.

5089. But do you think that the highest class drama, in a literary point of view, draws the best houses?—I think it does not.

5090. Then they do not go to see the best author?—In a modern drama it must be accompanied by sensational effects.

5091. Frequently they go to see most beautiful scenery, the spectacle?—Yes, in common with the other attractions.

5092. But if they had the same thing at the music halls, where would the difference be between them and the theatres?—If you could make the performance at the Alhambra or any other music hall as good as that at the theatre there would be no difference between them, but that is impossible. In the first place, if you were to increase the number of theatres you would not find actors to supply the demand.

5093. But if the salaries rose in amount, and the profession in public estimation, would not that increase the number of actors?—It might, in the course of years, but not at present.

5094. We have had it in evidence that more men of education join the profession than did formerly; in your opinion is that so?—It is my impression that it is so.

5095. Then how do you account for the diminution in the number?—I do not know how to account for it. I think a greater number of men of education are more desirous of joining the profession than formerly. I have had many who have been engaged in the legal profession, and officers of the army, very desirous of engaging in the theatrical profession.

5096. The total number who enter the profession is less, but the number of educated men is greater; is that so?—I think so.

5097. But if that is the case, you cannot say that the theatrical profession is going out of favour, can you?—I think it is increasing in favour.

5098. Notwithstanding the competition of the music halls?—Yes, the theatres prosper.

5099. Therefore you have got no evidence, as yet, that the music halls are acting in a way such as to make the theatrical profession degenerate; in fact, the theatrical profession is not degenerating you say?—I think that the style of pieces is not so good as it used to be.

5100. But, generally speaking, the profession of an actor is as high as it was?—Socially considered, he is infinitely higher than he used to be.

5101. Then, so far as any practical result on actors goes, the establishment of music halls has not done harm?—Yes, I think it does do harm; it draws people to witness an inferior performance who otherwise would attend theatres to witness a superior performance.

5102. I understood you to say that the remuneration of actors is at a better point now than it has ever been?—In the provinces it is, certainly.

5103. Not in London?—I do not think that there have been much alteration in the London salaries.

H. J. Turner, Esq.

5104. It is not worse in London, is it?—I think, not worse. I think the payments among the subordinates are, perhaps, a shade worse; but in the better class (not stars, but experienced actors) the salaries are very much better.

5105. What would be the effect, in your judgment, on those who avail themselves of your services, of throwing open the music halls for theatrical performances?—That I should be overwhelmed with applications, and unable to meet the demand. A very inferior class of men would go to the music halls to sustain business which they could not sustain.

5106. If that would create such a demand for their services, would it not be welcomed by all actors?—They would not be anxious to go to the music halls.

5107. The result would be this, that the music hall managers would come to you, and ask for actors, but the actors would not be inclined to go?—Established good actors would not be inclined to go.

5108. It would cut off the future supply, by taking off the younger men, if the established actors would not go?—Yes, it has already done that to some extent, as I have before explained.

5109. Would not their going be a question of salary?—I think not even that would induce them to go.

5110. They would not go for even double the salary, you think?—That might induce some of them to go, but the number would be very few.

5111. Is it generally thought in the theatrical profession that there are not sufficient theatres?—I am scarcely prepared to answer that question. I think, as the population of London increases, it will be necessary to build new theatres.

5112. Do you think that there is a greater number anxious to go to theatres than can be accommodated by the present theatres?—If you could imagine the population being stationary, perhaps there are enough; but it is not so; there must be an increased number of theatres.

5113. Do the actors who come to you and ask you to find them an appointment at the London theatres on the stage, say that they would have greater opportunities if there were more theatres?—No, I think not.

5114. I suppose, on the whole, you have seldom got any large number of actors seeking for places?—Very seldom; good actors in the provinces hesitate to accept London places, even at double the salaries that they would have had formerly.

5115. In fact, good actors are snapped up?—Yes, good actors are snapped up.

5116. Are they more anxious to act in London than in the provinces?—They are not as anxious to perform in London as they used to be since the patents were taken from the two large theatres.

5117. They do not mind so much where they act?—No, so long as they get good business and a good salary.

5118. I thought you said that they did not care so much for salary as they cared for acting to an intelligent public?—They do like to act to an intelligent public, but they like to be paid for it.

5119. Then what is their great objection to the music halls, if they act to an intelligent public?—The actor supposes that the music-hall public is not quite so intelligent.

5120. Do you think that a man who smokes is less intelligent than a man who does not smoke?—I think it is impossible that a man can eat, drink, and smoke, and pay attention to the words so well; perhaps he is discussing the qualities of his glass of grog.

5121. But is not a man who smokes as well able to appreciate a piece as a man who is not smoking?—It is just possible, but not if it is accompanied by drinking.

5122. Mr. Clive.] You have said that you thought the number of actors could not be increased for many years?—I think it would take some years if you increase the number of theatres, or convert the music halls into places of dramatic entertainment; it would be some years before there would be a sufficient number of men to fulfil the demand.

5123. Why is that?—Already we have a difficulty in finding men of intelligence and experience to fill the situations.

5124. I thought you said that officers and barristers, and so on, were anxious to become actors?—Yes.

5125. Then how does the difficulty arise?—It is not always the case that they are capable.

5126. But if the public at the music halls would like to hear them, why should they not?—I do not think they would go to the music halls to feather their wings there.

5127. Why not, if they had a good salary?—I never heard one of them desire that.

5128. Suppose the music halls could give dramatic entertainments, is there any reason why that class of gentlemen should not feather their wings there?—I do not think that the music-hall proprietors would care much about making those places a school for such actors; they would rather desire to get men of experience and talent, than to convert their music halls into schools for the young seekers of the profession.

5129. Mr. Locke.] When you say smoking, eating, and drinking make attention difficult, I presume you mean drinking to excess?—No, I do not; I mean that drinking at all would divert a man's attention from the due consideration and enjoyment of a play.

5130. Now, the Right Honourable Chairman of the Committee is drinking at this moment, and we have most of us had a glass of sherry during the day, do you think we are unfit to discharge our duties?—You place me in a very awkward position, but I think nothing of the kind.

5131. Does not it depend on the quantity; if a man has a glass of wine, or a glass of brandy and water, can that interfere with him in such a way as to prevent his enjoying a reasonable performance?—I think it is very possible that the Chairman was thinking more of his sherry than of the question you were putting to me.

5132. Then you are wrong, for he stopped drinking his sherry on purpose to remind me of the fact when I put you the question; but you must mean, in fact, that some men drink too much?—It involves other points; he must call for his cigar or his grog, and it may not be good, and he might express his disapprobation to the waiter, and then he must discuss it with his companion; all those things divert his attention.

5133. That is an unfortunate thing for him, is it not?—Yes.

5134. But if he chooses to see a play, and have his attention now and then diverted, and if after all he is amused and sees a good play, do you not think it is all the better for him?—Yes, if it is a good good play it is all the better for him; but I do not think it is all the better for the drama.

5135. But it is better for all who go to music halls under those circumstances, and that means thousands of people, does it not?—Thousands, no doubt.

5136. Are there more persons going to music halls than there are going to theatres?—Perhaps so, the number of music halls being greater.

5137. Then if better performances are now to be given at those places those people's tastes would be improved rather than deteriorated, would they not?—If the performances were better.

5138. Then what is your reason for saying that the performances ought not to be better; that is to say, that they should not have an opportunity of performing pieces of the stage?—I think it would be impossible to supply them with actors sufficient in number to meet this new demand.

5139. That is the ground you put it on, is it: that the music halls could not find actors to meet the demand?—In addition to that, they must entirely change the nature of their entertainments; they must cease to be music halls and become theatres.

5140. Suppose they did?—I have no objection, if they become theatres, and come under the same restrictions as the theatres are now under.

5141. But if what we are talking about is the benefit of the public, not the benefit of the keepers of music halls or theatres either, what objection can you have if those performances would have the effect of amusing the people and improving their tastes?—I do not think there is any objection to there being a sufficient number of theatres; but if the music halls generally were opened in that way, the number would be so overwhelming that they would tend to ruin each other.

5142. There would be too much competition, you think?—There would be too many people in the field.

5143. Then you are a monopolist, are you?—No, I hope not.

5144. Then what are you?—There should be a sufficient number, but if you were to throw open the whole of the music halls I think there would be more than sufficient.

5145. You think there would be too much of a good thing; you have no other objection?—No, not if they were conducted on the same principles as the theatres are conducted.

5146. Colonel Sturt.] You have never acted professionally in obtaining engagements for actors and actresses for the music halls have you?—Yes, I have acted for the music halls.

5147. Do you continue to act for them now?—Only rarely, because there are agents whose special business it is.

5148. Is it not the fact that the salaries are generally higher in music halls than in theatres?—They are much higher, I think.

5149. Did you say that you thought the competition of music halls had raised the salaries of actors and actresses at the theatres?—It may partially tend to that.

5150. You do not attribute the great rise in the salaries at the theatres to the action of the music halls?—No, I think not. I think that is to be attributed to the scarcity of actors and actresses.

5151. Would you object to the music halls being licensed, and allowed to continue the eating, drinking, and smoking, provided the number of persons on the stage was limited to three or four, say; for instance, to the performing of a burlesque with only three people on the stage at once?—I would object to their giving dramatic performances.

5152. Would you object to their giving dramatic performances if they were limited in that way; say a burlesque or a pantomime, provided that the number of persons on the stage at one time was limited?—Then it is impossible to give a pantomime with three people.

5153. What is the possible limit?—From 16 to 20 persons.

5154. Impossible or not, would you object to a burlesque being performed at the music halls, with a limit of three persons on the stage at the same time?—The same remark as applies to the drama generally applies to burlesque.

5155. You object to that?—I do object to it.

5156. Chairman.] Have you ever seen the performance of Mr. and Mrs. Howard Paul?—Yes.

5157. That is a burlesque, is it not; it is called a drawing-room burlesque?—Yes, I think they call it so.

5158. Would you object to have that performance done at the music halls?—Yes.

5159. Why?—Because it would be subject to the same condition as other performances where eating, drinking, and smoking are going on.

5160. Would that hurt the public?—No; but it would hurt Mr. and Mrs. Howard Paul.

5161. But they would not go there if it hurt them, would they?—I think they would not go there to act at all.

5162. Then it would not do any harm to anybody?—Not if they did not go.

5163. Colonel Sturt.] Do you think that the Lord Chamberlain was wrong in licensing Mr. and Mrs. German Reed's performance?—I do not think that any harm arose from so excellent a performance.

5164. You do not think that that was inconsistent?—No, I do not think it was consistent, because that license was given under different conditions.

5165. Mr. O'Beirne.] Will you tell me whether, in coming to your conclusion with regard to the question between music halls and theatres, you have looked at it as a matter affecting the interest of the managers of theatres, or as affecting the interest of the public?—Both.

5166. How would the interests of the managers of theatres suffer?—Because it must necessarily withdraw a certain number of the frequenters of the theatres from the theatres.

5167. You think that the performance of dramatic pieces would increase the audience of the music halls by drawing there some of the audience that now go to the theatre?—Yes.

5168. That would not depreciate the audience at the music halls in any way, would it?—It would increase the number.

5169. And it would improve their character, would it not?—No doubt it would, if the performances were good and well conducted.

5170. But you say that it would affect managers, by withdrawing some of their audience to the music halls?—Yes.

5171. And that the audience of a theatre is of a higher standard usually than the audience of a music hall?—Yes.

5172. Therefore the result would be that the audience at the music halls would be improved?—Yes, undoubtedly, in number. It would depend entirely on the nature of the performances ances at the music halls. If they gave as good an entertainment at a music hall as they do at a theatre, then, I say, convert it into a theatre.

H. J. Turner, Esq.

5173. Have you any reason for saying that they could not give a good dramatic entertainment at the music halls?—I say that they are totally unfit for the representation of dramatic entertainments.

5174. Do you mean with regard to the stage?—Yes, it is not capacious enough.

5175. Does not your experience tell you that, where there is a large stage like that at the Alhambra, any necessary fittings or apparatus can be easily supplied?—No doubt.

5176. Which is the more difficult to get up, the scenic mounting of such an entertainment as the ballet shown at the Alhambra now, or the scenic mounting necessary for an ordinary drama?—I should think that it involved a larger expense to prepare such a ballet as that at the Alhambra.

5177. Therefore there could be no sort of difficulty in getting up ordinary dramatic performances there?—Exactly.

5178. Then do you think that those dramatic performances would not be patronised by the public, or is it simply that you object to eating, drinking, and smoking in the auditorium?—That is my principal reason, and also the difficulty of getting fit exponents of good language.

5179. What is the reason you think you could not get them?—Because I always feel a difficulty in getting them for the theatres.

5180. You think that the demand is greater than the supply?—I do, for good actors and actresses.

5181. You do not think that an increased demand would increase the good supply?—In course of time no doubt it would.

5182. Do you think it would be desirable to recognise such an influence as would in course of time increase the good supply?—I think so.

5183. Then if the music halls were permitted to have dramatic entertainments, and after two years the supply was increased that would be an improvement to the profession, would it not?—I do not think it could be done in two years, or twice two years; it takes some years to give a man sufficient experience in his profession to enable him to stand well with the public.

5184. You have had considerable experience in dramatic matters, have you not?—Yes, I have had 33 years' experience as an actor.

5185. Putting it not from a manager's point of view but from a public point of view, it would not be an advantage to the public generally, you think, if this permission was given to the music halls under proper restrictions to play such small pieces as would suit the taste of their audiences?—I do not think that the public would be benefited unless the pieces were properly represented.

5186. But that would be at the risk of the owners or managers of the music halls?—Yes, certainly.

5187. Therefore no injury could be done to the public, inasmuch as if they were not properly represented they would not be attractive?—Just so, but to see a piece ill-played deteriorates the taste of the public.

5188. Only that does not draw?—Yes.

5189. Have you been much through the provinces?—A great deal.

5190. Do you know the system of licensing in the provinces?—They obtain their license from the magistrates.

5191. Have you ever had occasion to apply for one?—Yes.

5192. Have you ever had any difficulty in getting a license?—Never.

5193. You think that the system works well in the country, do you?—In cases in which I have been concerned it is very satisfactory.

5194. Is it within your knowledge that licenses have been obtained with difficulty by other gentlemen in the profession?—I have heard of difficulties being found in obtaining licenses.

5195. Have you ever found that licenses were obtained in particular localities more easily than in others?—Yes.

5196. Is that from any particular characteristic of the district, religious, or otherwise?—Yes; perhaps in one case the bench of magistrates have been men who have been partial to dramatic representations, and there has been no difficulty in other cases; religious influence has pervaded the bench, and they have refused the license on that account.

5197. Is it your opinion that the system of licensing requires some alteration?—I think it would be better if the licenses were issued from a central office.

5198. For the whole kingdom?—Yes, for the whole kingdom.

5199. Mr. Miller.] Have you had any experience of the music halls in the country?—No, not in the country.

5200. I suppose you know that they require a license in the country the same as they do in London?—I presume they do.

5201. Can you tell the Committee whether the license which they get, not being within the jurisdiction of the Lord Chamberlain, enables them to perform anything more approaching to a dramatic entertainment than is performed in London?—I do not know much respecting the country music halls; but I think that the vigilance of the country managers would be such that if the music halls attempted to give dramatic entertainments they would be pounced upon by the managers.

5202. Their music hall license does not enable them to perform the drama, you think?—I think not.

5203. Suppose the license which is now extended to the great theatres for the drama were extended also to the music halls in the country, do you see any objection to that?—I am not prepared to say.

5204. You have not had experience enough in provincial music halls to say?—No, I have been in Scotland.

5205. Do you know more about Scotland than about the provinces?—I have been to several music halls in Glasgow, but I never knew them to attempt anything in the way of the drama.

5206. Their performances are somewhat similar to the London performances, are they?—Yes, I think so.

5207. Has any case of dispute ever arisen between the managers of theatres and the managers of music halls?—Yes, I have heard of several.

5208. Have they gone so far as to proceed to law?—Yes; there was a case in Moor-street, Birmingham, where the music hall was not properly licensed for dramatic representations, and where there was some one who attempted to produce a piece.

5209. What

5209. What was the result of that action?—I think the manager abandoned the production of the piece.

5210. Chairman.] Is not there a long list of actors and actresses out of employment advertised continually in the theatrical journals?—There is a long list of actors and actresses advertised continually in the theatrical journals, but they are not people of much esteem; there would perhaps be a few.

5211. You adhere to the opinion that generally goodactors are quickly able to find remunerative and satisfactory employment?—Certainly. H. J. Turner, Esq.

5212. Mr. O'Beirne.] The leading members of the profession very rarely advertise?—Very rarely; there is very rarely any necessity for doing so. 7 May 1866.

5213. Chairman.] Is there anything that you wish to add to your evidence?—No.

JOHN HOLLINGSHEAD, Esq., called in; and Examined.

5214. Mr. Locke.] WHAT are you by profession?—I am an Author and Journalist, and a member of the Dramatic Authors' Society.

5215. I believe that you are one of those gentlemen who signed this petition in support of the Theatres Bill, which was brought in by me last Session?—Yes.

5216. The petition states, "That your petitioners have found that the existing legislation concerning theatres operates as a restriction upon their industry, while it has not in any manner supported or elevated dramatic literature"?—Yes.

5217. In what way do you consider that the existing legislation concerning theatres operates as a restriction upon the industry of dramatic authors?—I ground my opinion chiefly on the extraordinary rise of rent alone in most of the London theatres during the last 25 years. I believe that at the Princess's Theatre the rental, until the year 1841, was 1,200*l.* a year; in 1848 it went up to 1,800*l.* a year; in 1851 it went up to 3,000*l.* a year; in 1862 it was 3,800*l.* a year; and in 1863 the present manager paid 4,000*l.* a year for it. With regard to the Lyceum Theatre, in 1844 it was let for 2,000*l.* a year, in 1846 it was 2,500*l.* a year, and in 1863 it was 4,000*l.* a year. Drury-lane Theatre was let to Mr. E. T. Smith, in 1860, for 4,500*l.* a year, and in 1862 he sold his lease for a premium of 6,000*l.* to Messrs. Falconer and Chatterton. I consider that those facts, and I believe others can be brought forward of the same character, prove that the existing system must have been restrictive, for no other property has risen in equal proportion.

5218. Is that an inconvenience to dramatic authors?—I think it must be.

5219. In what way?—It must limit their market, so far as London is concerned.

5220. If the number of theatres is restricted, the opportunities of dramatic authors are diminished, I suppose?—Yes, kept down to an artificial level, I should say, judging from those facts.

5221. What is your view with regard to the theatres with respect to persons being privileged to open them?—I think that the present law must be altered. The Committee is called together on the assumption of the present law being wholly impracticable. I do not think that this is a question between music halls and theatres; it has been narrowed down to that by certain witnesses, but I think it is a much broader question. I have made a calculation and I think there are about 5,000 places in which dramatic representations are given that come within the definition of stage plays, where no refreshment of any kind is sold, and where they have no dramatic license; places, such as literary institutes, town halls, entertainment galleries, and so on. Music halls form a very small numerical proportion, about 150, though some of them are important in size and value. J. Hollingshead, Esq.

5222. You see no objection to the performance of a stage play in any building which is fit for the purpose?—No objection, certainly, inasmuch as a stage play, even of the lowest kind is an intellectual entertainment; the present law gives full liberty to perform anything of a degrading character, but the moment you wish to perform a drama, which, as far as it goes, is intellectual, you are restricted by the dramatic licensing system.

5223. Chairman.] Have you known many cases where literary institutes were desirous of performing stage plays?—All the existing literary institutes are not only desirous of doing it, but they do it in defiance of the law, and it is open to anyone to prosecute them.

5224. Mr. Locke.] And they are prosecuted, are they not?—Very rarely; occasionally they are stopped, but as a member of the Dramatic Authors' Society, I know that we derive fees from the institutes, which is a proof that they perform plays in them.

5225. Here is a case decided in 1864, the case of Mr. Elliot Galer; will you be kind enough to state to the Committee what that case was?—I believe that Mr. Galer bought the copyright of the original version of a piece, had the music composed for it, dresses made for it, and I am not sure that he did not have scenery made for it. With his wife, and one or two other professional people, he proposed to make a tour through the provinces, and the first place in which he performed was the Leicester Temperance Hall, and he was prosecuted by the theatrical managers of that town; the entertainment was considered illegal, and he was prosecuted. His own estimate of his loss was something like 2,000*l.* I speak from memory of what he told me himself.

5226. Chairman.] Under what law was he prosecuted?—Under the 6th & 7th Victoria, performing a stage play without a license. He gave it in a building which was not licensed as a theatre by the magistrates under the 6th & 7th Victoria, cap. 68.

5227. Mr. Locke.] That case of George Owen and the proprietors of the Leicester theatre versus Elliot Galer was decided at Leicester, was it not?—I think so.

5228. Mr. Miller.] Was it before the magistrates or the judges?—It was before the magistrates.

5229. Mr. Locke.] Was there any appeal in that case?—I cannot say. I have not read the case; I am only speaking from memory. The house had a music and dancing license, but not a license for stage plays.

5230. Had it a license for wine and spirits?—None whatever; it was the Temperance Hall.

J. Hollingshead, Esq.

5231. That license was similar to what the Beaumont Institution had?—Yes. I will read to you a resolution of the St. James's Hall Company, which has been placed in my hands: "Copy of resolution unanimously passed at a meeting of the Directors of this Company, held on Wednesday 26th April 1865. That the existing laws affecting theatres and other places of public amusement are unsatisfactory, and uncertain in their operation, imposing needless restrictions upon those who wish to provide wholesome entertainment for the public, and that a Bill now before Parliament, introduced by Mr. Locke, to amend the laws, do receive the support of this Company, and that the sum of guineas be granted towards the expenses incurred by applying for the Act.——Note.—The Lord Chamberlain has twice refused a dramatic license to the St. James's Hall, though he has granted one to the Gallery of Illustration. The first belongs to an important public company, representing an enormous capital; the second is the property of Mr. German Reed, and is of very slight value as a public building."

5232. This case of Mr. Elliot Galer was heard at some length. Mr. Merewether was instructed for the prosecution; Mr. Galer was not legally represented, and the magistrates came to this conclusion: "We have carefully considered the question raised by the information now before us. It is impossible for the magistrates to know what was the intention of the framers of the Act of Parliament, with respect to entertainments of the kind represented at the Temperance Hall on the 22d of February last; but the magistrates feel bound by the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of 'Thorne against Colson,' that a dualogue in which scenery is introduced, and different characters represented, is a stage play within the meaning of the Act, and the magistrates cannot see any distinction between the entertainments called 'Cousin Kate,' and 'The Haunted Mill,' and the one which formed the subject of consideration in the case referred to. We therefore feel it our duty, as being bound by the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench to convict the defendant in the mitigated penalty of 5*l.*" Now that was a case where the performance was similar to that of Mr. and Mrs. German Reed, was it not?—The same, precisely.

5233. It was given at a temperance hall which had only a license for music and dancing, and the magistrates were bound on the authority of that case to fine Mr. Galer, and they fined him in the mitigated penalty of 5*l.*?—Yes; Mr. Galer put down his losses at 2,000*l.*, but perhaps that is an exaggerated estimate.

5234. Chairman.] Could Mr. Galer not have applied for a license to perform that play in that building?—I think that nobody but the lessee can do it; the magistrates will not grant it to persons passing through a town.

5235. We have had evidence that performances are given under licenses granted in country towns on application?—I cannot say.

5236. Mr. Locke.] A license is for a particular term in a country theatre, is it not; that is to say, it does not permit the theatre to be open all the year round?—I think that all such licenses are very objectionable. The only claim the Lord Chamberlain has to maintain his privilege is that he takes great care that all buildings shall be properly constructed as theatres, and if a travelling company were to have a floating license, they might perform in an unsafe building.

5237. Chairman.] They apply to the magistrates for a license at every town they go to, I understand?—Yes, for the building; the play of Mr. Elliot Galer was submitted to the Lord Chamberlain as a play.

5238. Mr. Locke.] You think it is objectionable that in any building which is properly constructed, anyone should be prevented from giving a dramatic performance?—Yes; my impression is that if a competent surveyor was sent round to half the London theatres, he would pronounce them unfit for the audiences which they hold nightly; they are very faulty in passages, entrances, staircases, and so on.

5239. Mr. Miller.] Does that apply to the London theatres?—Yes, I have an intimate knowledge of them, having been connected with them more or less for 20 years.

5240. Mr. Locke.] Have you looked at the theatre which they are building in Holborn?—No.

5241. Did you hear the evidence which was given the other day about that building?—Yes.

5242. Do you think that that will be a proper building with regard to ingress and egress?—Most likely, as it is a new building.

5243. Do you think that they have provided sufficient avenues there?—I should think they would now, under the circumstances, so much attention being directed to the subject.

5244. Do you think that these restrictions have in any way supported or elevated dramatic literature?—I do not think so. I do not think that the censorship has had that effect. Take, for instance, the drama produced at the Adelphi, on Saturday, which is a most objectionable French drama, very little care being taken to adapt it to English ideas of right and wrong; it is offensive in action and full of vulgarities in dialogue, and ending with a parody of the "Judgment of Solomon"; also having a most objectionable Holywell-street title, "The Fast Family." Now that play has passed the censorship of the Lord Chamberlain, and the play will be performed for a considerable time. I have been dramatic critic for eight years to the "Daily News," the "London Review," the "Express," and occasionally for "Punch." I think that the censorship of the press is always in advance of the censorship of the Lord Chamberlain, and is constantly found making objections to the morality of pieces which he passes as being correct and decent.

5245. You think that the piece which you have mentioned is a most objectionable piece?—Yes. Mr. Donne admitted in his evidence that the press had great influence in those matters.

5246. You think that the censorship of the press and the opinion of the public would be quite sufficient, and that there is no necessity for the Lord Chamberlain's censorship?—Just so; that is never in advance of the average decency of the audiences.

5247. Do you think, however, that it must be of some benefit in certain theatres?—It never interferes with the old drama, which is the most offensive of any portion of our drama. Mr. Horace Wigan proved that the other day, in quoting from Shakespere a passage which is recited nightly at the St. James's Theatre.

5248. Do you think that the lower middle class and and working class have, of late years, developed a large appetite for intellectual amusement?—I think they have.

5249. How is that shown?—By the increase of the music halls.

5250. And theatres?—The theatres have not increased in the last 25 years. I believe that the whole of the audiences of the whole of the theatres and all the concert halls and entertainment galleries and music halls put together every night in London, never amount to the number of visitors who are supposed to be stopping in London every night, passing through; and the 3,000,000 of the standing London population would therefore appear to be untouched.

5251. Chairman.] Are the theatres generally over-full?—Sometimes the theatres are; it depends a good deal on the management.

5252. But taking the whole of the theatres, is there sufficient accommodation for all the people who want to go?—It appears so, but if many of the theatres had an attractive piece, then it would not be sufficient. The Haymarket is now advertising that you can book seats a month in advance. I have known theatres where you have had to apply a fortnight in advance, in order to get seats.

5253. That might be the case, however many theatres you had, might it not?—It might be so.

5254. You say that the taste of the public has very much increased for such an entertainment as they give at music halls. I believe you have witnessed the performances at most of the music halls in London; what is the description of performance; is it correct or proper, or what is its general character?—Within my experience, I have never noticed anything more indecent at the music halls than I have at the theatres generally; nothing half so indecent as I have noticed in popular light comedians; such as the late Mr. Wright at the Adelphi Theatre, who was such a favourite with the public that he had full liberty to do as he chose, and whatever the Lord Chamberlain struck out of the dialogue, he took care to put in again with additions; of course, however, the entertainments at the music halls are not above the intellectual powers of the audience; it is a supply that meets the demand, but I have never heard any songs of an improper character there, and I do not think that there is any demand for songs of that kind. Places like the Cider Cellars would not pay now if they were started.

5255. Used there to be indecent songs there?—Yes, there used to be 20 years ago; and also at Evans's.

5256. There is nothing but the greatest propriety now, is there?—No, the censorship does not apply to them; there is no demand for such songs now, they are given up for a commercial reason, the audience do not care for them.

5257. Mr. Locke.] At Evans's there is a most excellent choir, is there not?—Yes, very good; there is a little sameness about the performance; they have sung the same chorus every night for the last 15 years.

5258. There is a Mr. Sydney there who always sings the song on the Oxford and Cambridge boat-race night?—Yes.

5259. He sings an improvised song for the occasion?—Yes.

5260. On the Oxford and Cambridge boat-race night the place is always very full, is it not?—Yes.

5261. But there is no impropriety of any sort or kind at Evans's, is there?—None whatever.

5262. Do you know of any such impropriety in any of the other music halls?—None whatever, within my knowledge.

5263. Take the Alhambra, for instance; there has been a great deal said about that; that is the largest, is it not?—That is more a theatre than a music hall; the music hall element is very small there; it is only used to fill up the front of the stage while the great spectacles of the evening are being prepared.

5264. Just as they used to have some of those comic songs while they got ready behind the scenes at the theatres?—Yes, just so; gymnastics and comic songs.

5265. Can you state to the Committee what is the expense of getting up one of those ballets at the Alhambra?—Speaking from memory, I should think it would vary from 500 l. to 1,500 l.

5266. What ballets are they giving there now?—A comic ballet of action, the cost of which has been very much less than that minimum; then a general dancing ballet, which would cost from 500 l. to 600 l.; the figures in the scenery are painted by an eminent Royal Academician; the great mechanical ballet, or the butterfly ballet, must, with its machinery, have cost from 1,300 l. to 1,500 l., much of the machinery in that ballet being available for other performances at other times, of course.

5267. How many performers are there in that ballet at the Alhambra?—Quite 100, I should think.

5268. I believe, in fact, that that ballet is as well got up as any ballet at any theatre, if not better than any you know of?—I have seen no better ballet in England. I have seen them in Berlin, where the opera is given up to ballet on alternate nights.

5269. Was the ballet that they are now performing at the Alhambra the one that was prosecuted?—It was a similar ballet.

5270. There has been no further step taken for prosecuting that ballet at the Alhambra, has there?—Not since the judgment in the Court of Common Pleas last October. Perhaps it is presumptuous in me to give an opinion, but I should say, myself, that I think they are unquestionably stage plays within the meaning of the Act.

5271. The Judges of the Court of Common Pleas gave their decision that the question of fact having been decided below, it was impossible for them, in point of law, to reverse that decision of the magistrates, there being no distinct opinion given with regard to whether it came within the meaning of the Act of Parliament or not?—I believe that was more a judgment of feeling than a judgment of law.

5272. Their decision was, I think, that the magistrates having given a decision in favour of the Alhmabra, they could not apply the law to that decision in such a way as to say that the magistrates were wrong; the magistrates being the judges of the question of fact?—Yes.

5273. Now, if the Bill which I brought in last Session were passed, which gives the right to all places where they have a music and dancing license to give any performance of the stage they pleased, what performances do you think would be given at places other than theatres, such as music halls?—I think that light pieces, small comic operas, vaudevilles, and, perhaps, farces, ballets, and pantomimes would be given.

J. Hollingshead, Esq.

7 May 1866.

5274. Do you think that those performances would be attractive?—Unquestionably so.

5275. Of course, a manager would not put anything on his stage that did not attract?—I think not.

5276. Do you think that there is any likelihood of their acting Shakspere's plays?—I should see no objection to it if they did. I have heard a good deal about the "degradation of the drama:" now, when the British drama is freed from certain French impurities, which it derives from its very birth, it will be of course a fine thing; but still, I think that the British public is a much finer thing. It is much more important to care for the public than to care for the British drama.

5277. Do you think that the music halls would perform Shakespere's plays if the restriction were taken off?—The better the performances are the more likely they are to have good influence on the audience.

5278. What are the performances that you think would be introduced which would elevate the public?—I should think that the pieces at first would be very slight pieces, probably what I should call the scum of dramatic literature, trashy burlesques, and so on, which I should be very glad to see the theatres relieved from; mere ballets of action, which may or may not have a meaning, and then the theatres would have to compete on mere intellectual grounds alone, which they talk so much about.

5279. Do you think that they compete on intellectual grounds now?—Some of them do. The first duty of a manager is to make his theatre pay, to keep out of the Bankruptcy Court, and to produce the kind of pieces that the audience like. He may patronise the drama if he likes. In the entertainments at the music halls there are many things that I do not admire there, as a man of taste, but they supply a large demand, and I am very glad to see them.

5280. If there is no impropriety in what amuses other people you see no reason why they should not be amused in their own way?—None, whatever. I should not go myself to music halls, but thousands do.

5281. In addition to that ballet at the Alhambra there is a large chorus, is there not?—Yes, a very large chorus.

5282. How many are there in that chorus?—Perhaps 50.

5283. What do they sing?—They sing selections generally every night from one of the Italian operas or French operas, such as "Faust," "Masaniello," the "Orphée aux Enfers," and so on.

5284. Do they give the greater portion of them?—The most effective portion of them.

5285. If the restriction were taken off do you think that they would produce comic operas?—I think that at the Alhambra they would immediately do comic operas; most likely they would engage M. Offenbach. He would be engaged to write one for the Alhambra, and conduct it, and it would start as a comic opera house.

5286. Do you think that Mr. Strange would embark large sums of money in comic opera if he thought it unlikely to succeed?—The experiment would be tried, and, if it failed, it would be given up and a more limited performance given.

5287. But you think that the experiment would be tried?—Unquestionably.

5288. A good deal has been said about this canteen at the Alhambra; I believe that you have been very frequently in it?—No, I have been there very rarely; but I know the room, of course.

5289. Is there anything objectionable that you have seen there?—Nothing more objectionable than I have seen behind the scenes at the opera houses, where I go as well; except, of course, that the canteen of a music hall is, perhaps, hardly so refined as the coulisses of the opera.

5290. Now, do persons go behind the scenes at the theatres?—Very rarely, I should think.

5291. This canteen is not on the stage, is it?—No, it is at the back of the building; it is at the basement of the building.

5292. Underneath the stage?—It is below the stage, at the back of the building.

5293. It does not interfere with the stage in any way, does it?—No; it was started not to interfere with the stage.

5294. It is for the performers to retire to during the time that they are not employed?—There are 200 persons employed on the stage at the Alhambra, and they have all a right to go into it to get refreshments at cost price. You see the stage carpenter there eating his bread and cheese and onions, a few ballet girls, and a few visitors. There is a class of people who visit the theatres and music halls who will go anywhere to see the ballet girls off the stage in their dancing costume, and nobody could keep them out.

5295. They will go to see a ballet girl?—Yes; and if they do not get in by the permission of the proprietor, they get in by back-stairs influence.

5296. But there is so large a number of people at the canteen that it is impossible for any improper conduct to take place there?—It is a public room; there are never less people in it than there are in this room; there are always one of Sir Richard Mayne's police, and two of the police of the establishment there, and any indecency would be followed by the immediate discharge of the offenders, if they were members of the company, or their expulsion if visitors. It is a matter of detail in the management of one building, and I think that it has very little to do with the broad question.

5297. It is a mere matter of arrangement?—Yes.

5298. The broad question being, whether or not the performance of stage plays should be restricted in the way it is now?—Yes; due attention being paid to the fact that stage plays are largely performed illegally throughout the country, and must be so until the law is altered.

5299. The performance of stage plays tends to elevate the taste of the public, does it not?—It is the most intellectual form of amusement that we have.

5300. Now, with regard to actors who have come out at music halls; do you know any actors who have commenced their career at a music hall?—It is difficult to say where an actor has commenced his career; he may have performed in a tent or a barn, which some people think is more elevating than a music hall. I remember Mr. Robson's appearance at the Grecian; I lived in the neighbourhood and went there frequently; I make no mistake about the Grecian Saloon, what I call the Saloon; it is a building which was no theatre, but a music hall in 1844, when Mr. Robson went there, there, and it did not cease to be a music hall until 1848; that is in evidence before the Committee by the Lord Chamberlain's statement; and during those four years Mr. Robson performed in an atmosphere of tobacco smoke, and before audiences who sat before ledges in front of each seat (there was no table), on which the drink was placed. He performed most of the familiar characters that made him popular at the Olympic, and sang nearly all the comic songs which made the fortune of that house; it was, to all intents and purposes, a music hall. Miss Carlotta Leclercq, and Miss Stevens (now at the Olympic, I think), and Mr. Flexmore were there; and I believe that Mr. Sims Reeves was in the chorus.

5301. Among the smoke?—Yes; the performances were very perfect, and of a refined character; I was young at the time; they had little operas and burlettas; it was not much like a theatre, it was more of a suburban comic opera house; people went there from all parts of the town. A piece of Mr. Shirley Brooks was put on the stage there, which Mr. Keeley had made a hit in at the Lyceum Theatre; they went down there to see it, and their impression was that Mr. Robson was better in it than Mr. Keeley, and that it was better performed. I think it had been withdrawn at the Lyceum.

5302. But Mr. Keeley had done it at the Lyceum previously to Mr. Robson doing it at the Grecian?—Yes; I do not know whether the fact is of much value, but it is a fact; I am speaking from my own knowledge.

5303. The Grecian was to all intents and purposes a music hall, was it?—Yes. I saw Mr. Robson about three times a-week during the whole of those four years, when it was essentially a music hall; it was called a saloon, but with all the conditions of smoking, eating, and drinking in the auditorium.

5304. And at that time many persons preferred Mr. Robson's performance to Mr. Keeley's, in the same character?—Yes.

5305. That was before Mr. Robson went to Dublin?—Yes, before he went to Dublin.

5306. Then it cannot be correct to say that he never learned to be a good actor until he went to Dublin?—I know that at a theatre people cannot smoke; but I should hardly say the audience at the Queen's Theatre in Dublin was of the quietest. The lowest price at the Grecian was 6*d.*, and the lowest price at the Queen's was 3*d.* There was no smoking, eating, and drinking at the Queen's, but the audience was rather a rough Irish audience.

5307. You saw Mr. Robson full of art before he went to Dublin?—Yes, full of art at the Grecian.

5308. Can you mention any others who have come out at the Grecian?—Miss Carlotta Leclercq, and, I think, Miss Stevens, who performed the old woman in the "Ticket-of-Leave Man" at the Olympic, and Mr. Fraser, who was a singer of some notoriety at the Covent Garden Theatre, equal to Mr. Templeton.

5309. Had he been at Covent Garden Theatre before?—Yes, he came direct from there to the Grecian.

5310. Then it is incorrect to say that no actor or singer has ever gone from a theatre to a music hall?—Yes: those are the facts, and you can take them for what they are worth.

5311. Have you anything to add to your evidence?—No.

5312. Colonel Sturt.] Do you think that the present system of restriction is detrimental to the interests of the drama?—I think it must be so, like any other restriction; besides, it is difficult to say what the immediate result of free trade would be.

5313. You do not believe that two or three authors would suffice to supply the British public with dramatic pieces if the music halls were thrown open?—I think not. There might be a run on a particular author, the same as there is on Mr. Boucicault just now.

5314. Do you think that even two or three Boucicaults, if it were possible, would suffice to supply the music halls and theatres with pieces?—Undoubtedly not; you would want small pieces of a different character.

5315. How do you account for the present state of things, as described by Mr. Boucicault, in which he monopolises so many theatres?—The pieces he produced were very popular. I believe that most of the London theatrical audiences are largely composed of country people; the old metropolitan playgoer lives out of town, and does not go so much to the theatre as he used to do; the provincial people come up to town, and fresh audiences are created every night.

5316. But still you do not think that three or four men, like Mr. Boucicault, would suffice to supply the theatres with pieces?—They could only fill one theatre with one piece.

5317. What I mean is, if the music halls were thrown open?—Unquestionably not. At first the music halls would take the scum of the drama from the theatres, small farces and burlesques, and the theatres would have to turn their attention to dramas, and the operation on the salaries of the actors would be immediately to raise them.

5318. Therefore it would be an advantage to the actor as well as to the authors?—Unquestionably so; more immediately to the actor than the author.

5319. Would there be any great difficulty in limiting the number of persons on the stage in the music halls?—Unquestionably; it would be impracticable; it would break down, and in three months you would have to legislate again. What they would do on a stage, the size of a dining-table, would never do for a stage like the Alhambra, where they can conveniently have 300 people on the stage at the same time.

5320. You do not know of any dramatic author, like Mr. Boucicault, who has written 200 pieces?—Mr. Tom Taylor is very prolific.

5321. But he has only written 60 pieces?—He is otherwise occupied; he is an eminent civil servant.

5322. Do you think that there are a great many authors now in obscurity who, if there was free trade in theatres, would come out?—I think so. There is great difficulty in getting pieces read. I have left off writing pieces since I became a dramatic critic, because I consider that a man who does one thing ought not to do the other.

5323. Mr. O'Beirne.] You have mentioned that you thought the survey now made by the Lord Chamberlain of theatres was insufficient?—I should think it was. I do not want to mention particular theatres.

5324. Is it not the fact that the survey is repeated every year, before the license is granted?—I cannot say.

J. Hollingshead, Esq.

7 May 1866.

5325. Do you know the Strand Theatre?—Yes.

5326. Is not it the fact that they have opened a new entrance there (at some expense) to the pit?—Yes; it is as perfect as it could be made.

5327. Was that done in consequence of their being called upon to do it, by the Lord Chamberlain's surveyor?—I am not aware.

5328. You would propose that there should be a very extended survey of the houses?—I think that the safety of the public should be provided for; but, on the other hand, in the event of any accident occurring at the theatres, the managers of the theatres are liable to heavy damages; and they are, therefore, interested in having their buildings safely constructed.

5329. You have a very large knowledge of theatrical matters: do you not think it would be desirable to have a complete and perfect survey, so as to guarantee that the safety of the public should be cared for in all public places?—I think that probably it would be advisable.

5330. You have not given the Committee your opinion with regard to the censorship of literature; as it stands now, do you think it is sufficient?—I think it is insufficient. I have written a good deal on that subject in the "Athenæum" and "Household Words," and other journals; and I generally find the press more severe than the censorship.

5331. Are you of opinion that it should be extended?—I would rather leave it to the good taste of the audiences.

5332. We have heard some evidences given in this room in favour of more extended and larger censorship; you are not of that opinion?—I am not of that opinion. I have generally found that anything grossly indecent in dialogue or action is hissed off the stage, unless you have a man who does as he likes, as the late Mr. Wright did at the Adelphi.

5333. Do you know sufficient of Scotland and other parts of the kingdom to enable the Committee to apply that answer to those districts as well?—No; Liverpool, Manchester, and Birmingham are the only towns that I know much of. With regard to Liverpool, I think that the music halls have full liberty to perform the drama, the magistrates there being liberally disposed; but in Birmingham the system is very restrictive; the managers of the music halls are being constantly prosecuted. In Liverpool it is of no use, because the magistrates grant the dramatic license as a matter of course; 100 miles makes all the difference.

5334. The Committee understand that you do not agree with the managers of theatres or Mr. Tom Taylor with regard to the injury that the drama would sustain from those enlarged performances at the music halls?—I think that Mr. Tom Taylor and several of the other witnesses are led away by the idea that the drama wants all kinds of protection, and that the patent theatres did something to sustain the higher drama; that view is certainly not supported by the report of the Committee of 1830; but even if it were so, it is more important that millions of people should have no restriction put on their amusing themselves in a decent way and being elevated by any performance that they think proper. I think that the people are of more importance than the drama.

5335. We have heard a good deal about the ladies and gentlemen of the profession who have come from the music halls, do you think that giving permission to music halls and other places of public entertainment to perform such pieces as you describe would really tend to advance the profession in any way?—It is a matter of opinion; I should not think it would myself.

5336. You have mentioned that you saw nothing in the canteen at the Alhambra that made it differ very much from what you have seen behind the scenes at the opera?—That is the substance of what I said.

5337. Have you ever seen any smoking, eating, and drinking behind the scenes at the operas?—No, it is a standing rule in theatres that there shall be no smoking, eating, and drinking behind the scenes, and the same rule applies to the stage at the Alhambra.

5338. There are 200 persons in the Alhambra company who have access to this room, are there not?—They have the right of going to it.

5339. We have heard from Mr. Strange that the average number of strangers who go to that room is 50 in an evening?—Yes.

5340. Do you think from your experience that such a room, with the admission of some 40 or 50 strangers in the course of the evening, is or is not calculated to advance any establishment?—It keeps the stage free for the business of the evening; but whether it is a fit thing in itself is a matter of opinion.

5341. The canteen of itself seems to be almost necessary, but my question refers to the admission of a certain number of gentlemen every evening?—I do not think it is any advantage to the public, and I do not think it is any advantage to the stage, except in keeping strangers off the stage.

5342. Chairman.] Do you think that the press reaches all the theatres in its criticisms?—Some of what used to be called the minor theatres (but I think local theatres is a better term) only come under the supervision of the local press. The daily papers very rarely go to the outside districts.

5343. Do you think that the power of the press (which is very great, no doubt) over well-known theatres would be sufficient to keep the east end theatres, or small theatres, decent?—I think so; I think that the pieces at the minor theatres may sometimes be coarse, but they are not so indecent as a rule as the pieces at the west-end theatres.

5344. Your view is that the censorship of the press is sufficient in the outlying theatres, as well as in the more prominent theatres?—I think so; take the case of Miss Menken for example; I do not see the advantage that the Lord Chamberlain was in that case; most of the press abused that exhibition when it was maintained by the Lord Chamberlain. I felt bound to describe it in very strong terms. I said in my criticism that it was the representation of a woman who had just tumbled out of bed with her shift tucked between her legs.

5345. Does not that prove that the taste of the public is not sufficient in such matters?—Not that case, I think; it drew other persons than the local population, because she was a notoriety, and they went to see her, but I do not think that the performance was approved of by the Lambeth people.

5346. Is not it the case that that shows a necessity for more supervision rather than less?—It may be so taken.

5347. Would you think that the general supervision of some central authority might not be extended tended even further than it is to the music halls, with regard to the character of the performances?—If the theatres are to be under supervision, it is only fair that the music halls should be the same; if one audience is to be kept moral by the censorship, they all clearly ought to be.

5348. You would see no objection to giving music halls power to perform dramatic pieces, at the same time submitting them to more supervision?—Personally, I am opposed to most restrictions that fetter any particular industry. I think the ordinary police regulation is sufficient to check any indecency.

5349. But the ordinary police would not have checked Miss Menken or any performance of that kind?—No.

5350. Can you imagine that poses plastiques could reach any degree where the police might interfere?—I do not think it would draw audiences if it went beyond a certain point.

5351. You say that there are 5,000 places in which dramatic performances might take place?—There are quite that number throughout the country.

5352. Could you group them into different classes?—Town halls, concert halls, entertainment galleries (more particularly in London, though there are some in large towns), literary institutes, where they constantly give dramatic performances. I think it is just a question whether some oratorios are not stage plays. "Samson Agonistes" is unquestionably a stage play: it was so written by Milton, and I believe might be stopped at Exeter Hall.

5353. Would those places together reach 5,000?—Yes, I think that 5,000 is rather under than over the mark.

5354. You have positive grounds for giving that figure, and as not speaking vaguely?—Yes.

5355. You mean to say that these are places where dramatic pieces are likely to be performed?—No, those are places where they actually are performed and where I want to make the performance legal.

5356. You mean that this is now actually done at 5,000 places?—Yes, irrespective of the music halls. This discussion has turned, I think, too much on the music halls. There is the Walworth Institute where Mr. Toole was trained, and from which he came direct to the Adelphi; he was the product of a literary institute.

5358. How many times a year do they perform at those places?—During the winter season, what they call their session, from October to April. In the summer there are very few lectures. They engage people like Mr. and Mrs. Henri Drayton to give entertainments like that which was stopped at the Leicester Temperance Hall, and may very probably have been given illegally at the Walworth Institute. But I do not think that anybody has had the boldness to prosecute a literary institute.

J. Hollingshead, Esq.

5359. Do they charge admission to these entertainments, or are they for the subscribers only?—The subscribers are admitted, and they may take their friends according to a certain arrangement; but there is also a tariff of prices at the door for strangers; 6*d.* or 1*s.* according to the part of the building to which the payment applies.

5360. Are these entertainments not rather in the nature of private theatricals?—They are public in this sense, that money is taken at the doors; but there are often subscription performances, at which private theatrical entertainments are given, for charity; money is taken directly or indirectly at the doors, and they are illegal unless given in a properly licensed building. The Honourable Mr. Wingfield was getting up a performance for some hospital, under the patronage of the Prince and Princess of Wales, and the Lord Chamberlain advised him to withdraw it, because he said that some unpleasantness might occur; some one might go in and interrupt them, and that would not be pleasant when the Prince of Wales was present.

5361. The whole of the audience might have been fined 10*s.* apiece, I suppose?—They might have been turned out. The proprietor of Willis's rooms told me himself that for many years he has had no license for anything, and he has been giving concerts and balls, and all kinds of illegal entertainments.

5362. You think that there would be a considerably increased demand for dramatic pieces throughout the country if the legislation were changed?—I think that most of the lighter pieces would go to lighter places, and the theatres would be left to the more intellectual forms of entertainment.

5363. You think that the change would take away from the theatres what you called their "scum"?—Yes.

5364. And that that would go to the music halls?—Yes.

5365. And if they were to do that, you still think the music halls would be elevated?—The scum of the theatres is better than the scum of the present music halls.

5366. But still good music at the music halls is better than bad pieces at the theatres, is it not?—I think so, undoubtedly.

5367. You think, I suppose, that the music halls might be improved by degrees, and the taste of the people be gradually educated to better things?—I think so; that, however, is a matter of opinion. But it is a matter of fact that these halls are in existence, and are filled every night, and I think that it is better to give them some amount of liberty, which might be turned to good use, than to restrict them to low-class performances.

5368. If a high class of pieces were acted at the music halls, do you not think that many of them would lose their custom?—I cannot say; that must be a matter of experiment.

5369. As a matter of fact, are theatres generally very prosperous now?—Yes, those that are well managed.

5370. Is what is called the monopoly, in your opinion, a great advantage to them?—I believe that at the Princess's the net profits were 32,000*l.* in the course of one year; chiefly derived from the "Streets of London," under the management of Mr. Vining and Mr. Boucicault. The run of "Arrah-

"Arrah-na-Pogue" was nearly as productive, and I believe that there have been very beneficial results from "Never too Late to Mend." I believe also that Mr. Buckstone has no reason to complain of one or two pieces produced by Mr. Sothern; but there I do not speak by the book.

5371. But still a great many managers come to grief in the theatres, do they not?—If they produce bad pieces they do; I think the very high rents they have to pay is one important thing; they do not see that one effect of this proposed change of the law would be to reduce those high fancy rents. My idea is that those rents would go down 50 per cent. if there were anything like free trade.

5372. You said, I think, that the first thing a manager had to do was to keep out of the Bankruptcy Court?—Certainly.

5373. Was that at all a suggestion that there is a tendency on the part of the managers of the theatres to get into it?—No; but I think any man's first duty is to pay 20*s.* in the pound.

5374. Did you, however, mean to convey to the Committee that the leasing of a theatre was rather a dangerous speculation?—No, not at all; I think that it is as lucrative a business as any business we have; it is not free from risks, but the profits are very large; there may be bad business occasionally, but taking the whole trade, I think the profits are far above those of ordinary trades. I suppose there is no business employing an equal capital, and managed with about the same amount of intelligence (or I will even say with an equally small amount of intelligence), from Meux's Brewery up to Hyde Park Corner, which brings in such profits as I have quoted.

5375. Colonel Sturt.] Who had the Princess's Theatre before Mr. Vining?—Mr. Webster.

5376. Did he make it pay?—I believe so; he let his lease at a premium of 200*l.* a year.

5377. Did Mr. Harris have it?—I believe Mr. Harris had it, and Mr. Hankey; it was not very successful in his hands, from one or two circumstances. Mr. Fechter would only play three nights a week.

5378. Chairman.] Is it considered a profitable thing to get hold of a theatre?—There are always a great many applicants; you rarely find a theatre in the market. M. Offenbach, for instance, is very anxious to come over here and produce an opera, but there is no theatre open; an offer has been made to him of the Alhambra, on his own terms.

5379. With regard to the supply of actors, do you think that there are now actors enough to supply, and more than supply, the whole of the theatres?—Yes, I think so; but anyway, I think those things may be left to the ordinary operations of trade.

5380. But is there any grievance on the part of actors, from their supposing that the present legislation interferes with the theatres?—In many cases there are always new actors springing up. There is the Prince of Wales's, which is now one of the recognised West-end theatres; one or two persons who act there were never heard of before that place was opened; and Mr. Hare, who came from Liverpool, has not been on the stage more than two years.

5381. Have you a large acquaintance with actors?—Yes, very large.

5382. Do you think they consider the present legislation a grievance?—I have never consulted many of them on that point. They have been protected and "patronised" for several centuries, and are not a class that you can discuss free trade with, because they lose their temper; you cannot show them to their satisfaction that free trade would probably double their salaries in a short period.

5383. The fact is, that you yourself think (as it comes out in the evidence) that it would be to their advantage, in a pecuniary point of view, to have the music halls competing for their services?—I should think so.

5384. But the actors seem to be rather against a change in the law?—I cannot imagine why they should be so; I know that, as a journalist, I fought very hard for the paper duty to come off, feeling that it would benefit me; and it did, for I get 25 per cent. more for my work.

5385. Do you agree with the evidence that has been given here, that there is an antipathy on the part of actors to music halls?—On the part of some of them there is, no doubt, considerable antipathy; the majority of them very likely; it is a matter of feeling. I believe, however, in spite of that, that many actors would go to music halls and perform in the face of the tobacco smoke, as many foreign actors do; but you may have to raise a new class of actors for it.

5386. Of course, if the performances were improved at the music halls, that antipathy might fall to the ground, might it not?—If music halls had a better status, and were more encouragingly noticed in the press, it might do a great deal; an actor likes a newspaper notice, even if he is cut up. At present the music halls produce nothing that cannot be disposed of by the critic in three or four lines.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE GEORGE JOACHIM GOSCHEN, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. WILLIAM THOMAS SIMPSON, called in; and Examined.

Mr. W. T. Simpson.

5387. Chairman.] WILL you kindly tell us what experience you have of provincial theatres?—Yes. I have been very nearly 30 years playing or connected with all the Theatres Royal in the United Kingdom, and I have been stage manager as well, which generally includes the business of the stage for the proprietors.

5388. With regard to the country theatres, have you a theatre now?—Yes, I have been travelling for many years; I have read of many questions being asked with regard to the cause of our not having country theatres now as nurseries for the drama. The cause is not at all strange, when you come to think that if you went to build a theatre in the country, where the town's people would wish for one, you have to think, first, shall I get my license; Mr. Tomkins says that he will never have a theatre, and all the rest of the gentlemen will bow to him; so they say, "We will build a singing room, which requires no license." What is a country singing room? It is a room at the bar of a public-house, with music at one end, and swearing at the other; they call it a saloon, but no respectable man and his wife could sit there for an hour.

5389. Do you speak of the country music halls generally?—Of some parts; not those in Liverpool and Manchester.

5390. What particular music halls do you refer to?—Take the county of Staffordshire.

5391. What towns?—Walsall for one, and Wednesbury for another, and Kidderminster and Stourbridge; all round Staffordshire; I have played in every town.

5392. Where have you played?—In a travelling theatre.

5393. You are manager of a travelling theatre?—Yes, I am now; I have managed one for a manager; there is Bennett and Patch's, which exists to this day.

5394. Will you describe to the Committee the kind of license that you require, and the kind of license that you get?—You secure a piece of ground, and you build your show. Until within the last 10 or 12 years everyone thought that the Act was explicit, and did not apply to a portable theatre by the last clause; but as there have been loopholes in it, some persons have persevered when they have found the magistrates disinclined for it; he has given the reading the other way, and there have been convictions; since that, many persons have brought charges against travelling theatres, saying that they should be licensed from the magistrates. But the present Act, as I read it, relates only to a permanent building. Could it refer to a travelling theatre, when it says that the proprietor may be bound in 500*l.* to answer for his well-conducting the same, and to find two tradesmen to be bound along with him; now, if he was a stranger, who would be bound for it. No; it is meant to be some building fixed in the town, where the people who live in the town might know that their money is quite safe.

5395. You suppose that the Act does not apply to temporary theatres?—Yes; but it has been made to apply either through bad reading or bad writing. It says that this Act does not apply to booths and shows, such as go to fairs and feasts, and things of that kind. But they do not prosecute you under that; they prosecute you under the clause which says any "place" that is unlicensed, and they have had a great difficulty to define what that is. Before the magistrate at Croydon we were six weeks, and he came to the conclusion that the place was not a place within the meaning of the Act; not a temporary building, that is here to-day and gone to-morrow. But I lost a great deal of money. The police say, "We shall prosecute you," and the magistrate says, "You can go on." Now there is Maidstone; I used to have a little theatre in Maidstone when it was not one-sixth of what it is now; there is a better population now; more of the working population. Formerly you got the tradesmen generally to patronise you, but you could not get a good house, but the artisans will now fill the house every night. I went there 16 miles to get a license.

5396. Mr. Locke.] When was this?—Last June 12 months, or July. I was to get two magistrates to sign this application before the case could be heard; so when I went to the Bench there were but two magistrates. One of the magistrates said, "We cannot sign that," and I said, "How so?" and they said, "Because we do not like theatres." I said this is only a matter of form, and they said, "You must get somebody else to sign it, we shall not." I went four miles to another magistrate and he said, "Well, but this is not the right place; why did you not go to the court to-day?" I said I had been to the court, and that they referred me to other gentlemen; and he said, "Well, this is very strange; I should not like to take it out of their hands; I would would do it with pleasure otherwise. You had better go back." I went back and they said, "No, we shall not sign it; there are plenty more magistrates." I went off to another magistrate, a mile and a half off, and he was a little more like a Christian, and he signed it, and took me to another gentleman who signed it too.

5397. Was this an application for a license?—Yes, we have to give eight days' clear notice.

5398. That application must be signed by two magistrates, must it?—Yes; when we went to hear it decided there was a general commotion in Maidstone. Maidstone is a very theatrical town; the streets were crowded like they are at an election, and they came to the conclusion that they did not think that the Act allowed them to give the license. I played in the town six weeks, and I go there four times a year besides, but that is nothing.

5399. Did you continue to act then?—Yes.

5400. But you had not got a license?—No; I argued that we did not want one, but they argued that we did; and I agreed with them that I should apply for one, but they said that it did not lie in their power to grant it.

5401. Do you continually play without a license in other towns?—I never heard of but three or four prosecutions in my life of a portable theatre.

5402. You think that a portable theatre can play without any license at all?—Yes; the Act says it is exempt, but it says in the other clause, if you act in any "place"; so that it is both for and against you; you can do neither. The Mayor of Maidstone said that he never saw such an Act of Parliament in his life, and that the best thing was to burn it and get a new one; but he supposed that we were too poor to get that. I was never prosecuted but once.

5403. Was that at Croydon?—No; the magistrates said I was right there; this was at Maidstone; they fined me 1 s. on account of the word "place;" and it cost me 2 l. then.

5404. Have you ever been interfered with anywhere else besides that?—They have been interfered with at Dudley, in Worcestershire: a man laid out his all to build a very nice theatre in a place where there are 60,000 inhabitants; he got a license; it was his native town; he had been acting there 40 years; he built this theatre, and it was opened; it played the whole season, and never had one complaint against it; he went for his second license, but in the interim some gentleman who was on the Bench had been taken ill, and had made all the magistrates promise that they would never grant a theatrical license until he was gone: the next season he was refused his license, and he had to pull down his theatre and carry it away like old bricks and mortar. Mr. G. V. Brooke played in that theatre.

5405. Was this permanent theatre pulled down?—Yes, it was pulled down.

5406. I thought the license was only temporarily suspended?—The gentleman was very old; he asked that as a favour; there was no secret about it.

5407. The license had been granted in the first year?—Yes.

5408. Do you know of any other case?—No. There was no harm in that theatre. It says in the old Act that any person opening a theatre should be bound in a penalty of 500 l. or less if the magistrates think fit; that is the 6th & 7th Victoria. There happened to be a barrister, bearing the name of Kenealey, at Birmingham, and he happened to be in the court, when he started up with an opposition for this license; they had only called one of the names, and he said, "Mr. Bennett, are you worth 500 l." He said, "No." "You are not?" "No." Then he says, "Your worships, this cannot go on." He says, "How so"? "Why," he says, "you might put him in a penalty of 500 l.," and so he lost it on account of that. That was a great deal to lose for a country manager, trying to get his bread and cheese in the country.

5409. What is the average cost of a theatre in the country?—The Northampton Theatre, which is small, that is, about 150 l. a year rent, and 50 l. a year taxes; a man has got his 12 months' rent to pay, and he has got 100 l. to start in his business; he thinks that will do, and he does not see why he should have that 500 l. too, and that is what prevents him from getting a license.

5410. Is it possible to conduct a theatre fairly with less than 500 l.?—Yes, those little theatres, if they have got a little local connection, can do it.

5411. Mr. Locke.] When you pay 150 l. a year for a theatre, does that include properties?—There are very seldom any in a country theatre.

5412. How do the actors dress themselves?—Every manager has a wardrobe of his own. You may find some scenery, but you are better without it, and have your own in those little places; but Mr. Saville has had that theatre for a considerable time, and it is in very excellent repair now.

5413. Chairman.] Does the drama pay in the provinces now as it used to do?—If you would only allow them to build theatres it would pay a hundred times better; in small towns of 10,000 inhabitants, for instance. There is Kingston, it would pay to open a theatre every night during the year. I went to Croydon with a travelling theatre, and stopped nine months there, and played every night.

5414. Had you large audiences?—Yes, up to 900.

5415. That was a temporary theatre?—Yes. I had all the principal country gentlemen in the neighbourhood.

5416. Is that lately?—Yes; I have done nothing but travelling the county of Surrey, my native county, lately; there is one of the richest gentry in the neighbourhood, Mr. Cressingham, and one of our performances was under his patronage. (The Witness handed a sample play-bill to the Committee.)

5417. Mr. Locke.] Now, the section of the Act of Parliament to which you alluded was the 23d section?—The last section.

5418. No, it is the last but two; "Interpretation of Act"?—Yes.

5419. Section 23 says: "And be it enacted, that in this Act the words 'stage play,' shall be taken to include every tragedy, comedy, farce, opera, burletta, interlude, melodrama, pantomime, or other entertainment of the stage, or any part thereof;" then it goes on with this proviso, "provided always that nothing herein contained shall be construed to apply to any theatrical representation in any booth or show which by the Justices of the Peace, or other persons having authority in that behalf, shall be allowed in any lawful fair, feast, or customary meeting of the like kind"?—Yes.

5420. Now is it under that section that you make make your applications to the magistrates to be allowed to act?—No; we apply in the regular way for a license if we fancy that there will be any opposition.

5421. In the first place you cannot act in any place that is not licensed as a theatre?—Just so.

5422. That is by a former section of the Act of Parliament, is it not?—Yes; that is the 11th section, I think.

5423. "And be it enacted, that every person who for hire shall act or present, or cause, permit, or suffer to be acted or presented, any part in any stage play, in any place not being a patent theatre or duly licensed as a theatre, shall forfeit such sum as shall be awarded by the court in which, or the justices by whom, he shall be convicted, not exceeding 10 l. for every day on which he shall so offend;" is that the section?—Yes.

5424. But you can go to any place with your troupe of actors, and then apply to the justices?—Yes.

5425. Then what is it you apply for; because you do not apply under this 23d section, inasmuch as that is for permission to be allowed to play "in any booth or show which is to be allowed in any lawful fair, feast, or customary meeting, of the like kind;" so that the magistrates if you go at any ordinary time when there is no "fair, feast, or customary meeting of the like kind," have not the power to grant a license?—That is the very argument.

5426. That they have not the power to grant you a license for playing in such a place at such times?—Yes.

5428. But if you go at any ordinary time when nothing of the sort is going on in the town, they consider that they have no right to give you a license?—Yes, and the same with regard to a permanent building.

5429. It cannot be the same, because the section mentions "booth or show"?—Yes.

5430. That is a proviso which says, whatever may be enacted in the 11th or other sections, it shall not apply to any of those occasional licenses granted for the performance of theatrical entertainments in booths or shows?—Yes.

5431. Suppose you go down to any place and there is not a fair at the time or anything of that kind, and suppose there is a theatre in the town which is licensed, what is the course which is pursued by the magistrates?—We should never go to a town where there was a licensed theatre, nor within three miles of it.

5432. Chairman.] Why not?—It might be a gentleman that I might want an engagement with, within a twelvemonth.

5433. Mr. Locke.] Your only application is under this 23d section then, namely, that you should be allowed to play in a booth or show?—Yes; but you have not seen the evil of the Act yet; suppose I were to go into a town like that, what would be the consequence.

5434. You mean a town which has no licensed theatre?—Yes.

5435. At any ordinary time of the year when there was no fair?—Yes.

5436. What do you do first?—We put out our bills, and in nine cases out of 10 there is no notice taken of it; but in the 10th case there may be.

5437. Chairman.] What notice is taken in the tenth case?—They send down to say that you shall not play.

5438. Who send down?—The magistrates.

5439. Mr. Locke.] That is when you have not obtained a license from the magistrates?—Yes.

5440. In some cases they take no notice; in some cases they proceed against you; and in other places when you do make your application, they say that it is not competent to them to grant you a license, inasmuch as there is no fair or feast going on, which makes it legal for them to grant it?—There is a little difference there; the reason why they cannot grant this license is that it is not a building, in their mind, within the meaning of the Act, to be licensed.

5441. But then it would be a licensed building; there is first the license of a permanent building as a theatre, which is granted in London by the Lord Chamberlain, and in the country by the magistrates?—Yes.

5442. But we are not talking of that, because you say that you would not go within three miles of a town where there was a licensed building?—But if you were obliged to have a license, whether there was a theatre or not, you would reckon yourself a much more respectable member of society. The magistrates say that it is not a building within the meaning of the Act to be licensed.

5443. That is the building?—Yes, that is what I want a license for.

5444. They say that they cannot license that temporary building as a theatre?—No.

5445. But you think you might be allowed to come in under the 23d section?—Yes.

5446. And then they say that is not the right time, because they can only do it when there is a "fair, feast, or customary meeting of the like kind," going on; but they can license you when there is?—You can go in then, and they take no notice of you; there is no license required for that; when there is a fair or feast, there never has been yet.

5447. The Act says, "Provided always that nothing herein contained shall be construed to apply to any theatrical representation in any booth or show, which, by the justices of the peace, or other persons having authority in that behalf, shall be allowed in any lawful fair, feast, or customary meeting of the like kind." That section may be ambiguous, but that is the section under which you apply?—Yes.

5448. You never take your troupe when there is a licensed theatre in a town?—No.

5449. Yours is a travelling theatre?—Yes, it is a travelling theatre, visiting towns where there are no theatres. I should say that in the United Kingdom we have 800 of these travelling theatres, and they would all be very pleased to take out a license in a proper manner. I know very well that if that license was obtainable in many parts of England they would have nice little theatres in the country spring up as fast as music rooms.

5450. And yours would spring down?—I should be glad to get rid of it.

5451. But you would have a permanent theatre, would you not?—Yes.

5452. You might have that now, might you not?—Yes, but I do not want to risk money.

5453. What is it you do want?—Nothing.

5454. You have no grievance?—Yes, I have; I want to be sure that a license cannot be stopped by theological views, or anything of that kind; there there may be eight or nine magistrates, and five or six may be against it.

Mr. W. T. Simpson.

5455. How many magistrates must there be to license you?—There must be four to sign it; I think you will find that in the Metropolitan Police Act.

5456. That cannot apply in the country, but it might apply in Croydon, for instance?—It applies very strongly there.

5457. How would you propose that this license should be granted; first of all you would say that there would be some inquiry into the character of the person who applies?—Yes.

5458. To whom would you have the application made?—To some party who would grant a license irrespective of party feeling; any head centre, provided they were backed with bondsmen for the well conducting of the same to a moderate amount.

5459. You mean to say that a magistrate should not bring into the performance of his duty his private notions of the propriety or morality of theatres?—Yes.

5460. If the law of the land establishes a man's right to perform in a theatre as well as to do any other act to get his living, you think he should be entitled to do it?—Yes.

5461. You say that a prejudice against theatres exists in many magistrates; some of them set themselves against all theatres, and will not have them exist?—Yes, I have heard them say so.

5462. Just the same as with regard to public-houses; some magistrates who are teetotallers may not like to grant a license?—Yes.

5463. But you think that that is not the province of a magistrate?—I know an instance at Walsall, where I have had another journey of 16 miles four or five times to put in the notice for a license. I had to go four times before we could get the magistrates to meet to the number of four on the Bench. At last they met, and the very gentleman that had an objection to theatres was there; he was against it, and the other three were for it. I went there a fortnight after that, and that gentleman was not on the Bench, and they said, "certainly."

5464. They gave you the license?—Yes.

5465. So it is quite uncertain whether or not you will be allowed to carry on your calling in any particular town?—Yes.

5466. You have never performed in any licensed theatre, I suppose?—Yes, I performed for 13 years in London.

5467. I mean in the country?—Not now; I have performed in every theatre royal.

5468. You do not take your company there?—No.

5469. Is there any theatre at Maidstone?—No, it is a shoemaker's shop now.

5470. Do you know Guildford?—Yes.

5471. Is there any theatre there?—There is the remains of it.

5472. It is now an upholsterer's shop, is it not?—I do not know; it was in a dreadful dilapidated state 16 or 18 years ago.

5473. Have they any permanent theatre at Croydon now?—No.

5474. Used they to have one?—Yes, they used to have a very nice little theatre, but it is given up.

5475. Chairman.] Why is it given up?—It was a little quiet town then, when the people went out town to enjoy themselves. They could go to a theatre in London, but now Croydon is a second London.

5476. Mr. Locke.] But that cannot be the reason why it is given up?—The only reason is, that they would be doubtful whether the magistrates would grant a license.

5477. Chairman.] Cannot they ascertain that before building a theatre?—No, the magistrates must see the building first.

5478. Colonel Sturt.] The license would be liable to be taken away next year?—Yes; it was proposed the other day, whenever I could get a license, to raise 5,000 l. in shares for a theatre.

5479. Mr. Locke.] Do you think the magistrates generally, I do not say invariably, set their faces against theatrical entertainments?—Yes.

5480. How do you account for that?—I cannot say, but I was talking with one, and he said that there should be no such people as theatrical people, and no theatres.

5481. What sort of people did he say there should be?—I cannot say; he said "Move off"; I said I would stop. I think it is very hurtful to human nature to be treated like rogues and vagabonds, and not like honest men; why not let me live within the Act of Parliament.

5482. You think that this Act should be altered?—Yes, I do play other things every night, and charge for it, and the Act does not touch me, and then I open the doors and play Othello for nothing.

5483. Why do you play Othello for nothing?—I must not charge for it; I may for the previous entertainment, but that would bring me within the meaning of the Act.

5484. Colonel Sturt.] You have studied that Act pretty well, have you not?—Yes, I have had cause to do so; I have lost a good many hundreds of pounds which my family ought to have.

5485. But acting for nothing would hardly suit your purpose, would it?—Yes, it does when I am paid for the first portion of the performance.

5486. Do you turn them out and let them in again?—No; I say, "You may go out, the performance is over."

5487. But you have incurred the penalty by your first performance?—No; I play a ballet first.

5488. Mr. Locke.] Are you not aware that a ballet has been held to be a performance of the stage?—It has been decided the other way by all the country justices where I have been.

5489. Then the country justices have taken a more reasonable view than some of the London ones?—I have one very close to me who would soon stop me if he could; but I play a ballet every night.

5490. Can you give us any particular decisions by country magistrates on this point with regard to what is a performance of the stage within the meaning of the 23rd section of the 6th and 7th Victoria?—There have been so many opinions given about it.

5491. I mean with regard to the country?—For instance, having a stage in a concert-room does not constitute a theatre.

5492. If you had no performers it would not amount to anything, of course?—But, if you have singing in character dresses it does not constitute a stage performance.

5493. Chairman.] Has that been decided by the country magistrates?—Yes.

5494. Where has that been decided?—It was somewhere in Kent.

5495. Do

5495. Do you mean where people sing together?—No, where there is only one.

5496. But have those questions been tried before country magistrates continually?—They have not, because there is no restriction over the concert-rooms in the country at all.

5497. But have such questions arisen and been decided?—I remember a case in Kent; somebody had a theatre; and there was one at Norwich, against a music hall there; they overruled that; they said that it was not a stage play.

5498. Mr. Locke.] What was that performance?—It was a concert.

5499. Have you any knowledge of any particular case where the magistrates have decided that ballet was not a performance of the stage?—I can give you a case where the real drama was decided not to be a performance of the stage.

5500. What was that?—"Timour the Tartar," and "Mazeppa."

5501. Where was that decided?—It was performed in a circus at Norwich, and the manager of the theatre, Mr. Sydney, indicted them.

5502. Where was the case tried?—In Norwich.

5503. Before whom was it tried?—It is within four years.

5504. Was it at the quarter sessions?—I was not there; I only read it in the newspapers. The decision was, that it had always been allowed in circuses in Norwich before, and they did not look upon it as a play represented on the stage.

5505. Mr. Selwyn.] Was that the decision before the magistrates?—Yes.

5506. Mr. Locke.] That was at the petty sessions, I suppose?—I should think so. Mr. Sydney is manager of the Norwich Theatre, Colchester Theatre, and Richmond Theatre.

5507. He indicted the circus people, or rather he summoned them before the magistrates to be fined?—Yes, and the magistrates said that they were not plays to be taken notice of as theatrical representations, because they had been allowed in circuses ever since they could remember.

5508. Chairman.] Do you remember what troupe that was?—I cannot recollect, but it is rife in every one's ear in Norfolk.

5509. Mr. Ducane.] What is the general character of your performances?—Here is another play bill of a performance that was given under the patronage of the Lord of the Manor at Mitcham (handing in another play bill).

5510. Do you find that such plays as the "Lady of Lyons," or the "Honey Moon," which I see on these bills, pay better than burlesques, break-down dancers, and nigger songs?—We get more money from those plays because respectable people come, and it brings a 6*d.* gallery instead of a 3*d.* one.

5511. You say that if there was a permanent theatre in every town you would give up your itinerant course?—Yes, if I could get a license.

5512. You mean if there was free trade?—Yes.

5513. Colonel Sturt.] Are you at liberty to give any plays that you like?—Yes. I could not do my new piece; we never play only old comedies, the legitimate drama.

5514. You could not give a piece that had not been passed in London?—No, it is no use to us unless it is well known; they say, "We can have a little outline of it here, and that will be as good as seeing it in London."

5515. Mr. Locke.] I think the section of the Metropolis Police Act to which you allude, is the 46th section of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47?—Yes, I dare say.

5516. That section enacts: "That it shall be lawful for the said Commissioners of Police, by order in writing, to authorise any superintendent belonging to the metropolitan police, with such constables as he may think necessary, to enter into any house or room kept or used within the said district for stage plays or dramatic entertainments into which admission is obtained by payment of money, and which is not a licensed theatre, at any time when the same shall be open for the reception of persons resorting thereto, and to take into custody all persons who shall be found therein without lawful excuse; and every person keeping, using, or knowingly letting any house or other tenement for the purpose of being used as an unlicensed theatre shall be liable to a penalty not more than 20*l.*, or, in the discretion of the magistrate, may be committed to the House of Correction, with or without hard labour, for a time not more than two calendar months; and every person performing or being therein without lawful excuse shall be liable to a penalty not more than 40*s.*" That is the section of the Act of Parliament to which you alluded, and which could have been applied against you at Croydon, or any place within the metropolitan district?—Just so.

5517. Lord Eustace Cecil.] Are drinking and smoking allowed in your temporary theatre?—No; but you cannot help the public smoking. When I say that drinking is not allowed, men will go and fetch themselves a pint of beer, but we do not sell it.

5518. You allow refreshments, then, I suppose?—Yes; apples, nuts, oranges, and ginger-beer. We do not profess to sell beer.

5519. If they wanted bread and cheese or a mutton chop, they could not get it?—No; such luxuries are not to be found in our little theatres.

5520. Chairman.] With regard to the music halls, have you seen much of the music halls in country places?—Wherever I have been I have seen them.

5521. You have made a point of going to see them?—I generally go to see the "Era," the theatrical newspaper; they take it in there.

5522. You do not seem to approve of the way in which the music halls are carried on at some of the small towns?—Unless they are carried on after the same fashion as they are in London, if you were to see them you would say so. Take Dudley, where there are 60,000 inhabitants; go into one of the great places there, which are all like glass; you cannot hear a word; there is the music, and there is a collier and his wife fighting, and a child crying, and that they call a concert-room; it is all in front of the bar.

5523. Suppose you go to some place with your theatre, do the people conduct themselves in a more orderly manner when they are inside your theatre?—Yes; I have always found the colliers very well behaved in my theatre.

5524. Is that because they are interested in the pieces?—Yes; I have had 700 or 800 navigators present at one time, and they never interrupt the performance in any way.

5525. But suppose that the same performances were given at the music-halls, would the people conduct conduct themselves well?—Yes, but the music-halls would not care about that; it is merely the ready penny; but if there was a restriction over them, and they were obliged to obtain a certain license, they would imitate the London houses, and make it a place of entertainment; it looks like a place of debauch at present.

Mr. W. T. Simpson.

5526. Are they not forced to take out a license?—No, not any; there is no one to interfere with them.

5527. Mr. Locke.] They must obtain a spirit license?—They have that already.

5528. But there is no music and dancing license in the country, is there?—It is 15 miles round London, I think.

5529. Chairman.] As soon as you get over the border of the 15 miles round London, you get into a different style of music-halls?—You must get further away to the north, where the population is large enough; Staffordshire, Shropshire, and so on; it is more in the towns.

5530. But are music-halls more disorderly in the country than public-houses?—A hundred per cent. more; the public-house is an old-fashioned little place; but the music-hall is quite different, and the customers do not agree with the place at all.

5531. Have you anything else to add to your evidence?—I think that if you will let us have free trade in theatres, we shall show you that the drama is not so much destroyed as has been represented before this Committee.

5532. Mr. Locke.] With respect to that distance of 15 miles round London, the Act which regulates the distance is the 25th of George the Second, c. 36, s. 2, which has the words, "From and after the 1st day of December 1752 any house, room, garden, or other place kept for public dancing, music, or other public entertainment of the like kind, in the cities of London and Westminster, or within 20 miles thereof, without a license had for that purpose," and so on. The distance, then, is 20 miles, is it not?—I see I was wrong; it is 20 miles.

Mr. JOHN GREEN, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Green.

5533. Mr. Locke.] I BELIEVE you are lessee of Evans's?—Yes.

5534. How long have you conducted Evans's?—I have been proprietor for 22 years.

5535. Have you been manager likewise?—I have been managing and identified with places of musical entertainments over 40 years.

5536. Is it 20 years ago that you became manager of Evans's?—I became manager of Evans's in 1844.

5537. Whom did you succeed?—Mr. Evans.

5538. Mr. Evans was a singer, was he not?—He was an actor; we were both actors together in the same theatre.

5539. Where was that?—At Worthing, at the old English Opera House, and for a short time at Covent Garden.

5540. Did Mr. Evans die, then?—Yes.

5541. Was it upon his death that you succeeded?—No; it was years before his death; he died in 1855, and I became proprietor in 1844.

5542. But after you became proprietor of Evans's in 1844, used Mr. Evans to take the chair there?—Never; not while I was either conductor of the music, nor while I was proprietor.

5543. Then, he left it altogether?—He retired from the chair when I went there.

5544. And you took it?—I did.

5545. You took the chair nightly?—I did.

5546. Do you do so now?—No, and I have not done so for years.

5547. It is changed since then?—Yes, surely.

5548. When you first went there in 1842, it was a different place from what it is now?—Yes.

5549. I think at that time there were no performances at all?—There was always singing.

5550. But no performances on the stage?—No, nor are there any performances on the stage now.

5551. But nothing was done on the stage at all?—No, it was merely tables, songs, and suppers.

5552. Persons sat round the table and sang songs, the same as you might do in any private house?—Yes.

5553. When was it that you first made an alteration in the building?—The first alteration in the building was in 1851.

5554. That was the Exhibition year?—Yes, and subsequently I made an alteration in 1855.

5555. Had you altered your mode of proceeding previous to 1851, when you made your first alteration?—Yes.

5556. What had been done when you first changed from the mere ordinary sitting round the table; what was the first thing that you introduced?—A small elevation that could scarcely be called a stage; perhaps three feet high, to enable one or two people to sing a comic song; the room crowded and it was necessary to do it in order to place the people so that everybody could see and hear.

5557. Then in 1851, you placed this contrivance for the persons to stand on who sang, but was there any other innovation?—None whatever, except an improvement in the music, and a large improvement and increase in the choir; formerly we had three singers. Mr. Evans used to sing, I used to sing, and people who are now eminent used to sing, and people eminent in every phase of life used to come and see us.

5558. You also used to sing at the Cyder Cellars, did you not?—Yes, I conducted the Cyder Cellars years before.

5559. They had a large room at the Cyder Cellars, had they not?—There was a large room built; the old room was a little place that would hold a dozen people.

5560. That was in Maiden-lane?—Yes.

5561. Then there was another place; Ben Morgan's?—Yes.

5562. But there was never any singing worth notice there?—No.

5563. That is the place introduced in "Society," is it not?—I have not seen it; there was Offley's, the Cyder Cellars, Evans's, and the Coal Hole; the Old Coal Hole in the Strand.

5564. Where Edmund Kean used to go and take the chair?—Yes; I have been there with him.

5565. What was the next thing that you introduced at Evans's after the small stage?—Only an increase of the choir.

5566. Now there is a stage, and tumbling on it, is there not?—Yes; acrobatic performances.

5567. And very large choruses?—Yes.

5568. You

5568. You have got a large chorus, have you not?—Yes; about 23 performers for glees, madrigals, and choruses, every night.

5569. You have a great many boys there?—No women, only boys.

5570. You have chorus singers besides boys?—Yes.

5571. It is 23, including boys?—Yes; about 12 boys and 11 men.

5572. Then in addition to that, have you acrobatic performances and songs?—Yes.

5573. Mr. Sydney used to sing there?—He did.

5574. He has left, has he not?—He has.

5575. What have you in addition to that?—Nothing but acrobatic performances and singing.

5576. Now, I believe, no females are admitted at Evans's?—Never in the singing-room.

5577. But are there boxes to which they are admitted?—There is a small gallery connected with the hotel, that will hold a dozen females, and there have been 16 or 18 there; that is connected with the hotel, quite away from the singing-room. I never saw a woman in the room nor did I ever permit one.

5578. I believe that nothing can be conducted with greater propriety than Evans's?—I think not.

5579. That is the general opinion which I have heard expressed, and I presume you do not differ from it?—No; I am the father of the music-halls, but I am ashamed of some of my children; I do not want to own them.

5580. Do you consider that it would be an advantage to you if you were enabled to make any alteration in the amusement that you afford to the public at Evans's, introducing something else on to the stage?—I do not see that it would be an advantage to me at all, I do not desire it; it can be in no way advantageous to me.

5581. You think that the entertainment which you now have is all that is requisite for your public?—Yes; improve it as much as possible, but not give a dramatic or theatrical stage performance.

5582. But your case is rather different from the others, persons come in after the theatre to Evans's?—Mine is essentially a supper house.

5583. On the University Boat-race night, you are pretty full, are you not?—It is the only place that the young people can come to with any credit to themselves.

5584. There is always a song written for the occasion, is there not?—Mr. Sydney always writes a song for any special occasion; the Cattle-show week, the Derby week, and the Boat-race week, or any particular event.

5585. Those songs attract a great number of persons?—The events attract the people, but the songs were found desirable.

5586. They are very much applauded, I suppose?—Certainly.

5587. A good many members of the universities and public schools used to come there?—Certainly.

5588. On Eton and Harrow match day, it was pretty full?—Yes; all the scholastic meetings, and matters in any way connected with universities and great public schools, more or less, are celebrated at my place.

5589. Are those songs published?—So far as I know, entirely; there may be exceptions, but as a rule, yes.

5590. Who has published them?—I cannot say. I believe there are some published in Rathbone-place, and some have been published at Cramer's in Regent-street, and some in other places.

5591. But there is no collection of them?—I never saw or heard of a collection of them; they are published singly.

5592. Lord Eustace Cecil.] I understand you say that no ladies or women are allowed at Evans's?—Never.

5593. Colonel Sturt.] Do you not think that the present system of restriction is detrimental to the interests of dramatic authors?—Yes; but it requires some consideration to qualify that. The power that I have is enormous; the power that the public caterers have for the entertainment and amusement of the public is simply and really immense. It is a system of education in itself. There are 40,000 people who go to theatres and places of entertainment in London every night; that is, 240,000 people weekly, and in London alone one-third of the population, or over 1,000,000 of the inhabitants, go to places of entertainment annually; for what? It is in the power of the Executive to make the people better.

5594. What Executive?—Those who have the charge of making Acts of Parliament.

5595. You would be very sorry to see the music-halls thrown open for dramatic performances, I suppose?—No, on the contrary. I vote most cordially for free trade in those places; but let us trade in a respectable and proper article. Do not degrade or damage our fellow-creatures.

5596. Would you object to a burlesque or a pantomime at music-halls?—Not if they are refined: not coarse.

5597. You would submit them to a censorship?—Certainly; I would have them most severely watched, that the people may be refined and made better. I mean, if we watch over and purify these things we do service to our fellow-creatures, and it would be doing a noble act.

5598. Would the present censorship of the Lord Chamberlain be sufficient, in your opinion?—I should say that it should be considerably enlarged.

5599. You think that it is not strict enough?—I do not say that it is not strict enough, but I think that it might be enlarged. The entertainment of the people is education; the drama was a gigantic system of education; and the entertainment of the people should be cared for, watched for, and so their condition would be improved.

5600. But the ordinary run of burlesques given in London are perfectly unobjectionable, are they not?—Certainly.

5601. You would not object to have these burlesques at music-halls, would you?—No; but I do not see how that could be done.

5602. Chairman.] Why not?—Because the places are not large enough. I think that I have the largest area in London, but it is not fit for a theatre.

5603. Colonel Sturt.] What do you think of the "Alhambra"?—That is a very large place, with capabilities, and I think it should be a theatre.

5604. Would you have smoking, eating, and drinking put down there?—I do not believe in the morality of sex gatherings under the influence of drink. I would not have smoking, eating, and drinking. I would appeal to the intellect; I would have no smoking, eating, and drinking in that particular part, but as much as you like in places proper for it.

Mr. J. Green.

5605. Chairman.] But you have smoking, eating, and drinking at your place, have you not?—Yes.

5606. But why not have it in music halls?—Because there are women there; mine is a supper house, it has ever been advertised as a supper and music room.

5607. Mr. Locke.] What time does your performance begin?—At eight o'clock.

5608. Chairman.] Smoking, eating, and drinking you do not mind, but smoking, eating, and drinking in the presence of women you object to?—Yes, I object to smoking, eating, and drinking in the sex gatherings. I do not believe in the morality of men and women getting together under the influence of drinking and smoking.

5609. But you are aware that that takes place abroad?—Yes, I know it does take place on the Continent, but that is a different thing.

5610. You put it down to the difference in education?—Certainly, the women are educated differently.

5611. Do you think that they are more moral abroad than they are here?—Without undertaking to say what they are elsewhere, the women abroad publicly are as moral as they can be.

5612. You say that the caterers for public amusement have hold of a great engine for education?—I think it should be education; if it be not education, it is nothing.

5613. Do you look to that in the selection of songs at "Evans's"?—Yes, I print every one.

5614. Do you think it is more than an amusement going to "Evans's"; do you think that a man is wiser or better the next morning for having been there?—I will not undertake to say that, but I know this, that he can do no possible harm at "Evans's."

5615. But do you think it is an education for him?—Yes, in music, and by printing the poetry; I print everything but the comic songs.

5616. Those you do not print?—No, but there is no reason why I should not do so.

5617. Mr. Locke.] Little books of the words are put on the table for the public?—Yes, I give them to the public.

5618. Chairman.] But you think that it is a better educational exercise to go to a supper room such as "Evans's" than to go to a music hall such as the "Alhambra"?—There is very little music heard there.

5619. I thought it was music of a very high character?—Where the sexes go and meet, art is neglected; treated with contempt, and frequently despised.

5620. Is art neglected at the Opera house, do you think?—No.

5621. But the sexes meet there?—That is another affair.

5623. Sir Arthur Buller.] Would you go the length of saying that the sexes should not meet there?—I say decidedly that the sexes should meet, but under certain restrictions.

5624. Colonel Sturt.] Do you mean that those places are a sort of casino?—Decidedly.

5625. Sir Arthur Buller.] You think that smoke has a great effect on the morality of the female sex, do you; and, in fact, that smoking and drinking injures the morals and the intellect?—No, I did not intend to say that.

5626. I think your words implied as much; but at all events, I suppose you think that women have now-a-days become accustomed to smoking; certainly in the middle class?—I am afraid that they have.

5627. Pretty nearly as much as they are abroad?—Yes.

5628. Smoking does not really injure the female character, does it?—Certainly the smoking cannot; it has nothing to do with character.

5629. Mr. Clive.] Seriously, you object to the music halls as at present conducted?—Just so; I object to the conducting of them; not to the music halls; I want a larger entertainment for the people; I think it is vitally important that the people should have abundance of entertainment and amusement, but it should be of a healthy character, a character that may do them good.

5630. In any changes of the law that may be made, you would think that the supervision now given to theatres should be extended to the music halls?—I think so.

5631. You think that the character of public entertainment should not be left to the taste of the public, but that there should be a certain amount of Government supervision over them?—Certainly.

5632. You do not think that you could with safety leave the proprietors of music halls to conduct their establishments entirely as they liked?—No; I think it is a power which should not be conceded to any individual.

5633. Then do you object to the present system of licensing?—I have not given that much consideration.

5634. You have a license from year to year, I suppose?—I have a license for music; and I have the ordinary Victuallers' license.

5635. That license for music is given you by the magistrates?—Yes.

5636. Mr. Locke.] Is your license only for music?—That is all; not for music and dancing.

5637. Chairman.] Have you heard of any inconvenience being experienced from that system of licensing by the magistrates?—No; I think the only liberty that should be extended to music-halls is to perform what they now do; that is to say, dancing and dialogue. I have no doubt that dialogues according to the Act of Parliament, are illegal, and I have no doubt that dancing in the larger form is a theatrical representation. If it is not, where there are dresses and action, I do not know what is meant by theatrical representation.

5638. You are not one of those who complain very much of the existing legislation, on the whole?—I do not complain at all; all I desire is to try to give my humble views, and all I want is to make people better. I want to have public entertainments under such a supervision of the Government as should make our fellow creatures better. I think all the amusements of the people should have a healthy moral tone. I think that the refinement of the people should be a matter of considerable importance in the eye of a Government.

5639. With regard to songs, you have any songs sung that you choose, I suppose?—Surely.

5640. If you had different views from your present present views, you might have objectionable songs instead of having very proper songs at Evans's; there is no law to prevent you, is there?—I think that if any one were to sing indecent songs the law would have the power to prevent it.

5641. Have you heard of cases of indecent songs being stopped?—The police have never noticed them, that I know of.

5642. Do you think that that is a satisfactory state of things?—No, surely it is not desirable that any one should be at liberty to sing improper songs; 30 or 40 years ago, the standard, the model of entertainments of that sort in London, consisted of songs of a questionable character. I do not know that I should be giving pain in mentioning it (I certainly do not want to give pain to any one), but Sam Hall, and other songs of indecent and questionable character were, in point of fact, the stock-in-trade at the music-halls in those days. I was the first, I think, who introduced glees, in order to purify the system. I had my share in those things (I am speaking with candour, of course), and I was part and parcel of that system of smutty and indecent songs that were sung in those days, in so far as I was concerned for those establishments; but when Sam Hall came, I thought it was arriving at its very consummation, and I then said that these sorts of things must be purified; and I think that I deserve credit for being the first to dismiss from public places every sort of indecency and obscenity.

5643. You did that by appealing to the public taste?—Yes.

5644. But not by force of law?—Not by law; the public never knew it, or at least never felt it, because I printed the words and I introduced proper music; I quietly, so to speak, wedged out the smutty songs, and the public never knew that they had lost them.

5645. You proceeded by appealing to the public taste only, and not by the help of the law?—Just so.

5646. Do you think that the law ought to have interfered at the time, and stopped some of those indecent songs?—Certainly, on the ground of indecency.

5647. You think that was a defect of legislation?—Certainly.

5648. You think that all the music-halls should be under the same sort of supervision that the performances on the stage are?—Certainly.

5649. You do not think it is sufficient that the police should see that the conduct inside among the audience is orderly?—No; the question lies entirely in what is done on the stage, I think; I think that the question of vital importance lies on the stage; the other could be provided for easily and simply, but to give an entertainment on the stage is another question altogether.

5650. All plays are submitted to the Lord Chamberlain, and licensed by him?—Yes.

5651. Do you think it is necessary to submit the performances of the music-halls to the Lord Chamberlain?—If they were literary, or merely verbal, yes; but as they are not literary, or merely verbal, I do not know how you are to provide for them.

5652. Take your own songs, they are not submitted for any license whatever?—No.

5653. You could not rely on every one taking the same view as you do of the nature of a song, could you?—Very few I suspect would.

5654. Then do you think that at those music-halls, where comic songs are sung, the songs should come under the same license as plays?—I do not say the same license, but surely they ought to come under some sort of supervision.

5655. You would not rely on the public taste?—I should not rely on it, unless you educate it; it is just as likely to go wrong as anything else.

5656. Do you think that the public would hoot off anything that was improper, is that your view?—I would not undertake to say that for all places, but I am satisfied now, if songs of an indecent tendency or smutty character were sung at Evans's, half the people would go away.

5657. Is that because your establishment has got the reputation of being a decent one?—But why not all decent?

5658. Colonel Sturt.] It is rather a superior class of persons that come to your house?—Yes, the entertainment has been provided for that phase of society: but why not for all; why should not all share in the good?

5659. Mr. Locke.] You do not often go to other music-halls, I suppose?—I have gone to all of them.

5660. Whoever or whatever may have educated the public taste, is it not very much improved at all places of entertainment in London?—I believe the general tendency has improved wondrously, but there have been exceptions, and, I am very sorry to say, arising with women.

5661. In singing songs?—Yes.

5662. Do you mean improper songs?—Not precisely improper, but songs with inuendos and doubles entendres in them.

5663. You sometimes have that kind of thing on the stage, do you not?—Certainly.

5664. Quite as frequently as elsewhere?—No doubt, and we know, humanly speaking, that it is generally very well liked, but you can have fun without filth.

5665. You can have fun without those improper songs you mean?—They are not improper songs, but they are a little coarse.

5666. But at all events the Lord Chamberlain has the power of interfering with those things at the theatres?—Surely the Lord Chamberlain has.

5667. Chairman.] You mean that you have heard things on the stage which the Lord Chamberlain ought to have stopped?—Yes, certainly.

5668. If you were the Lord Chamberlain, you would be rather more strict than he is?—I should insist on the decencies of life before women.

5669. Do you think that that is not done now?—I am an old actor. We have all taken some little license; things were spoken that were never in the text at all. We have all had our share in it; we said things that were not quite up to the mark, and I remember that sometimes some of the actors were absolutely coarse.

5670. Mr. Locke.] But that is altered now, is it not?—For myself I do not know. I have not been in a theatre for some time.

5671. But you have been in music-halls?—Yes, and in theatres too, but some time since.

5672. Are you aware of any improper songs being sung in any of the music-halls?—Certainly not, what would be called an improper song. I believe that there is not one that could be fairly called improper. I have not heard such a thing.

5673. Do you not attribute that to the improvement of the public taste?—Certainly.

5674. You spoke of Sam Hall as the "consummation"?—Yes, but his song was very much misunderstood.

Mr. J. Green.

5675. Was there anything very improper in it?—No; but it was revolting in its blasphemy.

5676. But nothing indecent?—No; on the contrary, I think it was greatly misunderstood.

5677. That represented a chimney-sweep going to be hanged?—Yes; the performance was of the same type as Hogarth's (the first of humorists, satirists, and moralists) paintings are; as Churchill said (if the Committee will permit me to quote anything so coarse), "Hogarth looked at the back-side of everything." But why? That he might show up vice and wrong, and expose it, in order that it might be detested. If you look at Hogarth's paintings only for their coarseness and want of refinement, you do injustice to him; and so it was with Sam Hall.

5678. Sam Hall was misunderstood, then, you think?—Yes; many people went to see him, and looked at the song as merely a comic song, received it as blasphemous, and, indeed, there were blasphemous words in the song; but it was a piece of real tragedy of the kind, and was the only way in which a man like Sam Hall could develop his meaning.

5679. Colonel Sturt.] But still you objected to that song?—Yes, I objected to the blasphemy; the end of every verse was blasphemous; and a man who had no taste wrote something for that song which was very wicked, very very shocking.

5680. Did not the public taste reprobate that?—No; that was a verse written specially; that verse where the parson came, and so on.

5681. The people cheered that song a good deal, did they not?—Yes, the song brought all London to hear it; and for five years it supported the house, but it ruined the man and ruined the place.

5682. Mr. Locke.] Who was that song sung by?—Ross; I brought him to London.

5683. Colonel Sturt.] How do you mean that it ruined the place?—When the song lost its popularity the place lost its popularity.

5684. Chairman.] Have you anything further to add to your evidence?—No.

Mr. John Poole, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Poole.

5685. Chairman.] What is your connection with the music-halls?—I am Manager and Musical Director of the Metropolitan Music Hall, Edgware-road.

5686. Before you came to London had you any experience in the provinces?—Yes; I was manager and musical director of Mr. Holder's establishment in Birmingham.

5687. How long ago is it since you left Birmingham?—Two years ago.

5688. You were eight years in Birmingham, I believe?—Yes.

5689. Where were you before you were at Birmingham?—I was musical director and composer to the Theatre Royal, Norwich, and Ipswich, and all that district; and also Lynn and Colchester.

5690. At the theatres?—Yes.

5691. You have experience, therefore, both of theatres and music-halls?—Yes.

5692. Your experience of music-halls is a recent experience, because you were engaged in provincial theatres before?—Yes.

5693. You were at Norwich and at Lynn?—Yes.

5694. Did you hear the evidence given to day with regard to some decision at Norwich?—No.

5695. Are you acquainted with those circumstances?—No, not at all.

5696. You were engaged in those provincial theatres as musical composer?—Yes, I used to lead the band.

5697. You are a musician and not an actor?—Just so.

5698. Have you followed at all the fortunes of those theatres with which you were formerly connected?—No, not since I have left; I know that the Norwich theatre is still open and doing pretty well.

5699. Is it in the same hands?—Yes, the same lessee.

5700. Who is he?—Mr. William Sydney.

5701. I suppose he has had great experience there?—Yes.

5702. Have you been engaged in theatres in other parts of the country?—I was in the Birmingham theatre.

5703. Is Mr. Sydney one of the chief theatrical managers in that part of England?—Yes, he has three or four theatres.

5704. Were you engaged in some of the large music-halls in Birmingham?—Holder's is the largest.

5705. When was that music-hall founded?—I should say about 23 or 24 years ago; perhaps not quite so long; 20 years ago.

5706. Now what performances were there at that music-hall during the eight years that you were connected with it?—When I first went there I produced operatic selections; they were the chief portion of the entertainment.

5707. In the nature of a concert, I suppose?—Yes.

5708. Not in character or costume?—No.

5709. Have you had any experience of those difficulties with regard to the performances of the stage?—Yes, once or twice in Birmingham we produced a ballet there, two years and 10 months ago, and the lessee of the theatre, Mr. Simpson, sent us notice to stop the ballet.

5710. What happened?—We stopped the ballet.

5711. Did you fear that he would succeed in an action?—Yes, we felt fully assured that we were going past our license.

5712. You had a license for music and dancing, I suppose?—For music alone, I believe.

5713. Mr. Locke.] You have a license in Birmingham?—Yes.

5714. Under a local Act?—Yes.

5715. Chairman.] Did you have dialogues?—Yes, we used to include them.

5716. You had music and dialogues?—Yes.

5717. Did you ever go so far as to have three or four performers on the stage?—Yes, we have encroached that much.

5718. Did you become more careful after this threat of an action?—Yes; they did not so much mind so long as we did not introduce certain dances; Mr. Simpson meant on one occasion to introduce a rifle dance that we had been doing, and Mr. Simpson said that we must discontinue that.

5719. He took the dance from you, and then asked asked you to discontinue it?—Yes; we went on after that, and he never interfered with us.

5720. But what was the view of your public?—They thought it was very mercenary, when there was only one music-hall and one theatre; at that time there was only one house; there are three now.

5721. Did you have large audiences generally?—The place, when I first went there, would hold 600 or 800, now it holds 2,500; it has been enlarged.

5722. Is it generally full now?—It does not fill quite so well at the present time.

5723. Not since you left?—Not since I left.

5724. Is there smoking, eating, and drinking there, just the same as in the London Music Halls?—Just the same.

5725. In the body of the building?—In every part.

5726. Have they tables?—Yes.

5727. And they call for their drink during the performances?—Yes.

5728. What are your performances at the Metropolitan Music Hall?—We are performing ballets, four-part songs, duetts, acrobatic entertainments, comic songs, and duologues.

5729. Have you ever had any trouble there with regard to performances of the stage?—No, not since I have been there.

5730. If you were not restricted by legislation, would you have the same performances that you have now, or would you change them?—We should change them, most decidedly.

5731. What would you do?—Farces, operas, burlesques of light characters, and ballets.

5732. Do you think that operettas would succeed?—Yes.

5733. Would they succeed with the same audience that you have now, or would you get another class?—Why not the same audience?

5734. You do not think that smoking, eating, and drinking, and the rushing about of waiters, and so on, would interfere with the listening to one of Offenbach's best songs?—No, we do not allow any waiters to move about while a song is being sung.

5735. Have you tables?—Yes.

5736. It is not like the Alhambra, I suppose?—It is not quite so large, but it is a very fine hall.

5737. What class of audience have you got?—It is a mixed audience; tradespeople.

5738. Do they come with their wives and daughters?—Yes.

5739. Have you got any views with regard to the desirability of any change in the law?—What I have stated, because I think it would be made a better entertainment, and more worthy of support.

5740. Mr. Stanley gave some evidence, and he said that he represented a good many of the music-halls; did he represent you among them?—I think not; I believe we do not belong to their society; Mr. Meacock does not.

5741. Are you sure that Mr. Stanley does not represent you?—I should say he does not.

5742. You have a little doubt, have you?—Yes, I had, because I heard Mr. Meacock say he intended to; but when he heard Mr. Stanley say that, he said I must withdraw.

5743. He did represent you then?—Yes, but he had no authority.

5744. For what?—For representing that establishment; Mr. Meacock had not paid the money or attended at any of the meetings.

5745. He does not feel that Mr. Stanley has compromised him in any way?—No.

5746. But if he had paid his subscription, Mr. Stanley would have represented him?—Just so.

5747. It is rather fortunate then that he had not paid his subscription?—Quite so.

5748. Mr. Meacock differs from Mr. Stanley?—Yes.

5749. In what particulars does he differ?—Mr. Stanley wishes a restriction to six people; I maintain that it would be very difficult to give a representation in a creditable manner with six individuals, especially a burlesque or ballet; consider a ballet with six people!

5750. Mr. Locke.] Mr. Stanley suggested six people, unless they were Ethiopians?—Yes.

5751. Chairman.] Have you heard that any of the other music hall proprietors object to his evidence?—I do not know that I have.

5752. You wish for perfect competition?—Yes.

5753. Mr. Stanley said he thought that if the music hall proprietors had permission to act larger pieces with eight, or nine, or 10 people, they would do so?—I have no doubt they would.

5754. Mr. Stanley maintains that they would ruin themselves?—If the law permitted it. I do not think they would be so foolish as to do it; if they thought that it would not pay they would withdraw it.

5755. Mr. Stanley thought that they required a law to prevent them from ruining themselves?—It is very kind of him.

5756. But that is not your view?—No.

5757. Is your establishment a company?—No; it is the property of Mr. Meacock.

5758. Was it ever a company?—Yes.

5759. What was the capital?—20,000 l.

5760. Does the building and the whole establishment represent a capital of about 25,000 l.?—Yes.

5761. Could you at all tell us the profits derived from it; what is the price for admission?—One shilling stalls, 9*d.* balcony, and 6*d.* area.

5762. With regard to the consumption of liquor, have you any objection to state the average receipts from liquor?—That is a department I have nothing to do with.

5763. You only know about the musical department?—Yes; I only know about the musical department, not about the refreshment department.

5764. You are there every evening, I suppose?—Yes.

5765. And I presume you see every man taking something?—Yes.

5766. Should you think that anybody took less than 6*d.* worth?—I think that is about the average.

5767. About the same as the price for admission?—I think so; about 6*d.* every person.

5768. Have you got any interest in the concern?—No; I am a paid servant.

5769. You think that every one spends about the same sum of money there, as the price of entrance?—Yes, about the same.

5770. Mr. Locke.] Where is your hall situated?—It is the Metropolitan, in the Edgeware-road.

5771. How far up the road is it?—About 12 doors past the Harrow-road.

5772. You say that if you had the power to do so, you would introduce light pieces, farces, operettas, and ballets?—Yes.

Mr. J. Poole.
11 May 1866.

5773. You think that that would answer?—I am sure of it.

5774. Heavy tragedy, I presume, would not answer?—No, we should not do anything in the sensational drama style, or play, or tragedy.

5775. Was not there some question at Birmingham about Pepper's Ghost?—Yes.

5776. When was that?—It was in my time; perhaps three years ago, or a little more.

5777. Did the manager of the theatre take action with regard to that against the music hall?—Yes.

5778. What took place then; first of all, what was the performance in which this ghost was introduced?—There were several illusions; in fact, we played little plays.

5779. What was the piece?—It was a man coming home late at night, and coming into a room he sees a ghost; he rushes to the chair; he sees a female in his bed-chamber; he makes a rush at her, and, of course, she vanishes.

5780. The manager of the theatre objected to that as being a performance of the stage under the 6 & 7 Victoria?—Yes.

5781. What proceedings were taken?—Mr. Simpson had made an arrangement with Mr. Pepper to produce a ghost at his place, and we made an arrangement with a gentleman of the name of Sylvester, who was in some way connected with Mr. Pepper.

5782. He had a ghost of his own?—He had an improved ghost, and this ghost we advertised to come to Holder's; we announced it.

5783. Then did you announce it as Sylvester's ghost?—Yes, "The ghost will appear every evening"; Mr. Simpson served us with a notice that he would sue us.

5784. Did you proceed with the ghost?—Yes, we did.

5785. How many times did it appear?—It ran eight months.

5786. And at the end of eight months, proceedings was taken?—Proceedings were threatened.

5787. But not taken?—I think not.

5788. I thought there was a decision in one of the superior courts with regard to Birmingham?—No; we were served with a notice, but the performance was continued.

5789. You continued the ghost until it had left off drawing?—Yes; we continued it for eight or ten months.

5790. Then no proceedings were ever taken by Mr. Simpson, they were merely threatened?—Yes.

5791. On one occasion you gave way, but with the ghost you did not?—Just so.

5792. Mr. Clive.] Are the refreshments at the Metropolitan Music Hall let out to any person?—No.

5793. They are supplied by the owner?—Yes, by the proprietor.

5794. Colonel Sturt.] Did you ever hear it alleged that the principal profits of music halls were derived from the sale of liquors?—No.

5795. Sir Arthur Buller.] Bearing in view the difficulties which have arisen in the interpretation of such words as stage plays and so on, would you think if you wished to enlarge your power that you should have a general power to act what you chose, or could you safely draw a line such as to enable you to act burlesques, operattas, and certain specific light things?—I think it might be done.

5796. You think you could express that safely in words?—Yes.

5797. Colonel Sturt.] It would take a very clever lawyer to define a burlesque, would it not?—I do not know, really.

5798. Mr. Locke.] What should you say to the "Critic," in which a burlesque is introduced?—I do not know.

5799. Chairman.] Has the quality of the music given at your hall improved during the last two or three years?—Yes.

5800. And do you think that the public taste has improved?—Yes.

5801. You find that they prefer music of a higher class than they did six years ago?—Yes.

5802. To what do you attribute that improvement?—We have striven to give the public a musical education.

5803. You attribute it to your having gradually given a higher class of performances?—Yes.

5804. In vocal as well as instrumental music?—Quite the same.

5805. And with regard to the character of the songs, has the taste of your public improved?—Yes.

5806. Songs that would have been voted dull five or six years ago are popular now?—Yes, and quite appreciated.

5807. You distinctly state that you have varied the character of your entertainment for the better?—Yes.

5808. Would you think it a pity to substitute for good music indifferent farces?—I should make it all musical if I had my own way.

5809. If there were any change in the law, you would not yourself substitute farces for music?—No.

5810. But you would substitute operettas?—Yes.

5811. In place of what would you put them?—I should take out such things as tumbling, and all that description of thing.

5812. You would not give up the concert music that you give now?—Oh, dear, no!

J. Stirling Coyne, Esq., called in; and Examined.

J. S. Coyne, Esq.

5813. Chairman.] You are Secretary to the Dramatic Authors' Society, are you not?—Yes, and I am a dramatic author myself.

5814. Have you followed at all the inquiry that has been going on before this Committee?—I am tolerably well acquainted with the subject, but I cannot say that I have followed the evidence of the different witnesses.

5815. With regard to the dramatic authors, there are two points that have occupied the attention of the Committee; first, the effect of the Lord Chamberlain's license on the plays, the necessity of a censorship, and the other point is the effect on dramatic authors of the present limitation of the number of theatres. Now, with regard to the censorship of pieces, have you heard that there has been much inconvenience felt by the dramatic authors with regard to the necessity of submitting plays to the Lord Chamberlain?—I think myself that the system of the censorship is bad in principle, but that it has been administered with very great tenderness, and in a judicious manner, by Mr. Donne.

5816. You think it is bad in principle; do you think that the public taste would be sufficient to correct any pieces of immoral tendency that were performed?—No, I do not think so, but I would have the power placed in different hands.

5817. You do not object to the censorship in principle then?—No; I would have it more extended than it is now.

5818. Will you state your views on that subject?—I should suggest, that to make the censorship efficient it should be placed in the hands of an officer wholly independent of the Crown, or any other influences; that his powers should extend not only to the London theatres, but to the provincial theatres.

5819. Those provincial theatres cannot now act a play which is unlicensed, can they?—No, but the Lord Chamberlain has no control over the conduct of the theatres.

5820. But confining ourselves to the question of the censorship of pieces only, I understand you to say you think that that should be maintained in the hands of some officer?—Yes.

5821. As a dramatic author you have no objection that the pieces you write should be submitted to some public authority to see that there is nothing in the piece that offends against morality or against religion?—I see no objection, but I would have that power defined by law very strictly.

5822. Have you ever had passages struck out of some of your plays?—I am not aware of it. Some years ago I wrote a piece called "Lola Montes"; that that was a piece de circonstance about one of her escapades. It was licensed in the first instance, and played for two nights at the Haymarket Theatre. It was then suppressed by the Chamberlain; but afterwards, having been sent in to him with no alteration but a change of title to the "Pas de Fascination," it was performed again. That seemed something arbitrary and capricious, and all authors, of course, are subjected to the risk of the same excess of authority.

5823. The Lord Chamberlain passed the piece in the first instance?—Yes.

5824. And there had been no change in the office in the interval?—No, the piece was reproduced in about four or five days.

5825. What reason was alleged?—No reason was alleged.

5827. In what year was that?—That must have been in 1848.

5828. Was that piece supposed to allude to a particular king?—That was not intended, but it was at the time when Lola Montes was driven out of the country.

5829. The process was probably this; that Mr. Webster went to Mr. Donne and had a consultation with him, and pointed out to him what alteration would be sufficient?—Yes, I think an application was made.

5830. Do you think that was a capricious decision on the part of the Lord Chamberlain?—I think the thing should have been objected to in the first instance; or else, being admitted, that it should have been permitted to go on.

5831. But no great harm was done?—The run of the piece was stopped.

5832. Could you quote any other instances of grievances on the part of any other dramatic authors against the censorship?—No, I cannot call to mind any; I know that pieces have been subjected to the pruning knife of the censor.

5833. Do you know of cases where authors have been indignant at what has been cut out of their pieces?—I have heard complaints, but not to such an extent that the piece was supposed to be injured by such excisions.

5834. On that point, do I understand you to mean that the censorship in itself is not an evil, provided it can be placed in proper hands, and be sufficiently independent?—I think it should be in independent hands, and should also be limited as to points of morality and religion.

5835. One point of the censorship seems to be, that the direct representation of living persons on the stage is objected to, for instance, to put the King of Bavaria on the stage would be objected to by the Lord Chamberlain?—He was not put on the stage as the King of Bavaria, you might have suggested a resemblance, but it was not so in the piece; other pieces have been produced frequently with what might be called caricatures of living personages.

5836. Suppose a play were performed, where one of the sovereigns of Europe was put on the stage, would the Lord Chamberlain stop it or not?—I cannot say; this is the only instance that has come within my own knowledge that I recollect at present.

5837. Now, with regard to the licensing of more theatres, do you think that the present system stops the market (if I may so say) for dramatic pieces to any great extent. Taking what is called the monopoly of theatres, do you think that it prevents dramatic authors from finding a good market for their pieces?—Yes, certainly; I am for free trade, but let it be confined to theatres; I certainly say it should be extended without any limit; only I do not include music halls in that extension.

5838. You mean that you would like to see as as many theatres as possible?—Yes, certainly, as many as possible.

5839. Do you think in practice that there are sufficient theatres to meet the public demand now?—No; the fixed and floating population of London are more than sufficient to fill half as many more.

5840. Then, how is it that the present theatres are not always full?—The theatres may be badly situated, or badly conducted; a place may be conducted in a manner so as not to deserve the patronage or support of the public.

5841. Do you think that there are not enough good theatres?—There are not enough good theatres; I do not mean with regard to size; whether large or small if they were properly conducted, and with adequate companies, many more theatres than there are now in London would pay in my opinion.

5842. Are there actors enough to supply any more theatres, do you think?—There is a very great scarcity of actors, which I attribute to the manner manner in which they are distributed amongst music halls and small places of entertainment.

J. S. Coyne, Esq.

11 May 1866.

5843. Would you be in favour of throwing open the music halls for theatrical performances?—Certainly not.

5845. But would it create a demand for more pieces?—Certainly, pieces of such a character that dramatic authors would not write them; I do not see that they could perform pieces of such an intellectual character that dramatic authors would write them.

5846. The society that you represent, more or less, is not in favour of throwing open the music halls, you think?—That is a matter of individual opinion.

5847. But you, yourself, are not favourable to it?—No, certainly not; it would be most injurious to the drama, I think.

5848. But would it be most injurious to dramatic authors?—Yes, I think it would; it would prevent a greater number of regular theatres being opened, and stop the market for pieces by the better class of authors. In the music halls there would be pieces hashed up by any person; it would require no talent whatever to concoct such pieces, if we may judge by what they do at present. There may be exceptions at one or two of the halls; but I am speaking of the bulk of them.

5849. Are you acquainted with all the different actors?—Yes.

5850. What is their general view, so far as you can judge, with regard to the performance of theatrical pieces at music halls?—I think they are opposed to it entirely.

5851. Do they not think that it would create a great market for their services?—No, I think they would be very glad of an extension of theatres, but not of an extension of the music halls.

5852. The Committee have been informed that the salaries of actors have greatly increased in consequence of the music halls offering high salaries; is that your opinion?—I would not attribute it altogether to the music halls; there are more theatres now in London than there used to be, and there are various causes for the increase in salaries. The remunerations in all professions are higher than they were formerly, and I think that the remuneration to actors has risen in the same ratio.

5853. We have been told that a clever singer can make a good deal of money at a music hall by what are called "turns"?—That is true.

5854. Would not actors prefer getting a good deal of money at music halls to getting less at the theatres?—Singers can do it, I believe; but I do not see how actors could do it. You assume that an actor should go into one of those music halls and act a scene that would not occupy more than 20 minutes, and then be off to another place. A singer can do so, but I do not think that an actor could do it, at least not with advantage to himself, or his profession, or the drama generally.

5855. Now, in your view, would it be good policy to allow music halls to perform small pieces?—No, I think not.

5856. No pieces whatever?—No; I cannot reconcile the drama with smoking, eating, and drinking.

5857. Have you heard that abroad in the summer theatres they have smoking, eating, and drinking, and a very high class of theatrical performances too; do you see any incompatibility in the two things?—Yes, I have seen that abroad myself; but I can hardly think that the morals of this country would be benefited by copying those of Paris.

5858. We heard from one of the witnesses that public morals were better abroad than in England.—There may be a good deal of outward decency covering very great immorality.

5859. You would object to such a change, then, on the ground of morality?—Yes, on the ground of morality, and on the ground of upholding the drama.

5860. But cannot the drama hold itself up without legislation being specially made to prevent its degenerating; if there were no restriction on the music halls at all would not the drama be strong enough to be able to keep at a certain standard?—Yes, if you leave it to itself; but do not make it an inducement at a pot-house, where people drink and smoke; you prostitute the drama by doing so.

5861. But would you have the music halls restrained from giving those pieces?—I would restrain the drama from being given at a pot-house; I would restrain the music halls from having the drama as an additional inducement.

5863. You do not think that dramatic authors would find much market among music halls for pieces of high character?—No, certainly not; I think it would be impracticable to perform them in music halls.

5864. Take farces?—Even farces would be reduced to duologues; they would be cut down, and all the best parts taken out, so that a man and a woman might talk for 10 or 15 minutes.

5865. That is the case now, is it not?—Yes.

5866. But suppose they were permitted to give the whole of a farce, would not that be an improvement?—No; because anything that requires attention beyond duologue or song would go for nothing.

5867. Then they would not act such pieces; people would not go to see them?—Still, they would attempt something of the kind.

5868. But you say that now they take a portion of a piece which is as objectionable as it can be?—They generally take the broadest part.

5869. Is the public taste such that they like the broadest part of a farce the best?—Yes, in such places; but not in theatres.

5870. But at the music halls they like the broadest part the best?—Yes; there is more excitement and less restraint.

5871. Now,

5871. Now, with regard to the value of the pieces that are written, are the profits of dramatic authors larger now than they used to be?—Much larger. Do you speak with regard to the first sum which the author receives, the purchase-money, for the piece?

5872. Taking it in the most general way; is he better off on the whole; can he make more money in the long run than he could some time ago, or is he worse off?—He is better off; but that is to some extent, attributable to his now receiving fees for the representation of his plays in the country, which was not the case formerly. However, it is the management of the affairs of the Dramatic Society that has worked that result, and not to any great extent the number of theatres.

5873. The Committee would like to hear a little about the system in which dramatic authors are remunerated?—A dramatic author receives from the manager of a London theatre a certain sum for the right of acting a piece in London, either for a limited number of years, or for the entire copyright, and that piece belongs to the manager in London during the term of the arrangement, whatever that may be, but the copyright belongs to the author in the provinces. The author gives, through the secretary, permission to the managers of theatres in the provinces to play all the pieces on the list of the Dramatic Authors' Society for a certain sum per year or per month, according to the duration of the season. He sells the London right, and the London manager reserves the piece for his own theatre, generally for a term of three years, and then it reverts to the author, but the provincial right is in all cases reserved by the author himself.

5874. Then, how does he dispose of that right?—Take a given theatre: he agrees with the lessee of the Theatre Royal, Manchester, or rather the associated authors agree, that the manager of the Manchester Theatre shall have the right of playing all the pieces in their list for a certain sum annually.

5875. Then the author gets his share in the common fund. Suppose you have written a piece, and your piece is performed in the Theatre Royal, Manchester, do you get the money direct from the Theatre Royal?—No, it passes through the Society.

5876. Do they collect it for you, or do you get a share in the common fund?—The Society receives the sum agreed upon in bulk, and it is distributed among the authors pro ratâ according to the number of pieces that each author may have had acted during the year at that theatre.

5877. A successful author gets more, I suppose?—A successful author gets more, and the author who has had no pieces played gets nothing.

5878. The proportion is fixed according to the number of times that a piece is performed?—Exactly.

5879. Is that under your control?—Yes, in accordance with our rules.

5880. The manager of the Theatre Royal, Manchester, would send up so much money to the Dramatic Authors' Society, and then you analyse the number of nights which a play has run?—He sends the files of his bills of performance, and from those we know what pieces have been played, and they are entered to each author whose pieces are played, and are divided into pro ratâ shares for each piece; farces, dramas, comedies, and five act pieces, according to a scale we have agreed on. Those shares are added together, and they are divided among the authors according to the number of times each author's piece has been played.

5881. Is Mr. Dion Boucicault a member of your Society?—No.

5882. Is Mr. Tom Taylor?—Yes.

5883. After three years a piece usually goes back to the author in London?—If it be played in London he receives fees for it; he gives permission, perhaps, that it should be played at any theatre.

5884. He makes a separate agreement?—It is a matter that we settle through the Society. A piece that is free to be played by a London manager may be played at as many theatres as the managers may choose, on the payment of a fixed fee for representation.

5885. I suppose that no one can tell the Committee more about these matters all over the country than you can?—I should suppose not.

5886. It is your duty to watch the performances over all the theatres in England?—Yes.

5887. You watch for the authors to see that no pieces are performed without being paid for?—Yes.

5888. You are in relations with all the managers of theatres throughout the country?—No; I am sorry to say that there are certain managers, disreputable and dishonest men, who go about from theatre to theatre, and do not pay. There is a penalty for performing a piece without the written permission of the author; yet the mode of recovery is by common law, and if a man goes from one place to another we often lose the money.

5889. But have you an arrangement with all the permanent theatres?—Yes; but sometimes a case of dispute may arise.

5890. You make a separate agreement with each manager?—Yes.

5891. Suppose you cannot make an arrangement with him, what then?—It is like any other bargain, a manager may say you ask too much.

5892. Then he cannot perform the pieces if you do not make an arrangement with him?—Just so.

5893. I suppose you do not know anything of those pieces which were written before the Society was in existence?—Pieces that are not copyright can be performed of course without hindrance:—all pieces produced 10 years previous to the passing of the Act in 1833 are free.

5894. Was this Dramatic Society instituted as soon as that Act was passed?—Yes, I may say so; in an imperfect manner; it has only grown up, within the last six or eight years, to be a regular working society on a fixed system.

5895. Can one of the country managers make an arrangement, specially, with one of your authors, without buying all those copyrights?—No.

5896. He cannot buy a particular piece?—He may engage an author to write a piece for him.

5897. But he must pay so much a year for all copyrights. Suppose one of your authors has put his plays amongst the list of plays of the Dramatic Authors' Society, and a manager performs that special play, but does not pay so much per year to your Society, can he do that?—No, he cannot, if the author be a member of the Society.

5898. The Dramatic Authors' Society is a kind of Mutual Protection Society?—Yes; it was established at the desire, and by the wish and suggestion, of the managers themselves; they said that they had so much trouble in applying for permission to play each piece that they would prefer to pay a fixed sum for all the list.

J. S. Coyne, Esq.

5899. Are theatres increasing or decreasing in the country?—In large towns, where they can afford to play pieces moderately well, I am pretty certain that the theatres are in a prosperous condition; but there are many theatres in small towns which are going back and are disappearing. For instance, in many places where there are no railroads, and which places are at a great distance from London, the population does not support a theatre. The audiences occasionally see London pieces, or see pieces in Manchester or Birmingham, and they are not satisfied with the performances that can be given in those very small theatres, as they used to be in former years, when one scene, with a table and two or three chairs, was thought sufficient. The theatres decay in those towns, but they are improving vastly in the large towns.

5900. Now, with regard to the institutes. We hear that a good many literary institutes give theatrical performances?—Yes, they pay fees to the dramatic authors when they play any of our pieces.

5901. Do you keep a sharp look out for such cases?—No, it is understood that they will not attempt to play anything without permission, because they are always under respectable control; they send us their bills, and pay the fees.

5902. Do you know of any great literary institution that is licensed for the performance of stage plays?—No, I cannot answer that with certainty.

5903. Are the fees derived from literary institutes large in the course of the year?—No, they are very small; they have what they call an elocution class, once a quarter perhaps, and they play a little farce. I do not think that they interfere with theatres; it is not a parallel case with the music halls.

5904. I believe that the literary institutes are rather anxious for a change in the law, to enable them to perform stage pieces?—I think there could be no objection to that, because no refreshments are taken while the performance is going on; in fact, they would only be small theatres.

5905. And only occasional theatres?—Only occasional theatres.

5906. Do you know whether they take money?—They usually do; they take it in this way. Sometimes the members of the institute are admitted free, and strangers pay a small fee at the doors.

5907. That is enough to bring them under the law, is it not?—Yes.

5908. Mr. Locke.] Take any play of Shakspeare's; suppose an institution were to put one scene on the stage, they would infringe the law, would they not?—Yes, they would infringe the law if two people spoke, but not if one person read.

5909. If a man went round with a book in his hand, in a plain suit of clothes, that would not be an infringement of the Act?—One person would not, but if there were two that would be an infringement.

5910. But suppose a man were to give the soliloquy in Hamlet?—That would not be a dramatic performance, in my opinion.

5911. Unless there were two people, you think there could be no dramatic performance?—I think not.

5912. But, however, as the law now stands, it is impossible for the proprietors of those institutions to have anything beyond reading or recitation by one individual?—Not within the law.

5913. Do you not think it would be very beneficial if that law were altered, so that a person might act a play wherever he liked. What is there so extraordinary about the acting of a play that there should always be these paraphernalia about it. A licence for the play, and a licence for the building?—In every place professing to give public entertainments, where there are written words, and gestures, and costumes, it should be always under a censorship, I think.

5914. What description of censorship would you advise?—An independent censorship in the first place, and, if necessary, that that officer should have the power of sending his officers or deputies into a theatre, or place of public entertainment, to see that nothing contra bonos mores in dress, gesture, or words spoken, should take place, and that that censor should have the power of closing the theatre or inflicting a fine, but I would give to the managers or directors the power of appealing.

5915. That is with regard to any immorality on the stage?—Yes.

5916. Subject to that, would you suggest anything further in any respect. Provided any person gave a performance in a room, or in a music-hall, or in a literary institution, or in a theatre, anywhere, not being immoral in any way, what restriction would you have put on the person who produced that performance, except simply that which you describe, namely, that there should be a censor to ascertain whether it was a proper performance. You would require nothing beyond that, would you?—I should certainly not permit drinking and smoking to go on.

5917. Why not?—Because I think that the drama, although it may be said to be able to stand by itself, is most decidedly degraded by the presence of such things.

5918. That is a sentimental view of your own, is it not?—No; it is a practical view.

5919. The drama would be degraded, you think, by the smoking and drinking?—It would be no longer an intellectual performance.

5920. Have you any experience or data to go upon which would show that that would be the result?—Go into the music halls, and you will see.

5921. But I cannot see, because they are not allowed to give performances on the stage, seeing that they do nothing at present in the shape of acting, how do you infer that if they were allowed to act, their performances would become worse instead of better?—I know that attention cannot be concentrated under those circumstances.

5922. Suppose it is not concentrated, but that the article on which attention should be concentrated is a better article than that which they are now restricted to, what harm could it possibly do?—If you take that view, I do not know what harm it could do.

5923. Has your attention ever been directed to the question of what good it might do; if it tends to no harm it might do good, perhaps?—

You

You seem to be leading me to an answer that I cannot give.

5924. That you do not want to give?—I want to give an answer exactly as I feel.

5925. But I want an answer, not according to what you feel, but to what your intellect, on due consideration of the question, leads you to; probably you have not looked very carefully into this question of the "degradation of the drama," as it is called?—Yes, I have.

5926. You never saw at the music halls any improper performance of a stage play, because they cannot give them?—I remember when the Grecian gave theatrical performances, they smoked and drank in front of the house, and they played pieces of various kinds. I do not think that that was at all either serviceable to the drama, or creditable to morality.

5927. Were not very good pieces played there?—No.

5928. What did they perform?—Farces; I speak of some years ago; I cannot remember the titles of them, but they were certainly pieces of the lowest class.

5929. That is where Robson performed?—Since then.

5930. Then they improved, did they?—They improved by removing gin, beer, and tobacco.

5931. You think that that improved them?—That was the means of improving them.

5932. But probably now they might improve along with tobacco, smoking being much more general than it was 20 years ago?—Yes, smoking is more general.

5933. Have you not seen pieces abroad where they accompany almost every entertainment with tobacco?—Yes, out of doors in the Cafés Chantants in the Champs Elysées.

5934. But I mean in Germany, more especially?—Yes, in the gardens.

5935. Have they theatres in the gardens?—Yes, in the open gardens.

5936. Where they have smoking, eating, and drinking?—Always in an open garden.

5937. Then if it is an open place, the smoking does not have the same effect on the mind?—It is not so offensive to those who do not smoke.

5938. A person who does mind smoking, is very foolish to go to a place where there is smoking, is he not?—Yes.

5939. But there is no law to compel him to go there?—No.

5940. Still you would protect that man by law, and not let him run the chance of being made uncomfortable; you would really make a law to prevent any one smoking where there was acting?—Yes, where any one was acting.

5941. Mr. Clive.] You say that this play about Lola Montes was prohibited after it had been played twice?—Yes.

5942. Then was it suspended on account of any immorality in the play, or merely because any of the crowned heads of Europe were supposed to be alluded to?—Not on account of any immorality, because so far as the dialogue went, the piece was played verbatim afterwards.

5943. Then what was the cause?—I imagine it may have been supposed that there was some allusion to one of Lola's escapades with the King of Bavaria; she was supposed to be escaping from the country.

5944. Was that a highly intellectual drama?—I do not want to characterise my own drama; it was what is called an assumption piece; the principal character was not Lola Montes but a young woman supposed to be Lola Montes.

5945. You knew her character when you wrote the piece?—Yes.

5946. You know that she was a smoker?—Yes, and she had a bull-dog and used a horse whip.

5947. The selection of her name would rather induce the public to suppose that it was not a very intellectual performance, would it not?—Yes; I dare say.

5948. Was that a piece much too good for a music-hall?—I think it was a piece that would not suit a music hall; it might be too bad or it might be too good, but I do not think it would suit a music-hall.

5949. Mr. Miller.] Would you require one license to be given for theatres, and one license to music halls, for the performance of their respective pieces all over the country, or would you make it all a system of free trade?—I would prevent the drama being represented in music halls; you might make free trade in other respects.

5950. Would you require that the music halls should take out an annual license for such things as you would permit?—I have not said that I would permit any dramatic performance.

5951. Would you not permit the existence of music halls?—Yes, I would permit the existence of a music hall, where it was simply confined to pantomimic performances such as dancing, and to music so far as songs or concerted pieces go.

5952. Would you require the music halls to take out a license for that purpose?—I think it would be better. Where there is any public entertainment, especially of the character that it would assume in music halls, I think it would be desirable to have some supervision.

5953. Are you satisfied with the license now given by the magistrates to music halls?—I think it ought to be improved; it ought to be clearly laid down what they can and what they cannot do in the halls.

5954. To whom would you give authority to grant the license?—I have not thought who would be a fit person for that purpose. I think that it might come under the censor who would also have the control of the theatres.

5955. Would you make the censor the person who would also grant the license?—I call him the censor because no better word suggests itself to me at present; he should have the control of all the theatres so far as morality is concerned, and of the class of performances given.

5956. But surely you would not give to the censor the control of the theatres. You would give him the control of the plays performed, but not of the theatres themselves?—I would give him the control so far as that he should be responsible for the performances in every place of public entertainment in the kingdom; or the metropolis, if you choose to confine it to the metropolis, and then he might send his deputies to the provinces so that he could stop a performance if there was anything contrary to the law.

5957. Do you mean that you would give him the control of the performances or the control of the theatres; for instance, would you give to the censor the power to determine whether a theatre was strongly enough built?—There would be no objection to one central officer responsible for all that took place in a theatre; the license to be granted on application so soon as the requisitions were complied with.

J. S. Coyne, Esq.

5958. But we have had a diversity of opinion expressed here about the person who should grant the license; to whom would you give the power to grant a license to a theatre or music hall; would you give it to the Lord Chamberlain as it is at present?—No, certainly not; I think he is not the proper person because he is in an anomalous position.

5959. To what officer would you give it?—I would create an officer.

5960. Would you propose that he should grant licenses to both theatres and music halls?—Yes.

5961. Would you have an appeal?—Yes.

5962. Colonel Sturt.] Whom would you have an appeal to?—I should think to the Home Office.

5963. Mr. Miller.] What is your objection to the Lord Chamberlain?—He is not an independent man, and he changes with the Ministry.

5964. Does not that apply to the Home Secretary too?—Yes, but the recourse to him would be in the nature of an appeal.

5965. Suppose a theatrical manager applies for a license to the Lord Chamberlain and is refused a license, I want to know whether he should have the power of appeal, and if so, to whom?—If the law were laid down that he should grant a license if the theatre was properly built, and all the preliminaries complied with, he should be compelled to grant the license; then it would be only a question of the fitness of the building.

5966. But how would you exercise the coercion of the law supposing he refused to give the license?—That is rather a legal question; it might be referred either to the law courts or to the Home Office.

5967. If there was any appeal at all you would recommend the Home Office?—Yes.

5968. You see no objection to the Home Secretary, he being a changeable officer, although you do see an objection to the Lord Chamberlain, he being also a changeable officer?—Yes, but the Home Secretary would be applied to only in cases of appeal.

5969. Then would you extend the powers of the Lord Chamberlain, or the officer who takes his place, throughout the whole country, or would you confine it to the metropolis?—I would extend it throughout the whole country.

5970. Now, if distinct licenses were issued for theatres and music halls, could you give me such a definition of the two as to fix decisively what is theatrical and what is musical?—Yes; where dialogue takes place on a stage, dialogue spoken or sung, and you have scenery or properties, that is a theatre.

5971. Would you allow smoking and drinking at ordinary theatres?—No, I have already said not.

5972. Then does smoking and drinking constitute one of the differences between the two things?—Yes.

5973. If a theatre introduced them into its auditorium you would take away the license?—Yes, it would be the same as a music hall then.

5974. Although dramatic pieces were performed within that building?—Yes; all that constitutes the difference between the music halls and the theatres is the smoking, eating, and drinking in the auditorium.

5975. Can you point out any harm that would result from giving the music halls the same privileges which the theatres possess, subject to the license and the censorship?—I must refer to what I have said already with regard to the degradation of the drama; it may seem to be a mere matter of feeling, but I do not think it is so, for I think also that morality has a great deal to do with it. I cannot understand in what music halls differ now, except in their extent, and in their meretricious adornments from what were called in old times 'Cock and Hen Clubs;' the songs may be of a better description in the large halls, but they are to all intents and purposes the same thing.

5976. Do you consider that the music halls contribute more to the immorality of the public than the theatres?—Certainly.

5977. Now what is it in a music hall which produces more immorality than a theatre does?—The excitement of the audience, composed of men and women; drinking going on; and sometimes an exciting performance on the stage.

5978. I want to know whether the immorality which you attribute to the music halls is, in your opinion, owing to the assemblage of people eating and drinking together, or to the performance which is exhibited there?—One depends on the other; the two things combined; people eating and drinking are not under the same restraint as they are under in the theatres; no one minds what his neighbour says and does while the performance is going on upon the stage; it cannot tend to morality, but quite the reverse.

5979. Then if that be so, if you improve the exhibitions at music halls, do you not think that to that extent, the public morality would be improved, if you gave them full licence and power of performing a comedy or a respectable play, would not that be better?—No, I think people would neglect the performance; they would be a little better perhaps, more strictly dramatic, but they would not be better in character; I do not think that you could bring up an audience where there was smoking, eating, and drinking going on to the intellectual standard of the drama.

5980. Suppose every arrangement of the music halls to remain as it is now, except the eating, smoking, and drinking, that is to say, that people might walk about or sit down, and so on; in that case, would you allow them the same latitude as they have got at the theatres?—Certainly, or even with coffee and refreshments, such as you get in coffee houses, which cannot be provocative of any excess.

5981. I suppose the low price of admission at some of the music halls, is partly owing to the profit which the proprietors get from sale of drink during the evening?—Yes, undoubtedly.

5982. Do you think that it would be possible to abolish drinking and keep up all the other characteristics of music halls?—Yes; it has been said that the drama should be able to stand alone, and I say, let the tavern stand by itself.

5983. You think that you might give to a music hall the license which a theatre now gets, if you abolish the smoking, eating, and drinking?—Yes; certainly.

Mr. DAVID FRANCIS, called in; and Examined.

5984. Mr. Locke.] ARE you manager of the Beaumont Institution in the Mile-end-road?—Yes; I am manager of the concerts and entertainments, and secretary to the institution.

5985. By whom was that institution founded?—It was founded in 1840 by the late John Thomas Barber Beaumont, of the County fire office; it was his gift to the neighbourhood, "for the purpose of affording persons in the neighbourhood the means of meeting together for mental and moral improvement, and for innocent amusement in the intervals of business, without being subject to the baneful effects of intoxicating liquors." The institution cost the late J. T. Barber Beaumont, Esq., and his son (who much improved the building after his father's death in 1841) about 20,000 l. It is managed by trustees, who appoint a committee of assistants from the subscribers.

5986. That institution is in a square there?—Yes, in Beaumont square.

5987. It is a very large building, is it not?—Yes.

5988. There is a very good stage there, is there not?—Yes.

4989. With good galleries round it?—Yes, round the room.

5990. And seats in the centre of the building?—Yes.

5991. How many persons would it accommodate?—There have been 1,500 people there, but we say 1,400.

5992. Is it used for the purpose of public meetings?—Yes; frequently.

5993. Concerts and other entertainments?—Yes.

5994. Would it be an advantage to you, who conduct that institution, and likewise to the neighbourhood, that the present restriction upon you, of not being allowed to give performances of the stage should be withdrawn?—A very great advantage.

5995. Will you explain to the Committee how that restriction under the 6th and 7th Victoria has affected the Beaumont Institution?—We used at one time to give entertainments by means of the elocution class, who performed scenes from plays. Mr. George Cruikshank once took the chair; and the late Mr. Albert Smith, and Mr. Apsley Pellatt; Mr. Ayrton, M.P., and other gentlemen have also taken the chair; but we were threatened with legal proceedings two years ago for giving dramatic performances. I should tell you that we charged a price for admission. At our institution and other institutions Mr. Toole, the actor, made his first appearances.

5996. Did he belong to the elocution class?—No; he belonged to a society called The City Histrionic Club.

5997. What was he then?—He was a clerk in the city.

5998. Not on the stage?—No. Here are three programmes of the Beaumont Institution, in which you will find his name (producing programmes).

5999. This is very much in the nature of a play-bill:—"Beaumont Institution, Beaumont-square, Mile-End. The Committee respectfully announce that they have made arrangements with the City Histrionic Club, who will, on Monday, October 27th, 1851, submit for the approval of the subscribers and the public, the first series of drawing-room entertainments, to consist of selections from the most renowned British authors in the various branches of poetical and dramatic literature, very carefully arranged, and, in the impersonation of which such attention will be shown that all tastes may be gratified, 'from grave to gay, from lively to severe;'" and then follows the programme, which includes adapted farces and scenes from the Hunchback, the Lady of Lyons, and other things of the kind, there being several performances on the stage at once?—Yes.

Mr. D. Francis. 11 May 1866.

6000. Was any objection taken to that?—No, it was some years before any legal objection was taken.

6001. When was it taken, and to what was it taken?—I cannot precisely ascertain.

6002. Were any notices given to you?—Yes, we received a notice from the Lord Chamberlain to warn us against the consequences, and also a legal notice from Mr. Jerwood, who acted on behalf of the theatres. We let the room occasionally, and last year when we had let the room for a literary and musical entertainment in aid of a charity, I received this notice from the Lord Chamberlain. (The letters were delivered in, vide Appendix).

6003. What letter is referred to in the Lord Chamberlain's letter?—There was a previous communication, warning us against a dramatic performance which was about to be given. I wrote to say that we were not aware that such a thing was to take place. I believe that a farce was announced ultimately, but the programmes were not brought out until the very day. Here is the letter protesting on behalf of the theatres, from Mr. Jerwood, dated the 7th of March 1861.

6004. That was a notice from the theatres?—Yes.

6005. What performance was about to be given then?—That applies to the performances generally.

6006. Do you find yourselves restricted from giving any performance of the stage whatever?—Yes, entirely; and our elocutionary class is broken up partly in consequence.

6007. How is that elocutionary class formed?—Of the members of the institution; young men who amuse themselves by meeting once a week, or rather I should say they did meet once a week. It is broken up now, because there are so many restrictions, on giving public performances, that having no means to defray the expenses except by a charge for admission, they gave it up. The rule was to meet every Friday evening; the young men recited, and the recitations were subject to the criticisms of those who were present, and when they were perfect they gave a public entertainment; they were well attended, and were extremely popular, particularly among those classes who would not attend theatres.

6008. What is your license?—For music and dancing.

6009. But you have no spirit license?—No.

6010. Nor are any refreshments taken within that building?—No.

6011. Nor do you wish to have it?—No, we do not want to turn the place into a theatre; we merely want to give those entertainments which are so extremely popular at all places, and which are given at most institutions; they evade the law by having contributions, but we do not want to do that.

6012. The law under which notice was given to you would apply throughout the whole of England?—Yes.

6013. That is to say, the 6th and 7th Victoria; it is infringing that Act to have dramatic performances in a literary institution?—Yes.

Mr. D. Francis.

6014. Whether you have a music license or not, as it is not necessary in the country, except under some local Act, still no performance of the stage can be given without infringing that Act?—Exactly; I am rather inclined to think that even concerts come within the Act, which says opera, or any part of an opera. Mr. Santley and Mr. Sims Reeves have sung "All's Well" many times; now that is a duet from "The English Fleet," and is, therefore, part of an opera.

6015. In fact, there is scarcely anything which that Act does not forbid. I believe that there is a legal decision that tumbling is not within the meaning of the Act, but cannot almost every other conceivable form of entertainment, particularly if it is of a literary character, be made to come within the 6th and 7th Victoria?—Yes; even Pepper's Ghost has been decided to come within the meaning of the Act.

6016. That was where they made somebody talk to it, I suppose?—Perhaps so.

6017. Now, what would you propose should be done?—I would propose that permission should be given for literary institutions to give those descriptions of entertainments; but they need not be theatres. I should say that they might be restricted as to time; say, not oftener than once a week; that would be a sufficient check to prevent their being turned into theatres, because it would never pay to get up a performance for one night in a week.

6018. But do you see any harm in turning it into a theatre if it would pay?—That opens another question, as to whether a much greater number of theatres are worth keeping up than are necessary.

6019. Do you think there are a sufficient number?—Yes, I think so; we applied for a license, and, although the Lord Chanberlain gave no reason, Mr. Donne has written within the last few days, in which he gave his reason: that there was no objection to the Beaumont Institution; but that there would be a great objection if all the little lecture halls called upon him to grant a license.

6020. Did he state what the objection would be in that case?—He merely stated that as his objection; that if he granted it to us of whose respectability he had no doubt, he should be applied to by all those small lecture halls and other places, which would be called literary institutions for the purpose of obtaining a theatrical license.

6021. They might not give proper performances he thought?—Exactly.

6022. But the Lord Chamberlain saw no objection to giving you a theatrical license?—No, not in particular; but he considered it advisable to give a general refusal.

6023. Mr. Donne seemed to express an opinion that the Act allowed the Lord Chamberlain to grant licenses for theatres, but that as the literary institutions are not theatres, his powers did not extend so far, and therefore, that if he gave that license, he would make such an institution a theatre?—No doubt.

6024. Mr. Donne hardly said that there was any law of the land which prevented a building changing its name and object?—A question was asked Mr. Stirling Coyne, whether he knew any literary institutions that had a theatrical license, I may mention Greenwich; Greenwich being out of the jurisdiction of the Lord Chamberlain, they obtain a license from the local magistrates.

6025. What license have they?—A theatrical license, which is granted, they being in Kent, by the magistrates.

6026. What is that place?—The Greenwich Literary Institution.

6027. What do they do there; do they act plays?—I think not now, but they have power to do so. There has been a theatre opened lately at Greenwich. Such dialogue entertainments as we are liable for are given by Mr. and Mrs. Howard Paul, and Mr. and Mrs. German Reed. Mr. German Reed has a license himself.

6028. Mr. German Reed has a license to perform at his own place?—Yes.

6029. That would not enable him to perform at the Beaumont Institution?—No.

6030. There he would be liable for having the performance in an unlicensed place?—Yes; and I think there is a clause in the Police Act too. They stopped a performance at Buckhurst Hall about a fortnight ago. That was for the purpose of establishing a hospital, and the leading gentlemen and magistrates would have attended, but it was stopped by the police.

6031. Have you any further observations to make on this subject?—I think not.

Friday, 18*th May* 1866.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Sir Arthur Buller.	Mr. Taverner John Miller.
Lord Eustace Cecil.	Mr. O'Beirne.
Mr. Du Cane.	Mr. Powell.
Mr. Goschen.	Mr. Selwin.
Mr. Locke.	Colonel Sturt.
Mr. Lusk.

THE RIGHT HON. GEORGE JOACHIM GOSCHEN, IN THE CHAIR.

MR. DAVID FRANCIS, recalled; and further Examined.

6032. Mr. Locke.] YOU have sent me some other programmes of performances at the Beaumont Institution?—I sent you one in particular, upon which we received a notice from the Lord Chamberlain.

6033. "Programme of an elocutionary entertainment by the members of the elocution class, who have kindly consented to give their gratuitous services in aid of the library, on Thursday evening, March 27th 1856, to commence at half past seven o'clock; Mr. Alfred Carder will preside at the organ and pianoforte; hall 6*d.*, balcony 1*s.*, reserved-seats 1*s.* 6*d.*, double reserved-seats tickets 2*s.* 6*d.*;" was that advertised?—Yes.

6034. In what was it advertised?—It was advertised by circular, principally.

6035. Was any objection made to that performance taking place?—Yes.

6036. By whom?—By the Lord Chamberlain.

6037. Did you receive notice from him?—Yes, the notice which I have given to you; that notice was sent the day before the performance was to come off; it is signed J. C. March.

6038. Who is he?—He was a gentleman in the Lord Chamberlain's office at that time; I went and saw him afterwards.

6039. "Sir, I am directed by the Lord Chamberlain to inform you that it has been brought to his notice that dramatic performances are announced to take place to-morrow in the Beaumont Institution, Beaumont Square, Mile End, and tickets to be sold for the same; his lordship desires me to acquaint you that such performances at an unlicensed place are illegal, and would subject those who take part in them to the penalties of the 6 & 7 Vict., c. 68, if information is laid against them. I am, sir, your obedient servant, J. C. March." Now, in consequence of that notice, what steps did you take?—We gave notice immediately to the subscribers that the performance would not take place, and it did not take place.

6040. By whom was that performance to be given?—It was to be given by the members of the elocution class; young men who amused themselves every week by meeting in the class room for the purpose of reciting and studying pieces of poetry, principally.

6041. What use was intended to be made of the proceeds of that entertainment?—The proceeds (it had taken place on several times before) were applied to the purchase of books for the library of the institution.

6042. Since that, have any performances been given?—Yes; here is another programme when a performance took place for the same object in 1859, when Mr. Ayrton, the Member for the Tower Hamlets, took the chair at the entertainment.

6043. "Programme of an Entertainment in aid of the library, by the Members of the Elocution Class, on Thursday Evening, April the 28th 1859, commencing at 8 o'clock"; Mr. Ayrton is advertised as taking the chair, and he did do so?—He did.

6044. The performance comprised a scene from "The Wife," of Sheridan Knowles, and so forth?—Yes.

6045. You received no notice in respect of that, did you?—No.

6046. That performance took place?—Yes.

6047. Were there any entertainments given between the years 1856 and 1859?—Yes.

6048. Have you got the bills?—Not here; here is one where Mr. Apsley Pellatt took the chair (producing the bill).

6049. He was a serious man, was he not?—I think he was generally considered so.

6050. I see by the programme that you give the borrowing scene from the "Merchant of Venice;" would that come within the 6 & 7 Vict., and make you liable to a penalty?—No doubt.

6051. And make each of the three actors liable to a penalty?—Yes.

6052. I see here, too, the "One Legged Goose," Mr. Haslam; I suppose, he would not be liable?—I think not, unless it was taken in conjunction with the others, as forming part of the same entertainment.

6053. A scene from "The Gamester," with three performers, and then a farce, "Friend Wiggins," that would clearly come within the 6 & 7 Vict., there being no fewer than six performers in it?—Yes.

6054. Then what other performances have you given?—I can scarcely say how many; but I should say, that we have given two or three every year; we gave one very recently, in 1865, but we did not charge for admission in that case.

6055. But in those other instances, you charged for admission?—Yes.

6056. Is the money collected for those performances always given to the same purpose, or does that vary?—The funds are first appropriated to the payment of the expenses, and they generally do very little more than that, excepting they are given for the library or some local charity, and then they are profitable, because every one pays; at other times a subscriber can come in with a lady, free of admission.

Mr. D. Francis.

6057. They very seldom pay more than the amount of the expenses?—Very little indeed; I may say that they have not for years.

6058. Do you think it would be a great advantage that you should have the privilege of giving those performances at the Beaumont Institution?—Yes, it would be a great advantage; but the law prohibits even other things, such as Mr. and Mrs. German Reed's, Mr. Howard Paul's, and other accomplished artists giving those performances, which the public are very fond of; we run a risk with them too; we do not care so much about dramatic performances at the Beaumont Institution, but we want liberty to provide innocent amusement; we live at a part of the town where first class theatrical entertainments are not to be obtained; there are not theatres which the respectable persons of the neighbourhood usually attend, and we are now carrying on business under a fear and a dread.

6059. Mr. Powell.] To whom do you sell the tickets for those entertainments?—We do not sell the tickets now for the entertainments which we give, because we are afraid of the consequences; but we used to sell tickets to anyone who applied, only we were rather particular. We liked the subscribers to buy them and sell them to their friends.

6060. You sold them to the public, with a preference for the subscribers?—Yes.

6061. With a certain selection, so as to avoid the intrusion of improper characters?—Yes.

6062. Mr. Lusk.] The Beaumont Institution is a semi-educational institution; it is half a mechanics' institution, is it not?—Yes.

6063. That is the main object of it?—Yes.

6064. It was built for the purpose of giving instruction and entertainment to the neighbourhood?—Yes; there are French classes there and other classes.

6065. And large meetings are held there at which Mr. Ayrton takes the chair sometimes?—Yes.

6066. Do you think it would be desirable for your neighbourhood and that district that you should have the liberty to perform anything you like in a reasonable way in the shape of any little piece that you fancy?—Yes; I think so.

6067. You think that it would be desirable for a sort of semi-educational place like that to have that freedom?—Yes; we cannot very well exist without. The desire for amusement is so strong now at such institutions that to apply ourselves entirely to scientific objects would be a total failure.

6068. You think that pure matter-of-fact and science would not answer?—Not anywhere.

6069. You want a light entertainment to combine with those more serious matters?—Yes.

6070. As things are now, you cannot represent even "Box and Cox" without infringing the law if you charge for admission?—Just so; and the funds of the institution compel us to make some charge.

6071. You cannot even get Mr. and Mrs. German Reed down there without infringing this law?—Just so.

6072. You are far away from any good theatres, you say?—Yes.

6073. You have to put up with niggers with bones, and things of that kind?—We do not have many of them.

6074. But in the neighbourhood, I mean?—Yes, just so; we have them because they are profitable, and because it is necessary to raise funds sometimes.

6075. You consider it would be a great advantage for that neighbourhood if you had the liberty thus to vary your serious performances with something light?—Yes; it would be a great advantage with restrictions.

6076. Yours being a very respectable institution, do you think it is necessary in entertainments for the public that you should have smoking, eating, and drinking?—No, certainly not; we do not allow anything of that kind.

6077. But do you think it is necessary in general?—No; I think it deteriorates a place very much to have such things.

6078. You think that people could get on for hours without smoking, eating, and drinking?—Yes, very well; they do it now; we give concerts; Mr. Sims Reeves has sung 62 times at our institution.

6079. You do not smoke at your institution?—No; Mr. Sims Reeves would not sing at a place where there was smoking going on; the trust deed of our institution would also prevent it.

6080. As a man of experience, you think it is necessary to have these entertainments for the public?—Yes.

6081. But do you think it is necessary to combine the eating, drinking, and smoking with the entertainments?—No; it deteriorates the entertainments very much indeed, in my opinion.

6082. Mr. Locke.] Your institution was founded by Mr. Beaumont, was it not?—Yes.

6083. What is the expense of carrying it on; you pay no rent, do you?—No; our expenditure is 1,300 l. or 1,400 l. a year; our concerts cost us 300 l. or 400 l. a year; we give four concerts.

6084. Your entertainments are not nightly, are they?—No, they are about once a fortnight; we have lectures on the other nights.

6085. But if you were to give entertainments night after night without refreshments, the place would be empty, would it not?—No doubt it would; the neighbourhood would not approve of it.

6086. If you were to give night after night the entertainments which you now give once a fortnight, and there were no refreshments, they would not draw, would they?—No.

6087. Chairman.] You might now give amateur performances if you liked, if you did not charge admission?—Yes.

6088. You can act any light pieces for the amusement of the members of the institution now if you do not make any charge for admission?—Just so; but we should not have them because of the expense.

6089. What expense would there be?—There are the expenses of dresses, and there are the fees of the ladies who are actresses; they are a class of women who get their living partly in that way; they are respectable; they have other occupations; I have nothing to do with the management of that part of it; it is generally done by the elocution class; but I think that they give half a guinea or a guinea for the services of an actress.

6090. What would be the expense of a small performance?—£.9 or 10*l.*

6091. And it is to defray that expense that admission is charged?—Yes.

6092. Have those performances been profitable?—No.

6093. They do not swell the funds of the Institution?—No.

6094. If a piece were performed without much costume the expense would be very small, I suppose?—It would be very much less, but still there is printing, actresses, lighting, refreshments; the costume makes about 3*l.* difference in the night.

6095. Do the members themselves have any pay?—No, they are generally very respectable young men.

6096. What do the members of the Institution pay?—Nothing, but they sell tickets among their friends.

6097. You have said that you thought there should be restrictions with regard to the class of performance?—Yes.

6098. What kind of restriction do you propose there should be?—I think there ought to be restrictions to prevent literary institutions being turned into theatres. I should say that the proper limit would be not to allow those performances to take place oftener than once in six days, some check to prevent their being made theatres with scenery, and so on, that would be detrimental.

6099. In what way?—It would turn the attention of the young men too much to theatrical amusements, and interfere with their business in the day time.

6100. You would not leave that entirely to the discretion of the managers of the institutions?—No, I would not generally. I would in most institutions that I know of, but I do not think it would be judicious to do so generally.

6101. Mr. Selwin.] Have you ever tried, as they often do in the country, to give select readings, as a means of collecting people?—Yes, we tried it for some years, but they were very dull affairs after a time.

6102. They were not successful?—No, they were not; they introduced a farce, and then the elocution class found it extremely popular; and they gradually got more into acting and less into reading and recitation.

6103. Mr. Lusk.] Suppose you had a class of young men for other purposes; suppose there were meetings among themselves, and they tried to enact a little piece, could they do it without infringing this Act?—Not if they were to take money.

6104. But you cannot get up those small things without a charge?—No.

6105. That is the obstacle?—Yes.

6106. Practically you cannot do that?—Just so.

6107. Suppose that in a working man's club some intelligent men were trying to enact any little piece, could they do it without infringing on this Act?—Not if they charged admission.

6108. But they cannot get on without that?—Just so.

6109. And therefore, practically, they cannot do it all?—Just so.

6110. Chairman.] But if they subscribe (and the expenses are very small) they would be able to do it, would they not?—I do not know; the Act says, "directly or indirectly;" it is a question for lawyers.

6111. You have heard of private theatricals, have you not?—Yes, they are given everywhere now.

6112. They must be paid for in some way or other?—Yes.

6113. In the higher classes certain people bear the expense together?—They are not interfered with among the higher classes.

6114. Do you think that a working man's class would be interfered with if they did not charge admission at the door?—In some cases they would, I think; I am not able to answer that question, but I think that the Lord Chamberlain never interferes unless he has some private information.

6115. Mr. Lusk.] Private theatrical entertainments are among the upper classes mostly, are they not?—There are plenty of private theatrical entertainments everywhere now, but there are more among the middle classes than the lower classes.

6116. Not among the working classes?—I think not.

6117. Mr. O'Beirne.] What is the class of people who compose your audiences?—The middle class.

6118. Have you none of the working class?—Very few of the working class.

6119. But there are some?—There are some; the working classes are attracted by the concerts.

6120. How many concerts have you in a year?—We have four or five during the season.

6121. Chairman.] Have you any further observations to address to the Committee?—No, I think not.

JOHN KNOWLES, Esq., called in; and Examined.

6122. Chairman.] You are the proprietor of a theatre at Manchester, are you not?—Yes; I built it in 1845.

6123. Had you been connected with theatres before that?—Yes, for years.

6124. Where?—The old Theatre Royal, Manchester, prior to its being burnt.

6125. What is the name of your theatre now?—It is the Theatre Royal; it is a patent theatre.

6126. Will you be good enough to give the Committee the history of that theatre?—The commencement of my theatrical career was at the time that the theatre in Manchester was at its lowest ebb. I then came forward and took a theatre in Manchester, and kept it until it was burnt down; after that period, the proprietors of the old theatre refused to rebuild it; and when they gave me a public dinner, I stated that if they could get no one else to build a theatre I would build one myself; I am not an actor, and never was.

6127. In what way is yours a patent theatre?—The old theatre was a patent theatre; I purchased the patent from the proprietor of the old theatre, and since then I have had it renewed.

6128. What is the nature of your patent?—Now it is merely nominal.

6129. Originally it was of greater value, perhaps?—Yes, it was of great value.

6130. Originally it was a monopoly, was it not?

J. Knowles, Esq.
18 May 1866.

not?—Yes, it was a monopoly entirely; there was no other theatre allowed within six miles.

6131. In what year did the change take place?—About 1842, I think.

6132. Then the patent had no value when you bought it?—No further than having a license, there was no magisterial license required. I have no magisterial license now.

6133. Is your theatre less valuable than it was at the time when it was a patent theatre?—Yes, certainly it is much less valuable.

6134. How many theatres are there in Manchester now?—There are four; there is the Theatre Royal, the Prince's Theatre, the Queen's Theatre, and the Free Trade Hall, which has a theatrical license.

6135. Are the performances at the Free Trade Hall constant?—No, they are occasional.

6136. Do you keep your theatre open all the year round?—I have it open 10, or 11, and 12 months sometimes.

6137. Is it generally full?—Not always; we are doing very badly just now.

6138. Are there four theatres with licenses, in Manchester?—Yes.

6139. Are there other theatres that remain open as long as you do?—Thereabouts; one is a new theatre, built within two years.

6140. When were the other two theatres built?—Mine was built in 1845, the old theatre was built in the last century, and the Queen's Theatre was the Theatre Royal.

6141. I suppose that was a patent theatre too?—I do not know.

6142. Did you find a falling off in the attendance at your theatre when the new theatre was built?—A very great falling off.

6143. But still the proprietor of that theatre?—Yes.

6144. Do you think that Manchester will bear all the theatres there are now?—No.

6145. You think there are more theatres than are necessary?—There are.

6146. Is the taste for theatrical performances going off in Manchester?—No; it never was a great theatrical town for the population.

6147. It is very musical, is it not?—Very musical.

6148. Have you got more difficulty in obtaining good actors now, than you formerly had in Manchester?—Certainly.

6149. Since when?—Since free trade began.

6150. You are not very much in favour of free trade, I suppose?—I have no objection to as many theatres as they think proper to license, but I think that there has been a fall in the drama.

6151. Now, the actors are not so good, you mean?—No, they are not so good; you do not get men of education on the stage; there was an ambition to get to the two patent theatres in London; they served their time in the country on 3 l. and 4 l. a week, in order to fit themselves to get to London; they served their apprenticeship, but now there is nothing of the sort.

6152. Are their salaries higher than they used to be?—Yes.

6153. Then, the provincial actor is better off, so far as that goes?—He is a little better off, not a great deal.

6154. The Committee have heard that actors are considerably better paid than they used to be?—Not that I know of, the salaries are a little higher, but not much for the better actors; but the lower class of actors you can have in any quantity.

6155. How do the theatres in Manchester obtain their licenses?—They apply to the magistrates, who grant the license.

6156. Is it annual?—Yes.

6157. Have you heard that the theatres have had any difficulty in obtaining a license?—Yes, at one time, but not lately; when I built my theatre I had protection given me in a great measure by the magistrates.

6158. The magistrates have made difficulties in some cases, have they?—Yes, they refused licenses for theatrical entertainments where smoking, eating, and drinking was carried on.

6159. Now, with regard to the theatres, have you had complaints in Manchester of the present system of licensing?—No, there is no difficulty.

6160. But you do not require a license yourself?—No, but there is no difficulty.

6161. The other theatres require the license to be renewed every year?—Yes.

6162. But have you ever heard of any difficulties about the license being renewed?—Not any now.

6163. Suppose the proprietor of a theatre has 5,000 l. or 6,000 l. invested in it, do you consider it rather hard upon him to be dependent on an annual expiring license?—No.

6164. If there were any caprice on their part, could the magistrates take the license away?—No.

6165. They could not?—No.

6166. Neither legally or otherwise?—Neither, I should say.

6167. Colonel Sturt.] You do not surely mean to say, that they would not have the power to take away the license at all?—Not during the twelve months.

6168. But the proprietor has to apply again at the end of the twelve months?—Yes.

6169. And if the magistrates say that they will not grant the renewal, he has no redress?—No, the decision of the magistrates is final.

6170. Chairman.] Have you ever heard of a case of a manager having built a theatre, and then the license being discontinued?—No.

6171. Now, with regard to the music-halls, are there many music-halls in Manchester?—Yes; in every street, almost.

6172. Do they fill well?—Yes, I believe so.

6173. Have they smoking, eating, and drinking, at those music-halls?—Yes.

6174. Has this controversy between music-halls and theatres existed in Manchester as well as in London?—No, I think not.

6175. But have the music-halls given any theatrical representations?—Yes; I should say so, decidedly.

6176. But they have not been interfered with?—Not at all.

6177. The local opinion in Manchester, with regard to those music-halls, is that they should be allowed to perform stage pieces, I suppose?—No.

6178. But still the managers of the theatres do not feel inclined to interfere with them?—I do not see that it is possible for a theatrical entertainment to take place where there is eating, and drinking, and smoking.

6179. Where there is smoking and drinking they might, might they not?—No, not well; a dramatic entertainment requires all their senses.

6180. What licenses do those music-halls have in Manchester?—I do not know that they require any, they are not under the same law as they are here.

6181. They

6181. They cannot have any music and dancing without a license, can they?—Yes; they have no license whatever.

6182. They can give whatever performances they please, can they?—No.

6183. Mr. Locke.] The check is this, that if they were not conducted with propriety, the magistrates would take away the wine and spirit license?—Certainly.

6184. And of course a music-hall could not be carried on without refreshments?—Just so.

6185. Chairman.] But you know of no case where the performances at the music-halls have been interfered with in Manchester?—Not any.

6186. Mr. Locke.] I suppose, in your theatre the magistrates make no regulations?—Not any.

6187. But, with regard to the other theatres licensed in Manchester, the magistrates give directions, do they not?—Yes.

6188. Here is a paper that I have had sent to me from Sheffield (producing a paper); the magistrates are empowered by 6 & 7 Vict. not only to grant licenses at their discretion to theatres, but likewise to make rules and regulations with regard to the mode in which the theatres are conducted?—Yes, something like those in this paper.

6189. They make those rules and regulations at their own discretion, do they not?—Yes.

6190. Now, with regard to the music-halls, the magistrates give a wine and spirit license?—Yes.

6191. But is it not the fact that in the country towns, unless there is a local Act, anybody that pleases may have music and dancing?—Yes.

6192. Dancing, and anything of that sort?—Yes.

6193 But if the place is misconducted the magistrates can take away the license, and if there is any riot they are amenable to the law of the country?—Yes.

6194. But there is no special Act of Parliament which applies to music and dancing in the country?—Not any.

6195. You say that there are four theatres in Manchester?—Yes.

6196. Which is the largest?—Mine is the largest.

6197. How many people will your theatre contain?—Three thousand.

6198. How many people will the other theatres contain?—I should think not much less than that; about 2,000 each.

6199. That is 9,000 persons altogether?—The Free Trade Hall would hold 4,000 or 5,000.

6200. What is the Free Trade Hall?—Where they hold large concerts and meetings.

6201. But that is not a theatre?—They have a theatrical license, and they have performances there; operas, and so on.

6202. Is it used as a music-hall, too?—Yes.

6203. Are there refreshments?—No.

6204. There are no refreshments at the Free Trade Hall?—No.

6205. Now, with regard to the music-halls, you say that there are a great many all around you?—Yes.

6206. Some large and some small?—Yes, some public-houses are built entirely as music-halls.

6207. You would hardly call those public-houses music-halls, would you?—Yes, I would; they are the same thing.

6208. Have they a stage?—Yes, perhaps not a large stage, some are larger than others.

6209. Which is the largest music-hall there?—The London.

6210. How many will it contain?—I do not know; it is in Bridge street; it was formerly Hayward's Hotel.

6211. What performances do they give there?—A musical entertainment, nigger dances, men on ropes, and ballet; and they have been doing lately a ballet called "The Gathering of the Clans."

6212. The theatres have taken no notice of it?—I believe not.

6213. To your knowledge, have they given any other performances besides ballets?—No.

6214. Any acting, I mean?—I think not.

6215. You have not had Pepper's Ghost there, I suppose?—Yes, we have at the Free Trade Hall.

6216. But have you had that illusion at the music-halls?—No.

6217. You say the local opinion is, that the music-halls should not give theatrical entertainments; how did you get at that local opinion?—Because there are plenty of theatres as it is.

6218. That is your own opinion, but when you speak of the local opinion do you mean your own opinion?—Perhaps so, but I do not think that any one can consider it advisable to have smoking, eating and drinking, where a performance of the drama is going on.

6219. But there has been no meeting, with resolutions drawn up and passed?—No.

6220. You think so yourself, and you believe that other people think so too?—I believe it is the opinion of every man who wishes to witness the drama.

6221. But do you not think that the performances at those music-halls, in Manchester, might be improved by permitting them to give a better description of entertainment than they do?—If you make them theatres, but I do not think there is anything between a theatre and a music-hall.

6222. Would you allow them to perform light pieces?—No.

6223. A little singing in character?—It would not answer their purpose, and it would fall back to what it is now.

6224. Then there could be no danger in giving them the privilege, could there?—I would let them be either music halls or theatres, if they had a theatrical license; I think it would be very wrong to let them drink and smoke, it would be lowering the drama in the estimation of the country, and it is low enough, heaven knows, at this moment.

6225. But if they had that privilege, you think they would fall back to the old thing?—Perhaps worse.

6226. Then, in fact, it would make no difference to grant it them?—None at all.

6227. Mr. Du Cane.] What is your opinion with regard to the censorship?—I think that the public are sufficient, but if it is necessary to have a censor of theatres, I think it should be adapted to all things. I think there is more mischief in the songs that are sung than anything that you can put on the stage of a theatre. I have no objection to the censorship, but I think that every thing should pass under it.

6228. Mr. Locke.] Every place where there is a public performance?—Every place. I think that no song should be given to the public which is not licensed.

6229. Mr. Du Cane.] Do you think that the existing censorship has a good effect on the drama?—I do not think it has any effect whatever.

J. Knowles, Esq.
18 May 1866.

6230. Would you prefer to see it abolished, or retained, or altered?—I would have it all, or none; there is less chance of the drama doing mischief, than those double meanings which are repeated every night.

6231. Supposing the censorship of the Lord Chamberlain were retained, you would like to see it extended to music halls?—Yes, certainly; to every public entertainment; it cannot do any harm.

6232. Do you ever visit the music halls at Manchester?—No; I never was in one.

6233. Do you know from general report that they are well conducted?—I do not think that there is any fault to be found with them.

6234. Do you ever recruit your staff of performers from music halls?—Never.

6235. Do you know any instance of any good actor having sprung from a Manchester music hall?—No; I do not myself.

6236. Do you have any drinking in your own theatre?—There is one saloon in the theatre, but no spirituous liquors are sold, whatever.

6237. Have you any refreshments handed round in the audience part of the house?—Never; my theatre is conducted merely as a theatrical speculation, without pandering to the tastes of anybody.

6238. Mr. Locke.] You have a wine and spirit license, I suppose?—No, we have no license whatever.

6239. Have you refused it?—No, I have never required it.

6240. Mr. Du Cane.] You would rather not have it?—Yes.

6241. Mr. Locke.] But you can have it, if you please?—Yes.

6242. Mr. Du Cane.] You would rather exclude refreshments altogether, perhaps?—Yes, you do not want them in concerts, and why should you in theatres.

6243. Mr. Powell.] Do you not even sell wine?—I believe they have English wines.

6244. Do you mean to say that a man cannot get a glass of sherry in your refreshment room?—No, he cannot.

6245. Mr. Du Cane.] What class of entertainment answers best in your theatre?—At the present day, I am sorry to say that it has descended very much to sensational pieces.

6246. You call that a descent in the drama?—A very great descent.

6247. Are the bulk of your company provincial actors?—Yes.

6248. But you have stars occasionally, I suppose?—Yes, Mr. Charles Matthews plays with us now.

6249. Colonel Sturt.] Do you think that dramatic authors would be at all benefited by the music-halls being thrown open?—No.

6250. You think that there would be no more demand for pieces in that case?—Not the slightest.

6251. Do you find great difficulty in getting good pieces to act at your theatre?—Yes.

6252. You find that pieces fail sometimes, I suppose?—Yes, very often; Mr. Boucicault's last new piece has failed.

6253. When was that?—Within the last three weeks; it was a piece written specially for Mr. Jefferson, called "The Parish Clerk."

6254. Have you any objection to state the arrangement which you make with authors who write for you?—I generally purchase the piece entirely; when Mr. Boucicault and his wife played in the "Colleen Bawn" they shared the receipts equally with me after 25 l. a night for expenses.

6255. Did that 25 l. include lighting and everything else in the expenses of the house?—Yes.

6256. You have been to music-halls in London, I suppose?—Yes.

6257. Did you ever hear or see anything improper or immoral on the stage at the London music-halls?—I did not go with that idea: but if you go to any public building in the kingdom you will find that if you look for it; I make no exception.

6258. My question referred to the performances; do you object to the music-halls being thrown open on moral grounds?—No, not at all. I object to it with regard to the smoking, eating, and drinking. It is a disgrace to the profession.

6259. Lord Eustace Cecil.] You have spoken of some of the songs not being of a proper character; does that apply to Manchester?—All over the kingdom. What is done in London is done in the country.

6260. But you have never heard them yourself?—No.

6261. You take it from the reports of others?—Yes; from people who come and say they have been and heard so and so.

6262. You would apply the same censorship to songs as to plays?—Yes.

6263. Mr. O'Beirne.] Have you visited any music-halls in London?—Yes; I have been to the Canterbury and I have been to the Alhambra.

6264. Do you now express your opinion as the result of that personal experience?—No, I did not go with that view. I went to the Canterbury to see the place, and to look at the pictures. I did not wait to see the entertainment.

6265. What in your opinion is the difference between the audience of a London music-hall and the audience of a Manchester music-hall?—I have never been in a provincial music-hall.

6266. You can give no opinion on that point, then?—No.

6267. What, if any, is the difference in kind between your own audiences in Manchester and the audiences in the London theatres?—They are about the same class of people.

6268. Is there no larger amount of working people in Manchester than in London who visit theatres?—The town is very differently situated. We are all workers.

6269. But I mean the labouring classes specifically?—No. I should think if you went to Drury-lane you would see just as many.

6270. There is no appreciable difference, you think?—No.

6271. Mr. Selwin.] You stated that you would submit songs as well as plays to the censorship?—Yes.

6272. Supposing a department was created for the supervision of that matter, with inspectors who should have the power of visiting at any moment those music-halls, do you not think that that would be a sufficient check on anything improper taking place?—I only say this, that if it is desirable to license a dramatic entertainment, it is quite desirable to license everything that is given to the public, whether in the shape of a lecture or anything else.

6273. You think that there would be no difficulty in submitting those numerous songs to the censorship?—Not any.

6274. Mr. O'Beirne.] Has it ever been the practice practice to submit songs to a censor?—Yes, in operas.

6275. Not the individual songs?—No.

6276. Mr. Miller.] Are not the music-halls in Manchester, in fact, public-houses, with large rooms attached to them?—There are both sorts.

6277. Were not the majority originally public-houses which, following the tastes of the age, attached large rooms to themselves, from time to time, as they found their interests required it?—Three of the largest have been built expressly.

6278. With the exception of those three, all the rest were public-houses with large rooms?—Yes.

6279. Can you give the Committee some idea of the number of those houses?—I cannot.

6280. But it is very large?—It is very large.

6281. You were saying that in the country those halls do not require any license for music and dancing?—Not any.

6282. But the hold upon them consists in their requiring a license for excisable articles?—Yes.

6283. Do you know of any instance where a music-hall carries on its performances without drinking?—There is no such thing.

6284. I suppose we may infer from that that it would not answer for any music-hall to give music and dancing unless they had a spirit license, and gave their audience the opportunity of drinking?—Yes, just so.

6285. I do not think that you gave the Right Honourable Chairman the date of the origin of your patent?—I cannot tell you that; I should say it was 100 years ago.

6286. Then that patent has been continued from that time to the present?—Yes, it is renewable every 21 years.

6287. Has it been renewed from time to time?—Yes.

6288. Mr. Locke.] Who renews it?—The Lord Chamberlain.

6289. Mr. Miller.] You can call upon the Lord Chamberlain by right to do that, I suppose?—I have made my application upon the payment of fees, which are a great deal more than an annual license; it is ten times as much.

6290. What special privilege does that give you?—Not any, it is all wiped away, it was very valuable at one time; no theatre could open in Manchester at the same time as the Theatre Royal was open within six miles of it.

6291. Then how do you account for the fact, that during the existence of the patent, you have lost that right; has it been by the operation of the 6 & 7 Vict.?—I suppose, it was the new law that came into operation.

6292. Then, since the abolition of your patent rights, do you find that your property has deteriorated in value?—No, not the theatre itself.

6293. That is to say, supposing you hired the theatre, instead of being the freeholder, you would pay the same rent now as you did previously to the abolition of the patent rights?—Quite.

6294. Sir Arthur Buller.] Do you consider a ballet a dramatic performance?—Yes.

6295. Does your horror of seeing the drama desecrated by smoking, eating, and drinking, extend to ballets?—Yes.

6296. I think you said that you required all your senses for witnessing a drama?—Yes.

6297. You do not require many of them for witnessing a ballet, do you?—No.

6298. Why then does smoking, eating, and drinking, desecrate a ballet?—Because it has always been considered a theatrical entertainment.

6299. That is a mere word, but does or does not smoking or drinking desecrate a ballet?—I do not think it does.

6300. A ballet looked at through the medium of smoke, is a mere simple ballet?—Yes.

6301. There is no great harm in that, is there?—Not at all.

6303. Then you would not grudge to music-halls the performance of a ballet while smoking, eating, and drinking, was going on, or even the performance of a burlesque?—I should on the broad basis, that I would either make them theatres or music-halls; there should be nothing between.

6304. In what way?—I think it interferes very much with the theatres.

6305. Do you mean that it interferes with your profits?—To keep a theatre going night after night requires a great diversity of entertainments for all classes of the public, and especially a stationary public like Manchester.

6306. Do you think that those music halls filch from you your audiences?—Yes, certainly.

6307. We have been told, on the contrary, by a well-informed witness that the music-halls feed the theatres; that you do not believe?—Not the slightest. Oh, dear no, that is an impossibility.

6308 Mr. Lusk.] I am very glad to hear you say that your property is as good as ever?—Perhaps it is worth more money because the land is more valuable.

6309. You have still a well-to-do theatre; respectable audiences and a good connection?—Yes.

6310. You were saying just now that the old monopoly was very valuable?—Yes.

6311. Do you mean valuable to yourself or to the public?—To myself.

6312. It was of value to you?—Yes, certainly.

6313. But the Committee look at the question from a public point of view; you understand that, no doubt?—No doubt.

6314. When the other three theatres started in Manchester, that did not at all demoralise your theatre, did it; I mean in point of standing and character?—It is an impossibility.

6315. Mr. Miller.] As a matter of fact, is your theatre demoralised?—No.

6316. Mr. Lusk.] The opening of three other theatres did not demoralise yours?—No.

6317. You are just as good as you were then?—No, not in profit.

6318. You were making money too fast before, perhaps?—Very likely.

6319. Seeing that it did not demoralise you in any way, and that the increase of the theatres pleased a great many more of the public, do you not think that there should be free trade in theatres?—I have no objection to your granting every building properly erected a license; you may license 50 buildings in Manchester, only let it be either a theatre or a music-hall. Free trade has come, and it is impossible ever to return from it.

6320. You say that the salaries of actors are as good as ever?—They are better, because there are fewer actors.

J. Knowles, Esq.

6321. Fewer of what kind?—Of good actors or actresses.

6322. But you stated that there were more of the bad kinds?—Yes; you can have any quantity of them for about 1*l.* a week.

6323. May we not often hear people say "It is the stormiest day, or the coldest day, or the hottest day, that ever was," when all the while their own memories are at fault?—I do not say anything of that sort.

6324. Perhaps actors, on the whole, are just as good as ever they were?—Nothing of the sort.

6325. There is a dreadful lot of bad ones, you say?—Any quantity.

6326. Therefore, there is a better chance for the good ones?—Yes.

6327. There is no check on the music-halls in Manchester, is there?—None, except the police.

6328. You say that they conduct themselves very well indeed?—I do not know anything to the contrary.

6329. On the whole, do you think it would be as well to leave them alone pretty much?—I have no objection.

6330. As they conduct themselves so very well, why should we interfere with them in any shape, by license or censor?—I do not ask you to interfere; I am satisfied.

6331. Would it not be better if we were to take away all restrictions, and let all of you do as you like?—I think that the public would suffer; I should not complain.

6332. But why should the Legislature interfere with you at all if you get on so well?—I am satisfied with things as they are.

6333. Mr. Powell.] You have stated that you have no objection to any number of theatres, provided they are erected and managed as theatres?—Yes, erected and conducted as theatres.

6334. You would include in your free trade any building which, though not erected as a theatre, was fit for theatrical purposes, and conducted as such?—Yes.

6335. Is there a regular stage at the Free Trade Hall, at Manchester?—Yes.

6336. Is there machinery for moving the scenes?—No.

6337. Then the scenic effects at the Free Trade Hall must be of a most limited character?—Just so.

6338. Have you not a circus at Manchester which has almost become a permanent institution?—There is a wooden circus, which has been there two or three years.

6339. Is it always used as a circus?—No; it is now a music-hall.

6340. Under what license is it conducted as a music-hall?—I do not know; it is only a short time ago since it became a music-hall.

6341. Is there any other circus in Manchester?—No.

6342. But is it not the fact, that there is generally one circus at least performing in Manchester?—Sometimes there are two, but they are only temporary.

6343. But usually there are one or two, are there not?—Yes; but there is none at this time.

6344. Do you know the Lancashire district?—Yes.

6345. Can you give the Committee any information with regard to the theatres in the manufacturing towns of Lancashire?—Yes.

6346. Select your own example of a theatre which you can describe; or take Rochdale, is there a theatre there?—They are building a new theatre there now.

6347. There was one there last winter, was there not?—Yes.

6348. Was that a permanent theatre?—Yes.

6349. Is the new theatre an additional one, or in substitution for the old one?—It is in substitution for the old one, I believe.

6350. Is that theatre at Rochdale a flourishing speculation?—I cannot say.

6351. Is it large?—I should say, no.

6352. Do you know the nature of the audience in that neighbourhood?—No; it is some years since I had any connection with it.

6353. Take the Bolton Theatre; can you give any information about that?—The Bolton Theatre is behind a public-house, and connected with it.

6354. Do you mean to say that it is connected with the public-house?—It is.

6355. What is the size of that theatre?—It is a pretty good size.

6356. Can you approximate to the number of spectators that can be received in it?—Perhaps 1,200.

6357. What is the association between that theatre and the public-house?—I do not think that they have any real connection, though you have to pass almost through the public-house to get to the theatre.

6358. Are ladies, visiting the theatre, compelled to pass through the public-house?—It was through a passage of the public-house that they went to it; there was formerly a theatre independent, but I think that is closed and done away with.

6359. Do you know anything with regard to the Wigan Theatre?—I know that I sent Mr. Charles Matthews there to act, and he refused to go a second time.

6360. Was that on account of the audience?—No, it was on account of the uncomfortableness of the theatre.

6361. During how many weeks in the year are there performances at that theatre?—I should think that it is not continuous at any time, it is just as it happens, I think.

6362. During how many weeks is that theatre open at all, whether spasmodically or continuously?—It is in spurts, I should say.

6363. How many people does it contain?—I cannot say.

6364. Is there any other theatre that occurs to you?—There is a very good theatre at Preston.

6365. Can you describe the size of it?—It is middle sized.

6366. What size is that?—It would hold 1,200 or 1,500 people.

6367. What is the character of the performances?—Proper dramatic entertainments.

6368. Including burlesque, and the lighter drama, no doubt?—Yes, burlesque is a dramatic entertainment, though not a very good one.

6369. Can you state anything more about the drama in the minor towns in Lancashire?—There is a theatre at Oldham, which I believe has done very well.

6370. Can you give an approximate estimate of the contents of that theatre?—No.

6371. What class of drama is performed there?—It is the regular drama, and it has been very well conducted.

6372. Should you say that, in those theatres, the the higher class of drama answers, or is successful speculation confined to pantomime, burlesque, and kindred pieces?—I am sorry to say that, in most country towns, pantomime is the attraction throughout the kingdom; it is the sheet-anchor of the drama at the present moment.

6373. Now, returning to Manchester, you have made use of the term "music-hall," which is perhaps in one sense understood, but which is certainly not a legal phrase; what do you mean by a music-hall in Manchester, speaking of the building itself?—I mean a building that is built the same as they are here in London, with galleries, and things of that kind, it is the next thing to a theatre.

6374. How many music-halls of that class are there in Manchester?—There are not more than three or four of that description.

6375. Can you name them?—The "London," in Bridge-street, the "Alexandra" in Peter-street, and the People's Concert Hall, or the Casino, in Lower Moseley-street; those are the three principal ones.

6376. Then, in public houses which are used with or without law for music and dancing, there are probably performances in places innumerable which may or may not be theatres?—Yes, there are all sorts.

6377. Between mere rooms in public-houses and the music-halls proper, there would be probably a considerable number of places?—A great number.

6378. How should you describe the performances which take place in the music-halls in Manchester?—Singing and dancing; I do not know that there is anything else.

6379. Have they a ballet ordinarily?—Yes.

6380. Ordinarily or exceptionally?—Ordinarily, yes.

6381. Would it be merely an incidental ballet, or would it be a ballet with a supposed story and elaborate scenic accessories?—I only speak from report; I have not seen them.

6382. What, in your judgment, should be allowed in music-halls?—The same as they have in France, singing and dancing.

6383. Do you include the ballet in dancing?—No.

6384. What is stage dancing without a ballet?—There are plenty of dances without a character.

6385. In using the term ballet, you mean a ballet with character?—I mean a character dance.

6386. If you had 12 young ladies on the stage, in the ordinary dress of ballet dancers, you would not describe that as a ballet?—I should not without scenic effects.

6387. If you had 20 young ladies on the stage with a mere landscape behind them, you would call that a dance and not a ballet?—Just so. A ballet requires a story of some description.

6388. You would not prevent that kind of dance in a music-hall?—No.

6389. You would allow a ballet divertissement, but not a ballet d'action?—Just so; they are two distinct things.

6390. Do you know the Belle Vue Gardens in Manchester?—Yes.

6391. They may be described as a local Cremorne, may they not?—Yes.

6392. Are you acquainted with the class of performances that take place there?—I think not any.

6393. Have they not a panorama of the "Falls of Pekin," and all that?—There is only an illumination at night, the same as there used to be at Vauxhall.

6394. Their attractions do not extend to ballets, or any performances approaching a theatrical character?—I think not; but at the Belle Vue, they have a dancing saloon for the people, who go there, and they give them fireworks, which is a very popular amusement.

6395. How many visitors is there room for at the Belle Vue Gardens?—It covers some acres of ground; I should think that they could take 40,000 or 50,000 people.

6396. Are there many low class entertainments in Manchester, such as penny gaffs?—No, I think not; I do not think they would be permitted in Manchester.

6397. Not permitted by whom?—They would not be permitted by the police.

6398. Mr. Locke.] About your patent in connection with 6 & 7 Vict., c. 68, I see the 2d section runs, "It shall not be lawful for any person to have or keep any house or other place of public resort in Great Britain, for the public performance of stage plays, without authority, by virtue of Letters Patent from Her Majesty, Her heirs and successors, or predecessors, or without license from the Lord Chamberlain of Her Majesty's household, for the time being, or from the justices of the peace, as hereinafter provided;" was that patent of yours a patent from the Crown?—Yes.

6399. It was not from the Lord Chamberlain, merely?—No, it goes through the Patent Office here, I believe.

6400. It is a patent signed by the King or Queen, is it not?—It is a thing with an immense big seal to it.

6401. A regular patent?—Yes.

6402. It is renewed every 21 years?—Yes.

6403. The patent runs that it shall be so, I suppose?—Yes, the patent states that it is granted for 21 years.

6404. It is renewable?—Yes, mine has been renewed, the only value that patent is to me is that one has not to go to the magistrates.

6405. But it costs you more to renew your patent than it would to go to the magistrates annually?—Yes; ten times more.

6406. But there is a distinction between having a patent theatre?—Yes.

6407. I suppose they have left off mounting guard at your theatre as they did at Covent Garden and Drury Lane?—They never did it at my theatre.

6408. Mr. O'Beirne.] With regard to the question that was put to you as to the interference of the Legislature with places of public amusement, do you, as a man of much experience, think it is desirable that they should be left entirely free, or that there should be proper supervision over them?—There should be proper supervision decidedly over all public entertainments.

6409. Chairman.] Have you anything more to suggest to the Committee upon these subjects?—No.

Monday, 28th May 1866.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Lord Ernest Bruce.	Mr. Goschen.
Lord Eustace Cecil.	Mr. Locke.
Mr. Clay.	Mr. Powell.
Mr. Clive.	Colonel Sturt.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE GEORGE JOACHIM GOSCHEN, IN THE CHAIR.

Captain EYRE MASSEY SHAW, called in; and Examined.

Captain E. M. Shaw.

6410. Chairman.] YOU are at the head of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade, are you not?—Yes.

6410*. The Committee wish to hear your views as to the present arrangement in theatres with regard to danger from fire; do you think that the present system of licensing by the Lord Chamberlain is sufficient in that respect?—I am not aware of any arrangement which the Lord Chamberlain has for regulating the safety of the buildings from fire; he may have such an arrangement, but I am not aware of it.

6411. You are aware, I suppose, that theatres are surveyed before a licence is given, with a view to the danger from fire?—I have heard something of that kind, but I am not actually aware of it, and I do not know what system they have adopted or whether they have adopted any.

6412. Do you consider the present arrangement satisfactory with regard to precautions against fire in enlarged theatres?—Speaking professionally, I should say there are none at all, inasmuch as they are different in all the theatres. I see no system anywhere.

6413. There is no officer connected with the Fire Brigade who has anything to say at all to those arrangements, is there?—None whatever.

6414. Do you consider that improvements could be made in the arrangements at theatres with regard to danger from fire?—Yes, there could be very great improvements made.

6415. Without increasing the expense very considerably?—That would all depend on the time at which the improvements are taken up. When a theatre is being built it could be made comparatively safe without much expense, but it would be very expensive indeed to alter some of the old theatres, and some of them are not worth it.

6416. Have you ever considered the music halls with regard to this question of danger from fire?—That subject has never come before me professionally, but I have considered it.

6417. Take the Alhambra. Have you had the arrangements at that place before you in any way?—No, not in any way. I have gone in to see them, but I have not made any special survey.

6418. Do you think that the arrangements in music halls generally are such that great improvements could be suggested for their safety from fire?—Certainly, I think they could be made of average safety, but I do not think that any of them have any really good arrangement against fire now.

6419. What would you call a really good arrangement against fire?—I think there should be a system laid down for all these public buildings; there should be a water service laid on with constant pressure or some means of producing high pressure immediately, and the whole thing should be systematised so that any person who was acquainted with any one theatre would have a pretty good idea what to do in any other theatre in case of fire.

6420. Is there not water laid on at the large theatres at present?—I think so; but they are not at all what they might be with regard to the water supply; for instance, water on or under the roof is of very little use; the roof is one of the most dangerous parts of a theatre.

6421. Is water laid on in the music halls?—Not that I know of; I think there must be a few of them which have some.

6422. You think that in licensing a new music hall, it would be well that the license should include certain arrangements which should be made in case of fire?—I do, decidedly; I think that before a license is granted there should be a special survey with regard to fire, distinct from all other surveys.

6423. Colonel Sturt.] Is there not a good water service at Covent Garden?—There is a service there, but I am very slow to offer an opinion, unless I have made special surveys recently; I have seen the arrangements at most of those places, but not very recently.

6424. Chairman.] Have you had many cases of fire originating in music halls?—No, not many.

6425. Would that be any proof to you that the arrangements were satisfactory?—No; the origin of a fire, and the stopping of a fire, are two totally different questions.

6426. What you have been saying up to this time is with regard to stopping fires, rather?—Yes, and also with regard to people getting out in case of alarm. Facility of exit is a most important point.

6427. Do you think anything could be done in the licensing to check the danger of fires being originated?—Yes, I think that something might be done in that way; but the most important point is to provide for the safety of a large number of people during the fire; to have the means of checking it immediately so far, that though the building may be burnt down the people may have time to get away.

6428. Is it possible to make satisfactory arrangements rangements in very large buildings for that purpose?—I think so, decidedly.

6429. With regard to the hanging lamps, and the internal arrangements, and so on, is not there much to be done in that way with regard to checking the danger of a fire breaking out?—Decidedly; the whole of that should be under the inspection of a competent person inside the theatre.

6430. Is there any kind of survey to your knowledge, after the license is once granted, or any kind of inspection over the music halls, and places of amusement, with regard to fires?—So far as my knowledge goes, there is not; there may be, but I do not know of it.

6431. It is not in the hands of the police?—Not at all; I am clear about that.

6432. There is no inspector, to your knowledge, who watches over that in the metropolis?—I do not know of such a thing.

6433. Could it go on without your knowledge?—It is just possible, but I should have heard of it, I think.

6434. Have you ever been in communication with the Lord Chamberlain's Office with regard to the question of fires in theatres?—Yes; immediately after the fire in the Edinburgh Theatre I had some communications with him, but they came to nothing.

6435. Were you invited to make suggestions on that subject?—Yes.

6436. What were the difficulties which occurred?—There were a great many difficulties in the way.

6437. Those difficulties arise with regard to any change in the arrangements of existing theatres?—Yes, chiefly, and the danger of creating unnecessary alarm by expressing very strong opinions on the subject.

6438. Colonel Sturt.] Surely the Lord Chamberlain regulates the lights in the theatres, with a view to safety?—I think not.

6439. I always understood that it was the Lord Chamberlain who ordered wire shades to be put in front of the foot-lights after the accident to a columbine at a theatre in the Whitechapel-road?—I have no doubt it was he; I dare say that the proprietors of theatres are very willing to adopt any suggestion that is made by any person for the safety of the public.

6440. Mr. Locke.] I do not know whether you saw the Bill which I introduced last Session to amend the law relating to theatres and other places of public amusement?—No, I have not seen it.

6441. Will you kindly look at the schedule to that Bill (handing a copy of the Bill to the Witness)?—"1. Every hall and corridor shall have a clear width proportionate to the number of persons to be accommodated in that part of the building to which such hall or corridor leads, not being less in any case than five feet; and for each 100 persons over 500, one foot more in width. But this rule does not apply to private box lobbies or corridors to which the public have not free access. 2. There shall be in each part of the building, doorway access of six feet at least for each 500 persons to be accommodated in such part, and one foot in addition for each additional 100 persons to be accommodated in such part; and no box or other internal doorway shall be less than three feet wide. 3. All doors shall be so hung as to open outwards, that is, towards the way of egress. 4. During all times when the building is open to the public, all halls and corridors shall be maintained free and clear in the direction of egress, and in that direction unobstructed with barriers or other impediments. 5. All alleyways and gangways in those parts of the building where the public are placed shall, during the times when the building is open to the public, be maintained free and clear of seats or other obstructions, to the free ingress and egress of the public, and shall be used for passage only. 6. All gaslights in any part of the building which are, or may be at any time within two feet of any inflammable substance, shall be efficiently guarded with wirework or other proper means of security against the communication of fire."

6442. Do you think that the arrangements contained in that schedule would tend to the security of life against fires in theatres?—Decidedly.

6443. And where any sudden fright occurred so that persons rushed out of the theatre, do you think that those arrangements would be beneficial?—Decidedly, as far as they go.

6444. What would you propose in addition to the regulations contained in the schedule to that Bill?—I had not been told to what points this examination would tend, else I might have come prepared to answer these questions; but if I had time I think I could add a great many suggestions.

6445. Do you think that those suggestions, as far as they go, are good?—I think that they go in the right direction, but many of them are much too limited; for instance, the doors should be made to open both ways; and many other improvements might be suggested.

6446. Now, with regard to the avenues, do you think that the proposal in that schedule makes them wide enough?—Yes, I think it does; but those passages are chiefly stopped in the doorways; the passages themselves are wide enough, in many cases.

6447. I suppose you have observed the passages in theatres, going down to the stalls?—Yes; I think they are, in some cases, very dangerous.

6448. A person like myself touches each side as he goes down; in fact, people even thinner than I am might do so?—Yes; in some cases there are wooden partitions which are exceedingly unsafe.

6449. No two people, were they ever so slender, could get out arm in arm?—There are places in which they could not, certainly.

6450. Now, with regard to the present theatres, you say that there would be a great difficulty in altering many of them; in fact, there would not be space to make sufficient alterations; but what is your view with regard to any new theatre which should be built; do you think it would be an advantage that a plan should be submitted to some competent authority before a building is commenced at all, and that particular attention should be paid to the accommodation for ingress and egress from the theatre?—I do think so, very decidedly; in fact, that is what is done in France at the present moment.

6451. But I observed in France that, although they have a clear space all round the theatre, they leave you only one place to come out at; take the Châtelet, for instance; are you aware of any mode of egress from the three sides of that theatre?—I think you can get out both back and front.

Captain E. M. Shaw. 28 May 1866.

6452. But not at the sides?—Not at the sides, I think.

6453. Everybody enters in front, I believe?—Yes; but I think there are very large means of exit at the back.

6454. The sides are taken up by shops, I think?—Yes; at all events, in two opposite directions there are entrances and exits.

6455. Is that the same as at the Gaiétés?—I am not sure.

6456. I mean the new theatre in the Boulevard Sebastopool?—The Théâtre Lyrique.

6457. No; the Lyrique is built pretty much in the same way as the Châtelet; and so is the new theatre in the Boulevard Sebastopool, but there is not any mode of egress or ingress at the sides, is there?—I dare say such is the case.

6458. It being an advantage that there should be ingress and egress at the sides, and the only theatres that I know of in London where there is that accommodation, being Drury-lane, and perhaps Covent Garden, by way of the Floral Hall, do you not think that the avenues which supply the side exits ought always to be used every night the places are open?—Yes; I think so, in order that everybody should get used to them.

6459. Do you think it sufficient that there should be those modes of ingress and egress unless they are in constant use, since an accident might occur to the person who had the care of the door (who might have gone away with the key in his pocket), and since, if persons were delayed only two or three minutes, the most terrible accidents might occur in case of fire, would it not be better that those modes of ingress and egress should be always used?—Decidedly; I think so. The means of egress are not, in my opinion, sufficient in any of the theatres.

6460. Has your attention been called to the Adelphi Theatre?—I should be very sorry to offer a professional opinion on any of those theatres off-hand.

6461. Have you formed any opinion about them?—I have formed a great many opinions about them all, but to give an opinion off-hand, when they have been built up carefully by competent gentlemen, is more than I am willing to do.

6462. But an architect builds a theatre with the materials he has, and cannot make excellent modes of ingresss and egress, if the theatre is between two houses?—I do not see that.

6463. How are the people to get out without going through the sides of the houses?—The architect ought to reduce the size of the building in order to give a sufficient passage way on each side.

6464. But that in some cases would make the theatre extremely small, would it not?—No doubt.

6465. You gave evidence, I think, before the Committee on Fires in the Metropolis two years ago?—Yes.

6466. A question was raised there with regard to the benefit which would be derived from, I think, what you call high-pressure service?—Yes; constant high-pressure service.

6467. That would obviate the necessity for the use of a fire engine, would it not?—Yes.

6468. It would only be necessary to apply the hose to the hydrant, and there being high-pressure service you could play over any part of the building you pleased, at the top, or the sides, or anywhere else, and that could be in a minute, I suppose?—It depends on the pressure, of course.

6469. It would be extremely beneficial, of course, if in every theatre or place of public entertainment there were this high-pressure service?—Of course it would.

6470. But could it be done for those places in particular, omitting the neighbours?—No, it could not, unless they did it for themselves. The only way in which they could have this high-pressure service in the present state of the water supply of London would be to build their own tower on their own theatre, and get their pressure off that tower.

6471. If the water companies were to give them high-pressure service, they must give it to everybody else in the neighbourhood?—Yes, in order to make it constant. Until the other cisterns were all filled they would not get the pressure on the highest point.

6472. Therefore the theatres must have their own service?—Yes; they must make their own special arrangements at present, in order to get a constant water supply.

6473. Now, with regard to the question as involving theatres and other buildings, what, in your opinion, should be the course pursued in granting the license?—I think before a theatre is licensed they should be bound to show to the satisfaction of a competent person that they had made proper arrangements, not only with regard to sufficient means of ingress and exit, but also with regard to the water supply, or rather that proper arrangements were either made by them or made by the public.

6474. In what do you think those proper arrangements should consist?—Taking a large theatre, in the first place, there should be stairs and passages of sufficient size to enable the whole of the audience to get outside within five minutes of an alarm being given; and, secondly, there should be the means of getting in each minute, say 1,000 gallons of water under a pressure of at least 100 pounds to the square inch; this may seem a large quantity, but it would not be a gallon too much in case of a heavy fire.

6475. Where would it be, at the top of the building?—Very much above the top of the building.

6476. I thought you said that a water supply on the top of a building was of no use?—Yes, if it is merely on the top; but if it is very much above the top, and the theatre has supplied itself with its own stand pipe, it would have sufficient pressure.

6477. Are you aware that there are 150 tons of water all round the top of the building at the Alhambra?—I believe that there is a very large quantity.

6478. But your objection to that is, that it is not far enough off the top?—Yes, it can have no pressure for working on the top, if it is on the same level.

6479. There are firemen kept there, are there not?—I cannot say.

6480. And pumps and hose?—There may be men whom they call firemen, but I do not know that they are men whom I should call firemen.

6481. You have never seen them put out a fire you mean?—No, the mere marking a man's collar "Fireman," is not sufficient to make him one.

6482. But have you ever examined any of those men with regard to their capabilities?—No, I have not.

6483. You

6483. You merely look at their outside, and seeing that they have firemen's clothes on, you do not recognise them?—What I meant to convey was, that I am not aware that they are firemen, I could not answer for that. In some theatres I could, because I happen to know the men, but at the Alhambra I do not know them.

6484. In some theatres they have firemen whom you know as experienced men?—Yes, at some theatres they have taken men from me, and of course I can be answerable for them.

6485. Have you seen that they have a patent extinctor at the Alhambra?—No, I have not observed that.

6486. What is that invention?—It is an invention for having immediate supply of water, containing a substance which is supposed to destroy fire much quicker than water without it. It is a large Seidlitz powder mixed in an enclosed space, and when it is allowed vent by turning a tap, it extinguishes a fire, so far as the pressure within the vessel enables it to do.

6487. Is it an advantageous thing to use?—It is better than nothing.

6488. What do you call nothing; do you mean no water at all?—No water at all; it is a little better than plain water.

6489. Then it is more than better than nothing?—Yes, it is a little better, but in most buildings they have plain water.

6490. But that is an improvement on plain water?—Certainly it is.

6491. Have you ever known it to be used?—Never, except for experiments.

6492. But not in an actual fire?—I have never heard of its being used in an actual fire, but it may have been.

6493. Colonel Sturt.] You do not know whether your predecessor was consulted by Mr. Gye when he constructed Covent Garden Theatre, and whether he expressed his approval of the plan they adopted with regard to that theatre?—I cannot say exactly. I think it is very likely, but I do not know that he gave any professional opinion on it.

6494. Mr. Powell.] I suppose you do not go so far as to recommend the tower which you spoke of for every theatre?—I think in building a new theatre some arrangement should be made, and the simplest way of doing it in the present state of the London water supply would be to put a tower on the top. I could suggest other and perhaps cheaper modes, but none more simple, or more readily available.

6495. Have you calculated what would be the expense of such a tower as would be sufficient?—It would be very heavy, but I have made no actual calculation of it. It would have to hold a very great weight.

6496. There would be a considerable expense in lifting the water to that height, would there not?—No, very little; the town water supply would deliver it at certain times, sufficiently to keep it full.

6497. Would there be any practical difficulty in building the tower in such a manner as to be itself fireproof, and having the cistern also fireproof, supposing the theatre were on fire?—No, not the slightest.

6498. Chairman.] Do you remember the report of the Committee on the Fire Brigade, which sat two years ago?—Yes.

6499. Was it not recommended by that Committee that there should be high pressure throughout the metropolis, on a large scale?—I do not know that that was recommended; I do not think it ever came forward as a recommendation, but it was spoken to by many of the witnesses; besides it is obviously desirable; it is merely a question of expense which would, no doubt, be enormous.

6500. Mr. Locke.] That system is pursued at the London Docks, is it not; they have high pressure there, have they not?—No, not actually; they have a certain amount of high pressure, but not at all sufficient to make them independent of external help.

6501. But still they have it?—Yes, I think they have it, but I am not sure that it is reliable at all times; I should be very sorry to be answerable for it. I believe it is their desire to have it, and so far as one jet, or even two jets go, perhaps they have it; but I doubt their having high pressure according to my view.

6502. If a building had that high pressure, according to your view, would it make fire engines unnecessary?—Certainly.

6503. Entirely?—Almost entirely; a town like London should never be without engines, as accidents may happen in the mains at any time.

6504. Chairman.] Are you acquainted with the French system in these matters?—Yes.

6505. Is that better than our own?—There are systematic precautions taken, and it is all under one head.

6506. In all the theatres alike?—In all the theatres, as nearly alike as it is possible to make them, without interfering very much with the architecture of the building.

6507. And, consequently, everybody is well acquainted with the system?—Every one connected with the Fire Brigade; it is part of their instruction.

6508. That is not the case here?—That is not the case here; here each theatre manages for itself; each theatre in Paris is under the chief of the Sapeurs Pompiers.

6509. In respect to fire?—Yes, and also with regard to his putting a veto on many things done during the performance; he can stop any part of the performance.

6510. As chief of the Sapeurs Pompiers, does he correspond to your own position in London?—In some ways he does, but he is a military officer; he is under a general.

6511. I understand that, in France, the head of the Fire Brigade, whoever he may be, is brought into direct relations with the proprietors of the theatres, and that it is part of his business to overlook them?—Yes, they cannot open without his certificate; and he can stop any part of the performance that seems dangerous to him.

6512. Some officer of his has access to the theatres during the performance?—A great number; there is always one officer or sub-officer, and from 10 to 50 men, according to circumstances. On the night when the emperor goes to the opera, I think they have had as many as 200 men in attendance.

6513. Are they sappers and miners, or firemen merely?—They are called Sapeurs Pompiers, but they are taken from the general army; they are common soldiers; they obtain a slight advance of pay, and they are liable to be returned to their respective regiments; they are more like a depôt battalion in this country.

6514. Have they got any fire brigade in Paris independent of that?—None whatever; they form a fire brigade; there are 1,300 of them.

Captain E. M. Shaw.

6515. And a portion of that is settled every night in every theatre?—Yes, in every theatre.

6516. Is any charge levied on the theatre on that account?—Yes, they pay in full for the services of those men; they pay into the treasury of the Sapeurs Pompiers; they are obliged to have them in attendance before they can open their doors.

6517. Is that the case only at the theatres, or is it so at other places of public amusement?—I think it is the case everywhere.

6518. Is it so at the dancing rooms?—Yes, there are some of them at every such place in Paris, at least one of them.

6519. It is part of the business of the head of the Sapeurs Pompiers to look after that, to see what dancing places are open, and to station men there?—Yes.

6520. There is nothing analogous to that in London, is there?—Nothing whatever; there is no general system in London.

6521. Are there any men belonging to the Fire Brigade attending at any of the theatres?—Not men actually belonging to them, but there are men who have left me and taken service in the theatres.

6522. Who act, as it were, as firemen to overlook things in the interest of the proprietor of the theatre?—Precisely.

6524. Are your functions confined entirely to the extinction of fires, or in the case of any other buildings, are you consulted with regard to the means of taking precautions against fire?—I am very often consulted with regard to the means of taking precautions against fire; but it is not my business to give advice. I am always very happy to do so; but my time does not in all cases allow me to give advice as to altering old buildings.

6525. You are not consulted officially?—No, not at all; my functions are to extinguish fires. It is no part of my business at present to take any precautions against fires.

6526. You are not consulted when the theatres are surveyed?—Not necessarily.

6527. That is considered to be rather the business of the architect?—Yes.

6528. Are you aware whether any precautions are taken in the small theatres at the east end of London, and in the dancing places, and so on?—I think, generally speaking, there are not.

6529. Would it not be difficult to extend such regulations as we have been speaking of to some of those small places?—I think that every place where a large number of persons are congregated should be under some general rule; some of the risks in London are now exceedingly heavy.

6530. Could you give the Committee any idea as to what you would call a large number?—Say 1,000 people, or 500 or 600 people. I think the danger of a panic in many places in London is very great indeed. The result of a panic might be as bad as the result of a fire.

6531. Do you think it would be desirable to fix the limit at, say, upwards of 300 people?—Upwards of 500 people, I should say.

6532. In framing any system of licensing it would be very difficult to impose the same conditions on places that hold 200 people as on the large places, would it not?—Yes, I think 200 is too low a limit, but from 500 upwards; there should be some systematic precautions.

6533. Could you prepare any suggestions on this subject, taking as your groundwork the schedule which the Honourable Member for Southwark showed you?—Yes, perhaps I might, if I were allowed time over it; but my time is exceedingly limited. I am at work every night throughout the year, and my time is short during the day; but I will endeavour to do so, and if it should be necessary I can come and be examined again. I do not know whether it would interest the Committee to be informed that there have been only 50 theatres on fire within the last 33 years in London, and that out of that number only seven were seriously damaged.

6534. Mr. Powell.] With regard to the loss of life, what have been the facts?—I think there has been very little loss of life; exceedingly little; at the last two or three fires there has been no loss of life.

6535. Chairman.] When was the last fire?—The last fire was at the Surrey Theatre.

6536. There was no loss of life there, was there?—None.

6537. Were the means of exit good?—Yes, the means of exit were very good and very numerous; the whole place was totally destroyed in 10 minutes.

6538. Colonel Sturt.] The people had left the theatre before the fire was discovered, had they not?—No, they were in it.

6539. Very few?—No, the whole of them; I believe every one.

6540. Mr. Locke.] The means of egress at the Surrey Theatre were all in front, were they not?—I believe so; there was a means of exit from the back, but I do not know whether it was used or not.

6541. Chairman.] Which was the fire before that?—Covent Garden.

6542. There was loss of life there, was there not?—I think not; that was before my time; but I think if any people were killed, they must have been those who went to assist.

6543. Mr. Locke.] You say that there are 1,300 men belonging to the fire brigade in Paris?—I believe they are not allowed to have 1,300; but they have 1,299.

6544. I see at Question 694 of the Select Committee on Fires in the Metropolis, you were asked if you knew how many men were employed in that brigade in Paris: and your reply was, "I think now 800; but I believe they vary from 700 to 1,200 according to the force on home duty"?—That was correct at that time.

6545. What did you mean by "the force on home duty"?—I meant the army at home; each regiment at home contributes a certain number of men towards the Sapeurs Pompiers, chiefly for the purpose of having men when they go abroad who will understand something of that duty.

6546. Do you consider those now taken in Paris from the different regiments haphazard, and who go into the Sapeurs Pompiers for the purpose of learning the business, as efficient as your men, who are always engaged in it?—They are decidedly not as competent firemen, but they are under exceedingly good officers, men of intelligence and good education, but their duties are totally different from our duties, and they do their work very well.

6547. Their

Captain E. M. Shaw.

28 May 1866.

6547. Their duties in Paris are of a very ordinary description. Paris not being a place of trade they have nothing to contend with like our large warehouses by the water side, full of combustible goods? — Nothing of the kind; the principal risks are in the theatres.

6548. Another reason being, that the houses in Paris are much better built than the houses in London. The party walls are thicker, and they can usually confine a fire to one house?—Yes, a fire can be stopped in one room generally, but they have no possible means of dealing with a large fire in Paris.

6549. Their engines are small?—Exceedingly, and their water supply is nothing; except by the river side there is none.

6550. Suppose there is a fire on the Boulevards, where do they get water from?—They get it on the Boulevard, but it is in exceedingly small quantities; it would take 10 of their largest hydrants to supply one of my smallest steam engines.

6551. But still they do manage to put out fires?—Yes, the houses are exceedingly well built; I think they are very successful there, but they would be no use at all in London.

6552. How many firemen have you?—The number is increasing every day; it is at present 170; it used to be only 130.

6553. Do you consider that number sufficient?—No; I expect there will be about 300 or 350 next year.

6554. You think that would be sufficient?—No, I cannot say it would be sufficient, but I think it is as many as we can have for the tax that is about to be raised. Our men never pump the engines, but the men in Paris do; in the theatres they have no high pressure, but they have a fixed engine down below which is pumped by the Sapeurs Pompiers.

6555. You have always volunteers to pump the engines, have you not?—We pump now almost entirely by steam.

6556. But before you did so, there were always volunteers?—Yes; not exactly volunteers, but men paid for doing it.

6557. But they were not men attached to the Fire Brigade?—No.

CHARLES KEAN, Esq., called in; and Examined.

C. Kean, Esq.

6558. Chairman.] YOU will, doubtless, be able to give the Committee some valuable evidence as actor and manager of theatres with regard to the questions before the Committee; you have just returned from the Colonies and America, have you not?—I came from America last.

6559. You are well acquainted, no doubt, with theatrical arrangements in America?—I cannot say that I am particularly well acquainted with the arrangements in America, because I was so occupied myself, that I had little opportunity of seeing any other theatre than the one I was engaged in, as I acted almost every night in the week. I do not think I ever entered a theatre to see a play while I was in America but three times.

6560. Were you at New York?—In every part of the continent where there are theatres. I arrived in California from Australia.

6561. You have seen a good many of the theatres in America?—Yes.

6562. On the whole, would you say that the drama stands higher in America or not than it does here?—I can hardly answer that question in a direct way, because the habits of the people are so different from our own; they dine early, and living, as many of them do, in large hotels, they have nothing to occupy them in the evening, and they become greater theatre goers than is generally the case in England.

6563. They are greater theatre goers in America than they are here?—Yes, decidedly, for those reasons.

6564. Are there more theatres in America, compared with the population, than there are here?—No, I think not. In New York, including Brooklyn, and the other places in the neighbourhood, there is a population of over 1,000,000. I think they have about eight theatres altogether; but say 10, I think that would be the extent.

6565. There are no restrictions with regard to building theatres in America, I believe?—None that I am aware of; anybody who has got the means of building a theatre, and can purchase the ground, has the right of doing so.

6566. But the result has not been to create more theatres in America than there are here?—No; I believe that we have 23 theatres, or thereabouts, whereas they have not a dozen theatres in New York, that I can remember.

6567. Then it does not seem that being without a licensing system for theatres has created a larger number?—I think that arises very much from the expense of the ground, because all the upper classes in New York have moved to the other end, the new part. They are building a new theatre for French opera. The ground is very dear.

6568. Are the theatres generally very full in New York?—They are so now, but under peculiar circumstances. Since the civil war broke out the theatres have been crammed. Whether it be Shakspeare or Mazeppa, the theatre is equally full.

6569. That is since the civil war?—Yes, since the civil war; that which would prevent the attention of the public here to theatres has the effect of aiding them there, the state of the currency; people spent their greenbacks almost as they might halfpence.

6570. There is scarcely enough accommodation, is there, for theatre goers?—I think that now gold is coming to the proper value, they will return to their former state; that is the general belief; and already, I believe, the audiences are beginning to fall off.

6571. On the whole, are the American audiences more fond, or less fond, of a high style of dramatic performance than audiences here?—I think it is a matter of indifference to them; I think they go much more out of curiosity than out of love for the drama; they have nothing to do in the evenings; one of the great drawbacks to our theatres is the late dinner hour.

6572. Have you heard the managers discuss in America at all what kind of pieces pay the best, and have the longest runs?—I should think from all I have heard, but I have not heard them say much, that their houses were very full; they seemed quite contented.

6573. What class of piece do they perform; is it

C. Kean, Esq.

28 May 1866.

it legitimate drama?—Yes, some of them do; not as a general rule; there are two or three favourite Shakesperian actors, who are very attractive, but as a general rule it is the sensational drama that they play.

6574. Are they as fond of burlesques as the audiences are here?—I cannot answer that question, because I have not seen them; there is only one theatre I believe that is devoted to that class of entertainment; that is Mrs. Wood's theatre; she is an English actress.

6575. So far as you can judge, in the theatres where you have acted, they have not had burlesques to follow?—They never played anything but the one piece; there was neither a farce before nor after; if I acted a Shaksperian play, that was the one thing of the evening; they are fond of getting out early; many live out of town, far from the theatres, and the cars go at certain hours, and do not go after those hours; the people like to get out by 11 o'clock.

6576. With regard to the pieces performed in America, are you able to tell the Committee whether there are many original dramas written in America, or whether they generally perform English pieces?—My impression is, that in America they have very few high class dramas, and very few melodramas or sensational dramas of their own; almost all are from England.

6577. To what do you attribute that; is it the deficiency of dramatic talent, or that it is much cheaper to pirate English pieces?—It is much cheaper to pirate English pieces, the same as it is to pirate English novels.

6578. Do you think that America furnishes us with any evidence with regard to their getting on very well without any censorship of the pieces that are performed?—I cannot say that now, because the war has so completely changed the whole aspect of affairs that it is impossible to give an opinion. When they settle down, and are calm again, that is the time to judge; but now it is all excitement, or it was when I left. I do not think that the theatres will flourish so much when gold comes to its true value.

6579. With regard to the colonies, can you tell the Committee at all what legislation there is in the colonies with regard to the theatres?—I am not aware of any.

6580. It is perfect free trade, is it not?—I think so, but I never asked the question. I never was inside an Australian theatre but when I acted, except on two occasions.

6581. Anyone can build a theatre that likes, can he not?—So far as I know.

6582. Did you hear anything at all about the music halls in the United States?—No; I never heard of such a thing; and I do not believe that there are any.

6583. Colonel Sturt.] Not Niblo's Gardens?—That is all over now; there is no garden there; Niblo's is a very handsome theatre.

6584. Chairman.] Is smoking allowed in the small theatres in any part of the United States?—No, such a thing is never attempted; and if people were to attempt it they would be immediately stopped or taken out; it is against the rules of the theatre; at least where we were engaged with my little party it was so.

6585. In all places in America?—Yes.

6586. And in the colonies too?—Yes; I had a company of five, including Mrs. Kean and myself.

6587. Do you know the regulations at all with regard to the supply of drink in the American theatres?—No; there was a saloon in every theatre, but the people generally went out, I think, to the adjoining taverns.

6588. Were there bars close by?—Yes.

6589. Is there not a kind of bar in every theatre?—Yes, I believe there is; but as I never was in front of a theatre more than once or twice, I do not know.

6590. Have you noticed in any of the smaller theatres that they supply refreshments in the pits?—They supply none at all; and nobody walks among the audience selling oranges and fruit. They are the quietest audiences in the world, by far the quietest. I never met such quiet audiences.

6591. Colonel Sturt.] Do the "gods" behave themselves in the American theatres?—The prices were doubled during our engagements; the consequence was that the usual occupants of the gallery were not there; they were a better class of people; but I believe there are certain towns where the galleries are extremely noisy.

6592. Chairman.] Is smoking, eating and drinking excluded by law in the American theatres, or by rules laid down by the managers?—In some of the States it is, I believe, by law; in New England, I think, it is so; but in New York, I believe, there is no prohibition whatever. I was amongst the audience of Niblo's Theatre one night, and although that theatre is called a garden, I saw nothing of the sort.

6593. In the colonies, are there many theatres, and are the theatres well supplied with audiences?—In Melbourne, which is the largest city in Australia, there are three theatres; there are two theatres that may be placed on an equality, the Royal Theatre and the Haymarket Theatre; and there is a small theatre which is usually occupied by Christy Minstrels, and so forth. In Sydney there are two theatres. Melbourne has a population, including the vicinity (for almost everybody lives out of town that can afford it), of 125,000. Sydney has 90,000. They have a very fine theatre at Sydney.

6594. You had your own company with you in the colonies?—No, not my own company entirely; I took one lady and two actors, independently of my wife and myself.

6595. Does the drama flourish pretty well in Australia?—Not as a general rule; it is a great place for anybody with a name to visit for a short time; but the population is too limited for a long success.

6596. Are there music-halls in the colonies?—I never heard of such a thing in the colonies; if there are, it is quite unknown to me.

6597. Can you tell the Committee of any existing regulations, whether by police or law, with regard to theatres in the colonies?—I do not think there is anything of the kind; I never saw a policeman in a theatre there.

6598. But there are police regulations, I suppose; who would look after the question of whether there were any dangers from fire?—I should say nobody. I do not think it was ever inquired into, and I do not think they ever had a fire in a theatre.

6599. But do you know that there are regulations made in the United States for that purpose?—There are none that I know of but such as the managers themselves make, by having watchers in the theatres. Pike's Opera-house in Cincinnati was burnt down before I left; which, they said, was caused by an explosion of gas; I was told that that there was a million dollars lost, because some of the shops underneath were burnt as well.

6600. Then there are no regulations by the municipal or State authorities?—I never heard of them.

6601. And in the colonies there are none at all?—None; there are so few theatres. There are the Melbourne and Sydney Theatres, which I have already alluded to, and there are a few in the interior, such as Ballarat, Sandhurst, in Bendigo, where the gold mines are; and there is a theatre at Geelong, but that seldom succeeds, and few actors go there.

6602. Therefore the Legislature has not troubled itself with the question, so far as you are aware, in Australia?—Just so.

6603. What is your opinion with regard to the performance of stage plays at music halls?—I am quite against such a thing.

6604. Will you state your reasons for being against it?—I think the drama should not be mixed up with smoking, eating, and drinking; it should be entirely exclusive of any such attractions.

6505. But would you make that compulsory by Act of Parliament. Do you think it is right to nurse the drama in that way if people like the music halls?—I think the drama would sink much lower than it is already. The greatest blow the drama ever received was the doing away with the patent theatres; from this it has never recovered, and never will.

6606. You mean the high character of the drama?—Yes, the character and tone of the drama; what is understood to be the legitimate drama.

6607. But there are more people who go to the theatre every night than there were at the time when there were only two theatres?—Yes, but London has vastly increased. I do not mean to say that the theatres could always have remained on exactly the same footing. The number of patent theatres might have increased with the increase of population, but in consequence of doing away with patent rights, you have no school for acting. In those days, when young actors came up to London, it was a home for life; they became members of a fund, and there was a settlement for old age. They had the example of the old actors before them; but now a young man gets at once raised into a part far beyond his ability, on account of the small number of actors.

6608. Are there not enough actors?—There are not enough good actors. You can get an unlimited number of bad ones.

6609. Do you think that the drama requires special legislation more than any other art?—I do not know anything about special legislation; but it requires cultivation, and actors cannot spring into experience without going through a training. In my boyhood, we never considered that a man had gone through his probation until he had been on the stage for seven years; but now an actor plays the leading parts of Shakspeare before he has been on the stage two years.

6610. That is in consequence of there being more theatres, is it not?—That is in consequence of there being more theatres, and worse actors; you cannot play pieces as you did 35 years ago. I have seen the old comedies played with a completeness that you could not touch now. Take Julius Cæsar: you had Mr. Young, one of the most celebrated of actors, Mr. Macready, and Mr. Charles Kemble, with Mr. Fawcett, in what would be now considered the subordinate part of Casca; or you would, in Othello, have my father as Othello, Mr. Young as Iago, and Mr. Kemble as Cassio. These are impossibilities now, even supposing the talent existed, because each of these artists would be a centre of attraction at a separate theatre.

6611. It would be special legislation if the law said that there was only to be two theatres, surely?—I would not say that, with so large a population as we have now.

6612. But limiting theatres to any number is special legislation?—I think a number of theatres is very detrimental to the interest of the drama, if you mean to have good acting, and good plays, but if you simply look at it as a pecuniary speculation, I believe it has flourished, and will continue to flourish, but not with the same completeness and perfection that existed in former days.

6613. You think that the number of theatres should be limited by law, in order to secure the high character of the drama?—Let them remain as they are; but I would not increase the number by turning drinking shops into theatres.

6614. Would you allow anyone to build a proper theatre if he liked?—You may build theatres without number; but the fact is, that you cannot make actors; there must be an education for them as well as for singers; there is an academy of music for singers, and schools for painting, and for everything but acting. A man wrote to me five or six years ago that he was in great distress, and had failed in everything, and that nothing was open to him but to enlist or become an actor, and he begged my assistance to bring him out.

6615. You think the other arts have already a certain amount of advantage from schools, and that a school would be an advantage to the drama?—Yes, certainly; I think it would be the greatest possible advantage.

6616. But the drama has now no "advantage," except a limitation of the number of theatres?—None. When the patent theatres existed there was then protection to the actor and manager. I do not say that they could now continue in the same way as they did in those days; the increase of London would oblige you to make more patents, but there is a certain limit required if you mean to have good acting.

6617. But you cannot have good acting without limiting the number of theatres, you think?—No, certainly not, because the performers are scattered. Look at the old comedies: I saw the "Poor Gentleman," acted at Drury Lane Theatre in 1827 or 1828, with Dowton, Liston, the elder Mathews, Harley, Cooper, Mrs. Davison, and my wife, then Miss Ellen Tree; you could not see such a cast now.

6618. Those would now be distributed over 10 or 12 theatres?—Yes.

6619. Are there no other causes to which you can attribute the falling off in the number of good actors than to the throwing open of the theatres?—No, that is the bottom of it all; there are so many theatres now. One great point in a theatre is to have a company together for a good many years; they may not be people of very great talent, but they become so accustomed to each other, and get into such training, that they harmonize.

6620. But it is surely natural to think that there being a larger market open, more actors must be called into play?—Bad ones.

C. Kean, Esq.

6621. But if the good ones were better paid it would create a demand for good ones, would it not?—No actor with any respect for his profession would ever go into a music hall.

6622. But take the 20 theatres, exclusive of music halls, would not the fact that there are 20 theatres to which a good actor can go, tend to create a larger class of good actors, than if there were only two theatres?—I doubt it very much indeed; there might be four or five, or six theatres; I would not limit it to two.

6623. You do not think that the greater the demand for good actors the greater the supply?—No, there is no education for them.

6624. The demand comes too early?—Yes, the demand comes too early; a man comes on the stage a thorough novice; he acts for two years, and gets a situation when he is not fit for it.

6625. There are not enough seasoned actors you think?—There are not enough seasoned actors, and there cannot be when there are so many theatres.

6626. But may it not be that this is a transition period—the period when the change is taking place?—The change is going on every night; we are going deeper into the mire.

6627. But, taking all those young actors who go on the stage too soon, do they not become good actors when they get older?—I do not know of any. All the good actors of my day have more or less been brought up in a good school.

6628. The fact of throwing open the theatres has created a sudden demand; but, by-and-bye, the supply will adjust itself to the demand; is not that possible?—I do not believe that; I believe that if you go on licensing theatres you will drive the higher class of drama off the stage; the art will vanish.

6629. Then there is no analogy between any other art and the drama?—I go back to the want of training.

6630. In fact, you think actors get paid too soon?—Yes, they do get paid too soon. In every other class of life a man is apprenticed, works for nothing for some years, and learns his trade; but an actor does nothing of the sort now-a-days; he comes on the stage, and demands so many pounds a week for inefficient acting.

6631. But if there was a great rush of young actors to fill the theatres, that would be corrected by-and-bye, because the salaries would go down?—I do not think that the present system can possibly end in an improvement of any kind.

6632. The salaries of good actors are immensely greater than the salaries of indifferent actors, are they not?—Yes, to some extent; but bad actors get more than good actors used to get.

6633. But there is all the greater stimulus now for actors to become good actors, is there not?—Young actors find the profession so much easier, on account of there being so many theatres, that they do not like the trouble of study; they think, like Dogberry, that reading and writing comes by nature.

6634. You attribute the decline of the drama to actors coming too early on to the stage in good parts?—That is one cause; and the other is that they want training. The old patent theatres were the best school that they could possibly have; the French actors have the Théâtre Français as a sort of goal to reach.

6635. Suppose there was any arrangement (which is very unlikely in this country) that there were a theatre, pre-eminent in every respect to which an actor looked forward as a goal that stamped him as an actor, the same as it is at the Théâtre Français, would not that have the same effect, even though they had many other theatres going on side by side with them?—Yes, but it would take some time to do it. You would have to bring up young actors to it. You have 12 leading actors now where you used to have only two; of course people see very second-rate acting in leading characters, which very much vitiates the taste of the public.

6636. With regard to dramatic literature, do you think that the limitation of the number of theatres acts injuriously on the writing of pieces?—No; the reason why we do not get good plays chiefly arises from the fact that there are now so many other channels that are easier for authors to make money by. In writing a play, an author has so many risks to contend with; there was the opinion of the manager, which perhaps did not agree with his, and then the actors might not come up to his standard, and then the public might be capricious and not think as well of his work as he did himself; he gets more money for writing in a magazine than he does for writing a drama.

6637. But still for a good drama an author gets a good price?—I believe that the usual price for a five act tragedy or comedy is 500 l., but sometimes the amount is dependent on its run. I believe that Sir Bulwer Lytton gets, or did get, more than that.

6638. Take Mr. Dion Boucicault; he obtains very large sums for his dramas, does he not?—Yes; I think (but I do not know it personally) that he divides the profits, and therefore it is the success of the piece that gives him the money.

6639. It is not only Mr. Dion Boucicault who makes that arrangement, I suppose?—I do not know; I know that in my own theatre I generally paid a settled sum.

6640. Do you find any difficulty in getting good pieces?—Yes, great difficulty. I was manager for nine years, and I suppose that during that time very nearly 500 pieces were sent in to me. I employed a gentleman in the theatre on a very high salary to do little else but to read them, and when he picked out what he thought was good, it was sent to me, but if it was utter trash he sent it back himself.

6641. I suppose you know that some of the dramatic authors think there is not a sufficient opening for good plays, and that the limitation of the number of theatres and the restriction on music halls prevent them from finding a proper market for their pieces?—I do not think that any good author would write a play for a music-hall; he might write little dramas or scenes, but you could never get them acted properly; no five act or three act drama could be acted at a music-hall.

6642. Is there a prejudice on the part of professional actors generally against acting in music-halls?—I must answer you indirectly, because I have been away for three years. That subject has sprung up since my absence, and I have never entered into any conversation on the subject with anybody. I am only speaking as an old actor of what was the feeling some years ago, but what the feeling may be now I cannot pretend to say.

6643. But were there not saloons before the present present music-halls sprang up; was not that a very analogous thing?—Those were all drinking and smoking places.

6644. But they acted pieces there, did they not?—Yes, they did, but they were indifferent pieces; it was not a high class drama.

6645. But did actors mind acting at those places, or is there a prejudice in the profession against them?—I think so among the better actors.

6646. But would your objection extend to the performance of light pieces, such as farces at music-halls?—My objection would extend to everything beyond singing and dancing.

6647. Would your objection extend to the ballet?—I should not object to that. If I had the power of directing it one way or the other, I should say let them have a ballet, and anything that is dumb show.

6648. Colonel Sturt.] Pantomime?—Yes, pantomime.

6649. Chairman.] But not a light operatic piece?—No.

6650. But you do not object to singing?—No; but I should object to it if it was put in the form of a drama.

6651. But your only objection is that it would degrade the drama?—Yes.

6653. Can a theatre make more money by light pieces than by legitimate drama?—It depends on circumstances; I cannot give a positive answer.

6654. But you still think it would be degrading if even the smallest pieces were acted at music halls?—Yes; because it would be a stepping stone to increasing the privilege, until at last they would be acting the regular drama there.

6655. But do you not think that a line could be drawn?—No, they would encroach upon that line.

6656. Now, if small pieces should be acted at music halls, that would create a still greater demand for actors than there is now, would it not?—Yes.

6657. And in that case the salaries of actors would rise, would they not?—I do not know that; they would get so many young actors that they would be very cheap; they would not get old actors to go there at all, unless they were very broken down men.

6658. So far as you are aware there is no desire on the part of actors to have the music halls throw open, in order to have a greater demand for their services?—No, I never heard that.

6659. Mr. Locke.] You say that the most you would allow music halls to perform would be a ballet, and not a burletta; that is to say, opera where there was any dialogue. You would have it strictly music and dancing, and the dancers should only be allowed to do ballet?—That is all.

6660. That being so, what restriction would you put on the theatres; if you keep down the music halls by confining them to this very moderate species of performance, how would you, on the other hand, exalt the theatres, remembering the old proverb of "The goose and the gander"?—But this is all new, the music hall is an introduction.

6661. But there is, in the case of the theatres, an introduction too, since the patents were withdrawn, and the legitimate drama, as it is called, is not confined to two theatres. But, besides that, is it not the fact, that at the theatres they have introduced every species of music hall entertainment; do they not, in the holiday burlesques, copy the songs and dances that have been introduced at music halls?—I can give no opinion, because I have never been in a music hall in my life; I never saw the inside of one, I only know about the music-halls by hearsay.

6662. But you know about the theatres; have you ever seen any of those burlesques that they give at the theatres?—Not for years.

6663. You being able to form no opinion with regard to that question, let us go back into antiquity, because both of us can talk about that. You have spoken about the patent theatres, and drawn a most lovely picture of the state in which the patent theatres were in the year 1827; do you recollect Madame Saqui?—Yes; I saw her when I was a child.

6664. Do you recollect her running up a rope from the pit of the patent theatre at Covent Garden to the 1 s. gallery?—I do, but that was in the pantomime.

6665. No, I think it was before the pantomime?—No, it was in the Christmas pantomime; and I think Joey Grimaldi, as he was familiarly called, was the clown on that occasion.

6666. But was that legitimate drama?—Yes, if you think that a pantomime is legitimate drama.

6667. In what part of the pantomime did Madame Saqui run up that rope?—It was in the comic business, just as you see a man come in with dogs and monkeys.

6668. We had every species of animal introduced by John Kemble, did we not?—I do not know about every species.

6669. You saw the elephants at the patent theatres, I suppose?—No, I do not remember John Kemble; I never saw him.

6670. What is your first recollection of the stage?—My first recollection of the stage is seeing my father in "Macbeth," when I was quite a child.

6671. In what year was that?—It must have been about the year 1818 or 1817; I was a very little boy.

6672. You do not recollect seeing the elephants on the stage of the patent theatres?—I never did.

6673. Not in the pantomime?—No.

6674. But you recollect Madame Saqui?—Yes, that performance of Madame Saqui made a wonderful impression on my young mind.

6675. It obliterated the impression of the elephants, perhaps?—No, I should have remembered them if I had seen them.

6676. You call that legitimate drama, do you, insomuch as it came in a pantomime?—I do not call that legitimate drama, but it happened as one of those things that were admitted into a legitimate theatre, because in the Christmas pantomime those things were considered allowable.

6677. They likewise introduced melodramas at those theatres, did they not?—Yes.

6678. In fact, they introduced every species of performance of the stage?—Yes.

C. Kean, Esq.
28 May 1866.

6679. They prevented anybody else from acting the legitimate drama, but they played exactly what they pleased themselves?—I should not have kept them on the same footing as they were in those days; times are changed, and the arrangement of theatres is quite different, but melodramas were certainly done and looked upon in those days as part of the business of the theatre.

6680. There was "Obi, or Three-fingered Jack," performed, was there not?—Yes, that was at the Lyceum Theatre, I think, not Covent Garden.

6681. "The Forty Thieves" was at Covent Garden, was it not?—Yes, and "Blue Beard;" and "The Castle Spectre" was at Drury Lane.

6682. And they played opera there?—Yes, they had an opera company.

6683. In fact, they played everything that suited them?—Yes.

6684. But their object was not to let anybody else do what suited them, was it not?—I do not know about that.

6685. That broke down, and the result was, first, the Committee which sat in 1832, of which I think Sir Bulwer Lytton was chairman; and then the passing of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 72, in 1845, which established the liberté des théâtres?—What I meant to convey with regard to the patent theatres was that it made a school of acting, and that the young actors improved there in a manner in which they do not improve now.

6686. Can you mention any illustrious actor, man or woman, who succeeded, and became a favourite with the public, and established a reputation, that ever commenced a career at either of those patent theatres?—I commenced my career there.

6687. At which theatre?—Drury Lane.

6688. Can you mention anyone else?—I cannot at this moment; I have not thought it over.

6690. Has not the patronage of the theatre very much diminished in the country towns?—Yes, greatly; so far as the dress-boxes are concerned, it has diminished in an extraordinary manner, because in former days the dress-boxes were as full as the pit and gallery; but that is probably due to the railways; people can now come up to town, and they reserve themselves for the London theatres.

6691. There is not, however, that country school of acting now?—No.

6692. Supposing there was a patent theatre, they could not now find any one in the country schools to engage, perhaps?—Certainly not, except here and there; of course they bring them up now the moment a man shows the slightest talent. The country managers can hardly keep anyone in their theatres who has any special talent.

6693. Then, in fact, if the country did produce the article, it would be taken up to London, just as it used to be?—Yes; but they are brought up prematurely now.

6694. But that arises from want of patronage for the drama in the country, does it not?—It arises from many causes.

6695. But people in the provinces have become very serious of late years, and some people would not put their feet in a theatre now (though they would go to concerts); there is more of that kind of feeling in the country of late years, is there not?—Yes, a great deal more.

6696. More people like what we saw in that piece called "The Serious Family"?—Yes; that arises in a great measure from the acting not being so good as it was, and from other causes.

6697. Probably you have only been in theatres in very large towns?—I have been in all the towns in England, Scotland, and Ireland where there is a theatre.

6698. In many of the small town, in England the theatres have been entirely shut up, have they not?—Yes, many have been.

6699. Then there can be no school for acting where there is no theatre?—There are very few large towns where there is no theatre, but the small ones are absorbed in the large ones.

6700. Take the Guildford Theatre?—That theatre was never well attended.

6701. During the assizes it was open (once in two years), and that was better than nothing?—Yes; there were circuits in my youth where there was a very good stock company, and very respectable managers, but these circuits are all gone now.

6702. You remember Mr. Barnett?—Yes.

6703. He had that circuit, Exeter, Guildford, and so on; but the places are all shut up and turned into shops or meeting-houses?—Yes, the Boston and Lincoln circuits also are broken up now; the Lincoln Theatre is only taken as a job; the Boston Theatre is pulled down altogether.

6704. Colonel Sturt.] The Doncaster Theatre is only open during the race week, is it?—I believe so.

6705. Mr. Locke.] That being so, does not the result do away almost with any school of actors; is not it precisely the same thing as if you were to do away with Eton and Harrow, and the large schools, and only leave the two Universities?—I do not think that those theatres are good training schools; there are many reasons why they should not be. There is one system in the theatrical world which has done great harm, and that is the loss of efficient stage managers; formerly, every theatre had a respectable stage manager, who knew everything connected with the profession, and who had seen all the old actors before him, and that gentleman directed the minds of the younger actors, and he had an authority which none of the stage managers of the present day seem to possess. For economy's sake, when the patent theatres were done away with, managers dispensed with them, and combined the duties with those of the prompter.

6706. Sometimes the stage managers used to perform as well, did they not?—Sometimes, and sometimes not; a brother of Mr. Farren was stage manager at the Haymarket when I was a young young man; he did not act, but he had been an actor. Mr. James Wallack was the stage manager at Drury-lane when I came out, and he was a very good actor.

6707. Have the theatres no stage managers now?—They have prompters, promoted to that rank; but they can hardly be called stage managers, they have not the same authority.

6708. How was a stage manager educated?—From long use and practice with previous actors. Mr. Wallack knew all the business of the old comedies, and what was done by Mr. Kemble or Mr. George Frederick Cooke, and he could direct any rehearsal in consequence of that knowledge and his own natural ability.

6709. But with regard to the country it would be difficult to have stage managers when there are no stages, would it not?—But all the theatres are not closed; Liverpool has four theatres and another one building.

6710. They have a stage manager there, I suppose?—No, not a regular stage manager; there is one actor appointed to look after the stage business, perhaps.

6711. How do you account for that?—It is economy; throwing the theatres open forced managers to draw in their expenses, and the stage manager was an expensive gentleman.

6712. Take Liverpool before the theatres were thrown open, how was it then?—There was only one theatre; afterwards there was another one built, but it was a very minor theatre, and first class people never went into it.

6713. But they might have had more theatres, might they not?—I am speaking of long before the patents were done away with.

6714. But was there a patent theatre at Liverpool?—I think not; the only patent theatre that I knew of was Dublin, which is still a patent theatre.

6715. But Liverpool would be under the ordinary law at that time?—Yes.

6716. Therefore if they had thought a theatre would answer they might have had a second theatre, might they not?—I do not know. I have heard that the other one was partly built by the proprietors of the Theatre Royal, who subscribed to the new theatre against their own interests.

6717. Now, with regard to theatres and music halls, and other places of entertainment, do you not think that if there is a performance that amuses people they go to it, whatever it is?—No doubt; I do not know what they require the drama for, for I understand that they are full every night.

6718. What many of them require is what you kindly say you would concede, namely, ballet; and the question is whether a ballet is not a performance of the stage, which makes them liable to a very large penalty; are you aware what the restrictions are according to section 68 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 23?—Yes.

CHARLES READE, Esq., called in, and Examined.

6719. You are a Dramatist and Novelist, are you not?—I am.

6720. Did you begin your literary life by writing plays, or by writing novels?—By writing plays.

6721. May I ask at what time that was?—About the year 1850 or 1849, I think. I gave great study to dramatic writing for some time; and I produced some few pieces alone and in conjunction with my friend Mr. Tom Taylor.

6722. You write still for the stage occasionally; a piece of yours was produced very lately?—That was an old piece written seven years before.

6723. You have not written any pieces lately, then?—No.

6724. Were you discouraged at all in your literary labours for the stage by the existing regulations?—Yes, I may say that I was driven off the stage against my will, and compelled to go into a sister art, for which I think I have not the same ability.

6725. Now, will you inform the Committee how it was that you were driven away from those labours for the stage?—It was in consequence of the extreme narrowness of the market, and above all, the competition in those days of the stolen goods from the French, under circumstances particularly unfavourable to dramatic inventors.

6726. To which of those two circumstances do you attribute the greatest weight; do you think that you suffered more under the restrictive legislation, or under the competition of the stolen goods from the French?—I do not know which I suffered most from, but I think I suffered rather the most from the competition of stolen pieces. The case was this: the play-wrights, who steal pieces from the French, are journalists, most of them (at least at that time they were so), and that gave them the power to shut the manager's doors to the inventor; it operated like this: the inventor asked the manager to read a piece, and at the same time a man who had taken a French piece without paying for it, and could get it praised in the newspapers by his colleagues, brought those two temptations to the manager, and he could undersell me, because you cannot invent a piece as cheaply as you can steal one.

6727. Now, first with regard to the limitation in the number of the theatres, do you think that the present law restricting the number of theatres and the performance of stage plays, acts injuriously on dramatic authors?—I think this, that there are somewhat fewer theatres than there would have been if that power of withholding the license at the last moment had not been in existence. I have observed that bonâ fide capital is very timid.

6728. You think that there would be room for more theatres than there are?—Plenty of room; that is a historical fact, as you may see by comparing Paris with London.

6729. But it is not necessary that you want the same number of theatres in France and in England; that would depend on the taste of the playgoer?—Yes, certainly.

6730. Do you think that, practically, there is not room enough in the London theatres for the audiences that would be ready to attend?—I think that more theatres would be filled if we had them.

6731. Would you, as a dramatic author, say that there is not a sufficient market for the pieces that might be written?—I think there is not a sufficient market.

6732. But still successful pieces are paid for as highly highly now as at any previous time, I suppose?—Very recently there has been a return in some cases to the old system of payment by shares in the profits; of course the person who produces an unsuccessful piece under that system would get nothing, and a person who produced a successful piece draws a large sum of money; but that system is not universal.

C. Reade, Esq.

6733. But would a successful dramatic author get less money for his piece than at any previous time in the history of the stage?—No, I could not say that; successful pieces have been sold within my recollection for 4 l. or 5 l. out and out, which never did happen 50 years ago, when the author was paid by the overplus of three nights; but many piratical pieces are sold for 2 l. or 3 l. now.

6734. £.400 or 500 l. is now given for a good play, is it not?—I do not think it is ever given by a managerial speculator; I never heard of it; if the author is a man of substance and will take his share of the risk, and agree to share after a certain sum, on the piece being found profitable, he may draw a large sum; but I do not hear of managers paying down those large prices for a play which are paid for a novel.

6735. It is more remunerative to write a novel than a play, of course?—Yes, I should say so.

6736. Have actors ever paid for plays that have been written for them?—I think they do; I think I have heard of that.

6737. Could you cite any instance of that kind?—I am afraid not; but I am quite sure that actors have bought pieces, stars I mean.

6738. Are you of opinion that the legislation with regard to restricting the performance of plays at music halls, has kept such men as yourself, and Mr. Charles Dickens, and Mr. Wilkie Collins from writing plays?—No; the matter lies deeper than that, as far as we are concerned.

6739. Then where does it lie?—In piracy, in underselling the inventor by stolen goods.

6740. The grievance lies rather against the piracy than against the legislation, with regard to the licensing of the theatres?—I think it does, rather of the two.

6741. What would be your view with regard to the system of licensing the theatres; would you have it perfectly free, and would you allow every one to build a theatre who liked?—Yes, certainly; anyone who built a theatre ought to be positively secure that he can have a license to play plays; that point is not, in my opinion, even debateable.

6742. With regard to the licensing of plays, what do you say to that; would you allow every play to be performed without passing under the censorship?—No. I cannot agree with those gentlemen who put a play on the very same footing as a book.

6743. Will you state the reason why you differ from them?—I draw two main distinctions: a play reproduces a story in flesh and blood; it realises the thing in a different way to a book entirely. I do not find it very easy to make that clear; but things might be described in a book which could not be presented in a play, and which could not be even indicated without doing perhaps very considerable harm. Then another thing is, that a play does not creep gradually before the public as a book does. The theatre is thrown open to 2,000 people at once, and it is a pity that 20,000 or 30,000 people, who might happen to see the play, should hear or see the piece before we began to do anything to stop what was seditious or wrong. But I would not give the licenser too large a law; I would not have him arbitrary; I would have his function confined to what is seditious or against good morals; and there should be an appeal against his decision.

6744. Have you, as a dramatic author, ever come into collision with the Lord Chamberlain in pieces that you have written?—No; I am bound to say that he never did more than make a slight excision; and if I had paid him 10 l. for making it, it is no more than he deserved, because, if he strikes out anything that is questionable, he is a benefactor to the author.

6745. Practically, you think that the Lord Chamberlain's supervision has not acted injuriously?—Practically, I do not fear the present licenser; but I know, in fact, that it has been abused, and therefore it may be again. I should be sorry to fix my mind on a particular licenser, and to suppose that we shall have him to all eternity; I would not give his successor the chance of going very far wrong.

6746. Mr. Locke.] From what period do you date this licensing of plays?—I have not made any research into the matter, but there is a book in everybody's hands, the "Prolegomena to Malone's Shakespeare," in which are collected some very curious facts; in the third volume there are some instances proving that the Master of the Revels had very great power.

6747. You do not agree with those who view it as an office created by Sir Robert Walpole?—It was virtually a revival.

6748. But previously to the passing of the 10th Geo. 2, the pieces that were put on the stage contained political allusions; and, in point of fact, they represented political men on the stage?—Yes, no doubt.

6749. Sir Robert Walpole was represented in the "Beggar's Opera"?—Yes; it was thought to have been carried to excess.

6750. Foote introduced the identical character of Sir Robert Walpole as Sir Robert Walpole, or was about to do so, but that was stopped before the 10th Geo. 2 was passed?—Yes.

6751. The 10th Geo. 2 established, by a direct enactment, the licensing of plays?—Yes.

6752. And put it into the hands of the Lord Chamberlain?—Yes.

6753. But previously to that, whatever authority had been exercised by the Master of the Revels, that authority had never been defined by Act of Parliament?—Just so.

6754. That was an authority exercised by virtue of his office, the duties of which were not defined by any law?—That is my opinion.

6755. But at all events his interference had become very scanty; he could not interfere to any great extent, and it was not until this Act of 10th Geo. 2 was passed, that a direct interference took place between the Lord Chamberlain, as the licenser of plays, and the authors, and then it became a matter of course that every piece was submitted to him before it was put on the stage?—That is rather more than I am prepared to say, because I see that in 1641 the manager of a theatre was thrown into prison on the Lord Chamberlain's warrant for playing a play without his license.

6756. That was a Master of the Revels?—Yes.

6757. Was that for playing a play without a license, or for playing a play which the Lord Chamberlain

Chamberlain disapproved of, he having given notice that he disapproved of it?—The words are, "without his license, I believe;" but if you attach importance to that, I will insert the exact words afterwards.

6758. Who was Master of the Revels on the 4th May 1641?—Herbert, I think.

6759. He threw the manager of a theatre into the Marshalsea for playing a play without a license?—Yes.

6760. With regard to the licensing of the building, do you think that that question should be thrown open, and that a person should be allowed to perform what he pleased, and to act plays (for money) in any place which was a proper building for that purpose?—I am sorry to say that that is to me a very difficult point on which I am hardly able to make up my mind. I wish to hear what the provincial managers say on that matter. So far as the London managers are concerned, I think it might be done, but I have some misgivings with regard to the provincial theatres. However, I go to a certain length quite clearly. I think that where a law creates litigation on phrases and terms in the law itself, and not on mere disputed facts, the statute should be altered.

6761. In what way would you have it altered; you now speak of 6 & 7 Vict. I suppose?—Yes.

6762. The "Dramatic Licensing Act"?—Yes; "The Dramatic Licensing Act." It is sufficient for me to see that it creates constant litigation.

6763. Do you not find in the 23d section of that Act a definition of a stage play?—Yes, and I feel sure that it is too severe.

6764. It includes everything, does it not?—Yes.

6765. No person who has not a license from the Lord Chamberlain in particular districts, and the magistrates in other districts, can, where money is taken, give any performance whatever of the stage without being liable to penalties under that Act; what is your opinion on that subject; you say that you do not approve of it; how would you have it altered?—I am clear that the music halls in London might be allowed to play ballets d'action or short dramas by way of experiment, but with regard to going further and throwing it open, I have a misgiving with regard to the provincial theatres.

6766. Colonel Sturt.] Of course you would include pantomime?—Certainly.

6767. Mr. Locke.] What is it that you have misgivings about?—I have misgivings with regard to the interests of provincial managers. Many of them have a hard fight to live, and it would be harder if the music halls gave all that they can give; long plays, with an interest of a higher order.

6768. But do you think that the music halls would give long plays of such interest?—I think that in matters of legislation you must conclude that everybody will do whatever he can do; that is the only safe line to take.

6769. When you assume that everybody will do whatever he can do, the next question is, why should he not do so, provided that he does not do anything that is morally wrong?—There is a great deal to be said for that view of the subject.

6770. If people like to go to those places, and the performance is agreeable to them, why should they not go; why should the law interfere and say, "No, you shall only go to a particular place which does not amuse you at all, and if you do not go there you shall not go anywhere"; do you think that that is proper legislation?—My opinion is not sufficiently decided to argue the matter.

6771. You only look at it with regard to the interests of provincial managers?—That is the only misgiving which I have.

6772. Colonel Sturt.] That is a matter of feeling, is it not?—No, indeed, it is not a matter of feeling at all; it is looking to the interests of hard-working men, and of the drama as well.

6773. Mr. Locke.] But, with regard to the music halls in London, they might be allowed to do as they please; do you think that there are enough people in the metropolis to fill all those places?—Yes; I do not anticipate any evil from that; in speaking of provincial managers I am looking at it on the ground of expediency; but, if you come to the right of the thing, I can give no reason why anybody should not play a play that liked.

6774. You would not object to the music halls giving burlettas and small operas?—Certainly not, and I wish to state that my misgiving (which goes no further) is partly because I have not heard what the provincial managers have to say on the subject.

6775. You wish to give your opinion on the question whether or not the first stone is to be laid of a great national drama; will you be kind enough to explain in what way you would lay that first stone?—I premise that it is only by the courtesy of the Committee that I am allowed to enter into that question.

6776. We should be very much obliged to you if you would explain your views on that subject?—The author, or true dramatic inventor, as distinguished from the person who takes another man's invention, is of use in making actors and improving actors, as well as in his own direct business. A play rehearsed by an author who has really invented the play is a mighty different thing from a play rehearsed by a man who has stolen French ideas and who very often does not understand them.

6777. And very often alters them?—Yes, and seldom improves them. I know, by history, that England is the most dramatic nation under the sun. I know that she had a sacred drama 200 years before France; that she had a great profane drama 50 years before France, and I have satisfied myself that it is in the power of legislation cultivating so rich a soil to produce a greater drama than the French possess at present.

6778. But the French drama is very much depreciated, is it not?—There are fluctuations, but I think that it is still vigorous; a national product representing French manners and French truths, which become English lies by adaptation. I see, by positive evidence, that the pirate and the inventor cannot flourish in any nation or in any subject matter together.

6779. But now, was not Sheridan both a pirate and an inventor?—Yes, Sheridan took Pizarro, and so was Shakespere both a pirate and an inventor, but that does not touch the case.

6780. Fielding was both, was he not?—No, Fielding had no dramatic genius whatever; he only succeeded when he stole French pieces, and he spoiled and defiled them as he went.

6781. You think that he was no better than people at the present moment?—Not a bit.

6782. Do you think that he was any more a dramatic author than Colley Cibber?—I think Colley Cibber was a dramatic author.

C. Reade, Esq.

28 May 1866.

6783. Sheridan did not think so, did he?—Sheridan was comparing him with Sheridan.

6784. He produced Shakespere's plays as his own or something very like it?—Yes.

6785. And Garrick altered some of Shakespere's plays; there have always been pirates in all ages, but still the stage was in a much higher condition formerly with the pirates of the former days than it is with the pirates of the present day?—In Queen Elizabeth's time there was very little piracy and much more invention; what I mean to say is, and I could prove it at length if you chose, that the pirate and the inventor cannot co-exist in any matter. I will take the United States under two different systems; the United States grant the mechanical inventor a patent; they do not steal mechanical inventions, they buy them; but they refuse the literary inventor copyright, and the result is before you; America is at the head of mechanical invention and at the bottom of literary invention. If I invent a new printing press (which is not very likely) I can patent it in America, but if I write a drama I cannot sell my rights there, and if I write a novel I cannot sell my rights there.

6786. That international copyright we have been all struggling for, but they will not agree to that?—But what I want is an international stage-right between this country and France.

6787. You mean that you would have some international law between this country and France, and you would not allow anybody to pirate French plays in this country?—Yes, I would give the French dramatist as full protection as the English, and vice versâ. But you are aware that an unfortunate clause was inserted in the Copyright Act, which has entirely robbed us of that advantage. The Act has previously fully protected the French novelist, we will say, and the English novelist, and then it goes on to say, "the stipulations of the preceding article shall also be applicable to the representation of dramatic works and to the performance of musical compositions, in so far as each of the laws of the two countries are, or shall be, applicable in those respects to dramatic and musical works;" that was in order to entitle the author to a little protection with regard to the translation of dramatic works; such translation must appear within three months after the original publication. That is an extremely hard clause. Then we come to the fatal clause: "It is understood that the protection stipulated by the present article is not intended to prohibit fair imitation or adaptations of dramatic works to the stage in England or France respectively, but is merely meant to prevent piratical translations." That clause rendered the statute null and void entirely, because "fair adaptation" is colourable piracy.

6788. But would it not be very difficult to define exactly how far a man is to go; how would you alter it?—I would alter it by simply drawing the pen through it, and the law would then stand that the French dramatist for a term of years is put upon the same footing as his English brother, and France would open her arms to perform the same act of justice.

6789. You would have to try that as you do a patent case, would you not?—The Act of King William is very stringent, and very few cases are tried under it, and under that efficient protection the French dramatist would come.

6790. You mean that questions about books very seldom arise?—There is no obscure or equivocating clause with regard to books.

6791. Therefore the Act is efficient?—The Act is efficient.

6792. But that proviso in the International Act opens the door so wide as to make it impossible to come to a decision, as to whether or not a person is within it?—Quite impossible.

6793. Your proposal is, that that proviso should be struck out of the Act?—Clean.

6794. You think that it would then work well?—Yes.

6795. Is that the stepping stone which you spoke of?—I could give you evidence to prove that the Act is worth nothing; but that is not necessary, perhaps.

6796. Will you kindly mention one or two cases?—Here is a drama that I did under the treaty, in hopes that there might be something in the treaty.

6797. "Poverty and Pride; a drama in five acts by Charles Reade; being the authorised English version of 'Les Pauvres de Paris,' drama by Messrs. Edouard Brisebarre and Eugene Nus"?—I complied with the provisions of the statute, which cost me 10*l.*

6798. Was any objection taken to this?—It was instantly pirated in my teeth, and I was defied.

6800. For what?—They disinterred a form of action, which very few lawyers have seen an issue tried under, called "Libel of the Title," and under that recondite form the two thieves sued the honest merchant; it cost me 250*l.*

6801. Where was this case tried?—It was brought before the Chief Baron of the Exchequer.

6802. It is reported in some law book, I suppose?—It was not reported, because it came very quickly to an end; the judge nonsuited the plaintiffs; it is known as Barnett and another versus Reade.

6803. He nonsuited the plaintiffs?—Yes.

6804. Colonel Sturt.] You had not to pay his costs then?—No; but "sue a beggar, catch a flea," and if you are sued by a beggar it is the same thing. I had to pay my own costs.

6805. Mr. Locke.] Then I do not see how that bore upon the law in question?—In the course of those proceedings I had the advice of Mr. Lush and other great counsel, and they said that the statute was a rush and a straw, and I could not proceed under it.

6806. But their bringing that action does not prove anything with regard to that Act, because the plaintiff was nonsuited?—That was on a point of law quite distinct.

6807. No decision was ever given?—No decision was given.

6808. Has there been a decision of a court of law with regard to this particular question, namely, the right of a French author (because after all it comes to that) to his property in a piece piece in this country, or of an English author to his right in France?—The thing was stopped before a judicial decision was given. There has been no judicial decision with regard to whether it gives the French author any protection or not.

6809. Does any Englishman who chooses take hold of any French pieces brought out at the theatres in France and translate them?—He either translates or adapts them, or does what he likes with them; in fact, I give you my honour, that the Act is not worth a straw with regard to French authors.

6810. In fact, you say that there is no protection either for Frenchmen or Englishmen with regard to the pieces which they produce in either country; they may be translated, adapted, and brought out in the other country at pleasure?—Not an atom of protection.

6811. Which arises, you think, from that proviso, and if that were repealed all would be well?—Yes, I happen to know that that proviso does not represent the mind of either House of Parliament; it was inserted by the influence of a playwright in order to cheat the French authors.

6812. You think it would be better if the law were altered, and the English writers were thrown on their own resources?—If you strike out that clause, I pledge you my honour as a gentleman, that you will see a great drama arise in England.

6813. Is there anything that you wish to add upon that head. Have you something to say about Belgium, as an example of a nation that steals from foreign inventors never becoming a dramatic nation?—Yes, she is weak in mechanical invention, and she has extinguished her literature by stealing from the French.

6814. But does not anybody in Belgium ever try to write any piece?—Sometimes they write, and they are seeking to hold their own in matters of intellect. The late King of the Belgiums gave prizes for dramas, but you cannot create inventors by prizes. That has been tried all through America, and has failed; it is only by the steady operation of a law that you can cultivate invention.

6816. But how is it that we are not the people to write the pieces, and the French the people to translate them from us; is not that the same thing as the difference between champagne and gooseberry wine?—That is not entirely due to Legislation. We had a greater drama than the French, and we were quite independent of them. At the beginning of the 17th century, the Puritans, after Charles the First, came and knocked our theatres down and entirely extinguished the drama to an extent which has never been appreciated; not one actor who played before the civil war ever played afterwards. Then the nation was reduced to a state of barbarism. France was going on in the mean time, while we had relapsed into childhood, and upon that began the system of plagiarism from the French. I could hand in a list of plagiarisms from the French, running over 200 years, and when the communication became easier, the plagiarisims became greater. Then again, 10 Englishmen know French for one Frenchman who knows English (but that is an accident distinct from Legislation).

6817. What did you mean by the Puritans?—I meant the Roundheads.

6818. The theatres were all stopped in the time of Cromwell; and of course everything else that was amusing was stopped?—Yes, for 14 years.

6819. But Charles II. was fond of theatres, and we then had Otway, and so on?—Yes, but you cannot stir up again from the dead the people whom you have lost; there was not one actor left; not one who played before the civil war and after it.

6820. Do you mean that there were no actors in the time of Charles II.?—They were all men who began their trade in his reign.

6821. Is it not the fact that there was an immense number of playwrights in Charles II.'s time, and most admirable ones, to say nothing of the time of Queen Anne?—Only enough to show the natural fertility of the English mind.

6822. Surely it also shows that kings had resumed their ordinary position and course?—Yes, more quickly than they would have done in a less dramatic nation.

6823. Then how is it that we, coming after, cannot keep on in the same way, and produce the same pieces as the dramatists produced them, after the Puritans were thrown out of power?—We are really not in that desperate condition that some of the witnesses would lead you to suppose. I do not agree with those gentlemen who think that the drama has so desperately declined; all I say is, that it does not advance in proportion with other things; we are greater in other branches of art than in the drama, which is our natural genius. The nation that produced the greatest dramatist in the world must, by a principle of statistics, have the greatest natural fertility; he is only the natural product of the nation, under the circumstances the most favourable for raising that product.

6824. Colonel Sturt.] We have heard very contradictory evidence as to the way in which your play of "Never too Late to Mend" was received by the audience the first night, and we have been told that, owing to the remonstrances of the audience, certain portions of the representation were omitted; will you inform the Committee how the facts stood?—People seem to me to confound the views of a clique with the views of the public; the public had seen those prison scenes, and approved them, in other hands, long before they came out at the Princess's; certainly, on the first night, there were some members of the press who raised an outcry, and who, as I happen to have evidence, went into the theatre with that intention; but they were called to order by the public. Some allowance should be made for the crudeness of a first performance, but the next night we had nobody present but the public, and the scenes were very much approved of.

6825. Is it true that, owing to the remonstrances of the public, certain portions of the play were omitted afterwards?—Certainly not.

6826. We were told that the crank was taken out after three nights, and the scene taken out after 20 or 30 nights, and that was quoted to prove that the taste of the public would check anything objectionable on the stage?—The thing occurs to my mind in quite a different way. The good taste of the public put down a clique present who endeavoured to interfere with the scene, and the scene was kept on.

6827. The scene was not altered?—Not in the least; on the 78th night there was a strike of the carpenters, and the treadmill business (you cannot call it a scene) which was all mere dumb play, was then omitted because there were no hands to play it, and it was not replaced afterwards; it cost 5 l. a night to work it, and I suppose the manager gave it up.

6828. The more theatres were opened the more competition there would be for actors, I suppose?—No doubt.

6829. Then if the music halls were thrown open professional people would get higher salaries, would they not?—I have heard of actors being out of employment, and I should think it would give them a chance of finding something to do.

6830. Have you been to any of the music halls in London?—I was at the Alhambra the other night.

6831. Do you think the performance there a respectable one?—There was some very nice singing.

6832. I suppose you saw nothing that anybody could object to?—I witnessed nothing but a quartette, sung very well.

6833. The conduct of the people was orderly, I suppose?—Yes, and there were a good many policemen about.

6834. I suppose dramatic authors would be benefited by the competition of the music halls if they were thrown open, would they not?—I do not know that they would; it would do no harm, at all events, I think.

6835. There would be a much greater demand for pieces, would there not?—I think that the demand would be for very small pieces.

6836. In your opinion, has acting deteriorated in England since the suppression of the patent theatres?—No, I do not think there is the least reason to suppose that. In comparing one period with another you must not pick out a few grains of the mass; it is a balance of comparisons; the old actors were, I believe, what we call teapot actors, and, as a rule, they were worse than modern actors; they were not so intelligent, I think; the style is easier now than it was then, on the whole; the best thing is to get hold of an old actor, who has seen both; the late Mr. John Harley certainly gave me a very different impression from that conveyed by some of the witnesses here; he said that very silly things had been done on the stage in old days, posture-making, and things of that kind; I have brought a book with me which will show the Committee some pictures of actors drawn with their own approbation (producing a portfolio); you will, I think, see in all those figures certain ways which we now ridicule in our burlesque, a tendency to posture-making.

6837. You think that the style of acting has improved?—On the whole, I think it has. Mr. Harley told me that in old times, when a servant on the stage brought in a message, instead of walking in naturally, and delivering his message in a natural manner, he came down to the footlights, turned his back to the person who was supposed to receive the message, delivered it like a thunderclap, and then turned off like a fine gentleman to make his exit. That was only a specimen of many things of the kind that were current on the stage in those days.

6838. Then do you think that the patent theatres were of service in training actors?—That is a little more like the truth. I have seen the "School for Scandal" played at the patent theatre as I cannot expect to see it again; but you must strike a balance, and take one thing with another.

6839. You do not think that the effect of those patent theatres was to raise the style of acting, on the whole, in London?—I am not sure that they did not do some good to actors in their day, but they did not do so much good as is done by playing a great number of fresh pieces; the monopoly, and the strong companies enabled them to force those old things on the public, and they produced scarcely any new pieces.

6840. But do you think that the style of acting has not grown worse; it cannot be laid at the doors of the music halls that they have done any injury to the stage?—No, I am not aware that they have.

6841. They have not lowered the style of acting?—No; I do not think that, at present, the music halls have affected it in any way.

6842. Do you not think, if the music halls were thrown open, they would be very good nurseries for actors?—I think that good acting requires great attention in the audience.

6843. But would not they be good practice for actors?—My fear is that the actor would not be listened to, and that he would then bawl; but we do not know; it is all conjecture.

6844. You think that the audience would not be orderly enough?—Not quite; nor attentive enough.

6845. They were very quiet and orderly at the Alhambra the other night, were they not?—They were all in a state of motion; all walking about.

6846. You were only there for a short time?—For a short time only.

6847. Mr. Clay.] You say that if that proviso was struck out of the International Dramatic Authors Act, all the evil of which you complain would be cured?—Gradually that would begin the cure.

6848. The Act would then stand that a translation from the French would be the property of the French author, and would be protected by the law?—Yes.

6849. Does not it appear to you still that cases of great difficulty would arise as to what could be fairly called a translation or adaptation, and what could not?—Certainly; but my proposal is to strike out the word "adaptation," which is another word for colorable piracy; it is merely an ingenious phrase inserted by this ingenious little playwright.

6850. If you struck out the word "adaptation," do you think the Act would entirely protect the French author?—Yes; I think if that was simply erased, the French author would then come under our Act of William the Third, which is a very stringent Act; dramatic piracy being rather more subtle than other piracy, it was found necessary to be very stringent.

6851. Would not that state of the law give occasion to exactly the same kind of lawsuits that we have had for years past about patents. There are some piracies which the law and common sense would instantly seize on; if I take the play of "Box and Cox," and call it "Cox and Box" instead, or make some similar very slight alteration, it is a piracy of which the law can take instant cognizance; but if I take the general bearing, and some of the main incidents of a piece of yours, yours, if I alter the dialogue, and so far change the characters, that perhaps a character which you have made a man, I make a woman, I am still just as much a pirate, but would the law, as you propose it, take hold of that?—Experience proves that it would; my proposal is merely to bring those cases under the statute of William the Third, and experience proves that the statute of William the Third has been very efficacious to the protection of English authors against that very class of piracy; in fact, so much so, that there are almost no cases tried on the merits.

6852. You would be contented with the protection of the statute of William the Third?—Yes; the statute of William the Third was the best statute ever passed on these matters in England; and Frenchmen being brought under it, would have neither more nor less protection than Englishmen, and that would be sufficient.

6853. Do I collect from your evidence that you have a disposition to continue the distinction between what is called the legitimate drama and what (for the want of a better name) we will call illegitimate drama; do you wish to have one in one sort of place and the other in another sort of place?—No, that is not what I drive at. I really do not care about the legitimate or the illegitimate drama, and I never met a man yet who knew what the terms meant.

6854. But that being so, will you tell me why "Macbeth" is not to be played at a music hall, if it pays the manager to produce it?—I do not go to the length of saying more than this, that I have a misgiving on that point, and I desire to leave that question to the wisdom of those who have listened to all the evidence, and who shall have had the advantage of hearing the evidence of the provincial managers. I go no further than that. I should be satisfied, if it appeared wise to the House of Commons, to throw the thing open entirely.

6855. But are you quite satisfied that it is as nearly impossible as anything can be to draw a distinction between what is called the legitimate drama and the illegitimate drama, which shall not lead to constant contentions between parties professing one and the parties professing the other, each complaining that the other is infringing on the limits?—I am quite sure of that. I should be very sorry to see introduced into an Act of Parliament a phrase so obscure as "legitimate drama."

6856. Although you have some misgiving on this subject, if you found that all restriction were done away with to-morrow, except that every place of public amusement should be under certain police regulations to secure decorum in the performance and decent conduct in the audience, would your misgiving be such as to cause you any very serious doubt upon the subject?—I have no personal feeling in the matter, and my misgiving goes no further than this; that I have seen that provincial managers have really a hard struggle to live in some of the theatres, and I should like to hear what they say. It is very unfortunate to be in an undecided state, but I have such very positive convictions on points which I am clear about, that I must claim the right to doubt when I am not so clear.

6857. Chairman.] With regard to the licensing of plays, are you satisfied with the authority of the Lord Chamberlain, or would you prefer to substitute the magistrates or anybody else?—I should like to see it all under one authority; it is rather repugnant to me as an Englishman to see London under one rule and the rest of the country under another. I should be sorry to cast any reflection on the magistrates, but something is known to me, that makes me give the preference to the Lord Chamberlain. It is a certain fact, that for several years they could not get a second theatre in Birmingham, because certain magistrates had shares in the theatre Royal. I must do them the justice to say that, being gentlemen, when the matter was discussed before them, those who had the shares walked out of the room. But a man may walk out of a room and leave his influence behind him in the shape of his friends, and Birmingham was deprived for 10 years of a second theatre.

6858. You would be inclined to deprive the magistrates of their present powers?—I should like to see London and the country under one system; you would then get rid of local feelings and interests; but my whole scheme is this: I abhor secret tribunals, and I would always have an appeal from the Lord Chamberlain to the Judges in Equity or the Home Secretary.

6859. You think that the present system might be maintained with the addition of an appeal?—Yes, with the addition of an appeal.

6860. Either to a court of law or to another officer?—I should prefer an appeal to the Judges in Equity, because we should not disturb their habits; these are, after all, legal rights.

6861. But I suppose you speak merely of the building license, and not the licensing of plays?—I think I would include even the licensing of plays. I conclude the Act would be so worded as to shut up the power of the Lord Chamberlain to this, that he might prevent the licensing of a play, or make excisions of words, tending to sedition or bad morals.

6862. Would you extend it to religion?—Yes, I would include profanities.

6863. Is not that rather a question of taste and discretion which would be very difficult to bring before a court of law, a question, for instance, whether a thing was injurious to public morals?—I think it is as well that the man who appeals against the Lord Chamberlain's discretion (which is always exercised very mildly), should run the risk of having to pay the law costs, otherwise he would be always pestering the Home Secretary.

6864. I understand your evidence with regard to the music halls to be this, that you are afraid that it would hurt the provincial theatres?—That is my misgiving.

6865. But would it be right to let that weigh; is not your view rather against free trade?—So long as we keep to the ground of expediency, I think I have a right to give way to that misgiving; but if you take the high ground of the principle of free trade, and say that we must make sacrifices to principle, I should hardly be able to answer that line of argument.

6866. You do not think that the degradation of the drama would be likely to ensue from throwing open to the music halls and every other place that license to enact plays?—No; because the theatres would remain. The music halls would give you something inferior to the theatres. I do not see why the London managers should fear them so much; I do not believe that if they give an inferior article to the theatres the music halls will ever hurt the theatres; indeed I rather believe that the music halls will find that in music they have hit on the right thing; that music being a more sensual art will best suit their purposes.

FREDERICK GUEST TOMLINS, Esq., called in; and Examined.

F. G. Tomlins, Esq.

28 May 1866.

6867. Chairman.] You are an Author and Journalist, I believe?—I am.

6868. Are you connected with one of the weekly papers; are you a proprietor?—No, I am editor of a weekly paper, and contributor to some of the morning papers.

6869. Which paper are you editor of?—The "Weekly Times."

6870. I believe that you have occupied yourself a good deal with theatrical matters?—Yes, for 40 years, nearly.

6871. Have you followed this controvery at all between the music halls and theatres?—Yes, very closely.

6872. Is it your opinion that the performance of stage plays in music halls would tend to the decline of the drama?—Certainly not to the decline of the present drama.

6874. How do you think that those music halls would be affected if they had greater freedom with regard to the choice of performance?—They would improve, in my opinion, both in a musical and in a literary point of view: in artistic matters generally.

6875. In what way?—The minor drama itself began with songs; it went on to pantomimes, and then came good plays. Douglas Jerrold was nourished entirely at those illegitimate places. His "Black Eyed Susan" was produced at an illegitimate theatre, and his "Thomas-à-Becket," which was as good an acting historical play as has been written in this century, was produced at the Surrey Theatre; and so was Dean Milman's "Fazio."

6876. But still those were theatres, were they not?—They were only licensed for music and dancing; they had a pianoforte on the stage.

6877. Was there smoking, eating, and drinking, and continual movement going on at the Surrey Theatre?—No, it was entirely in the form of a theatre.

6878. Do you think that the form of the music halls is adapted for the performance of theatrical pieces now?—Very much so for vaudevilles, burlettas, and pieces of that kind; the Alhambra is as fine a theatre as we have in its audience arrangements.

6879. But for the performance of vaudevilles, even, would not the constant movement of the audience, to and fro, tend to interrupt the pieces more or less?—We may be quite sure that the audience would regulate their own conduct, they would turn out anybody that inconvenienced them. I have seen no other rule in theatres; we know that ladies go to operas to have conversations, and make receptions in their boxes; in France especially, but they do it even here.

6880. Do you think that it would increase the popularity of music halls if they were allowed to perform light operas, and so on?—Yes, very much; and it would do the people a great deal of good.

6881. Are not the music halls rather the places for a lounge?—For people of a certain rank; idle people, and young men, probably; but to the artisan, and his wife and family, it is their Italian Opera.

6882. Does that class form the chief portion of the audience?—In the east end entirely so; at the west end it is more mixed. I paid 1*s.* to go into the gallery of the Alhambra, and I found artisans there with their wives, and I saw that, out of 300 people near me, only two were smoking.

6883. Are you acquainted with the music halls at the east end of London?—I have been to them, but my business is to notice the regular dramas; and I have now written criticisms in the "Morning Advertiser," the "Morning Post," and other papers and periodicals for 30 years.

6884. The audience at the music halls are chiefly of the working class, are they?—Yes; I think that the model music hall, of that kind, is the Canterbury Hall, where you see artisans and small shopkeepers, with their wives and families, and it is a piece of actual humanity to the wife to take her there; it is quite a godsend to the wife and family to get out of their dull homes, and to go occasionally to these places, and it would be most cruel to interfere with them.

6885. You think that, generally, the amusements of the people would receive a stimulus, rather than otherwise, by those places being allowed to perform what pieces they liked?—Yes, certainly. I took a great deal of pains to help the movement which was formerly made, to get the patents done away with; the same arguments were then used by the minor theatres that are now used by the music halls; they were for perfect liberty; but now, of course, they want to limit others, because they fear they would interfere commercially with their business: but I do not think that it would do so.

6886. Mr. Locke.] You say that you took a part in the movement for doing away with the patents?—Yes.

6887. Previously to the patents being done away with they gave every description of performance at the patent theatres, did they not?—Yes; Mr. Bunn in his Reminiscences accused me of absolute falsehood because I went over the books and found that there were only six performances of the legitimate drama in one season; they had "Cherry and Fairstar," "Timour the Tartar," and all those pieces, and Van Amburgh's lions, came after a time; in fact every species of performance that a showman could give has been given at the patent theatres.

6888. Was that previous to 1845 when the alteration was made by the 6 & 7 Vict.?—Yes.

6889. And previous to 1832, when the Committee sat?—They were not so bad before 1832 as they were from 1832 to 1844 when they abandoned the legitimate drama entirely, and I am convinced convinced that that was the reason of the Act being allowed to pass.

6890. Did you give evidence before that Committee of 1832?—No.

6891. Do you remember Madame Saqui at Covent Garden?—No, but I heard that evidence; I saw a much worse thing than that at Drury Lane, for I saw a man descending from the upper gallery on a wire; the wire broke and the man fell on the stage, and in passing a large chandelier he smashed several of the drops, which fell on the people in the pit; he himself was considerably injured, and he laid like a corpse on the stage until he was carried off.

6892. In what year was that?—That is not above four or five years ago.

6893. That is since Drury Lane ceased to be a patent theatre?—Yes, since Drury Lane ceased to be a patent theatre.

6894. But while the theatres were patent theatres every species of performance was given?—Yes, a vast number of children were brought on the stage. There was the performance of "Lilliput," and a great many other performances of the like kind.

6895. Do you consider that acting has depreciated as an art?—We do not have such fine pieces to perform, and therefore people say that acting has depreciated; but as to the high tragic drama, the taste of the age does not encourage that; people have so much literature in newspapers and magazines and so much excitement from serious business, that they go to the theatres now for amusement and not for instruction, so that we shall never have again the high tragic drama, probably.

6896. They are finding out the thing in Paris, are they not?—Yes, I know that they tried to make the Odéon a stage for Racine and Corneille, but it was only kept up by subsidies.

6897. Do you think that that arises from the fact that no great actor who is extremely attractive is springing up or from the altered taste of the public?—I attribute it to the altered taste of the public.

6898. Do you think that if an actor like Mr. Edmund Kean were to go on, the house would fill to see his Richard the Third?—Yes, everybody will always go to see a wonder, but that would not make a school for acting. Mr. Edmund Kean did not belong to any school; he was wholly unlike those who preceded him and those who followed him; he unfortunately did raise up a certain number of bad imitators who for a time annoyed the town very much.

6899. And they have done so still?—Yes; the impress of his genius remains. I saw him the third night he performed, and I saw him through the whole of his career.

6900. You think that a man like Kean coming out, is an accident?—Yes, I do; with all due respect to Mr. Sothern, I think his Lord Dundreary is an accident; people will go and see anything of that kind.

6901. Colonel Sturt.] He is acting a leading part now, is he not?—Yes; I do not pass any criticism upon his acting, but his Lord Dundreary was a wonder.

6902. Mr. Loche.] How do you account for our not having wonders?—We have got Mr. Sothern and his Lord Dundreary.

6903. But I speak of dramatic high art; tragedy, for instance?—I think it is an erroneous idea to suppose that genius is ever created by circumstances; it creates the circumstances; men of genius are few and far between. Betterton was a great actor; Booth was good; Quin was only good in certain parts; there was a long hiatus from Betterton to Garrick's time.

6904. Mr. George Frederick Cooke was a genius, was he not?—Yes, but he was a limited actor, being only great in a few parts.

6905. Take Kemble; was he a genius?—No; Mr. Kemble made a school, but Mrs. Siddons was a genius.

6906. Mr. Young?—Mr. Young was not a genius; he was a highly-cultivated actor. I knew him very intimately. People will not go to see long tragic plays now; the public taste is entirely different, which I attribute to the various other kinds of literature being so plentiful; the public are so oppressed with serious ideas elsewhere, that they seek the theatres as a matter of amusement, and I think that society is very likely to take that turn for sometime to come. Ristori did not draw for long, nor did Rachel, but probably the language had something to do with that.

6907. However, she drew up to the last moment in Paris, but since her there has been no tragic actress?—Just so. Perhaps I may refer to the subject of piracy; no one can read the English drama without seeing that it has always been piratical to a great extent; it is supposed by Mr. Collier and Mr. Hallam that there is not a single play of Shakespeare that was not founded on a previous play, and no one can divide what belongs to Shakespeare and what belongs to other men except by internal evidence; the earliest and best dramatists laid their hands on everything; on tales, history, the speeches of statesmen, ballads, previous plays, translations, on everything they could; there was always great liberty taken by writers for the stage. In the year 1647 the old dramatic system was totally put an end to by the Puritan ordinance of Parliament. I mean the ordinance putting down stage plays, and the interdict lasted for 13 years until the Restoration.

6908. At the Restoration did things go on as they did before?—No, not at all, because a monopoly was immediately made of the drama; two patents were granted to two of the king's servants, and then the theatre became a court amusement, entirely under the control of the court, for the chamberlain frequently interfered, though he did not interfere in a decisive way (not sufficiently for Sir Robert Walpole), but there was a very strong supervision over the plays, and everything was referred to the Chamberlain, and the drama was always thought to be a court amusement.

6909. That was the state of things after the Restoration?—Yes. One witness has stated that the drama has never flourished so well as under the monopoly, referring to the Kemble period in the time of George the Third; but the fact is, that there was no monopoly in Shakspeare's time, because in 1607 or 1608 there were 17 theatres, with a population of only 300,000.

6910. Might anybody have set up a theatre that pleased at that time?—No, not anybody; but anybody under the authority of a nobleman; the actors must be the retainers of some peer, otherwise they would be vagabonds.

6911. Would these 17 theatres be all open at the same time?—Collier, I think, says so in his history of the stage, and that is pretty good authority.

6912. Chairman.]

F. G. Tomlins, Esq.

6912. Chairman.] With regard to the quality of actors at present, you have stated, with respect to tragedy, that at present the public taste did not call for such actors, because people want to be amused; but do you think that it is easy to cast an amusing comedy of a high class, and to fill all the subordinate parts with good actors?—You cannot call it a comedy; but take the "Ticket of Leave," for instance; there was a great deal of excellent acting in that play, quite as good, in my opinion, as formerly in the "Poor Gentleman"; but the allusions of the latter play are antiquated, and the people do not like it, and the actors do not understand it.

6913. From your knowledge of the actors of the present day, could you have amongst the 23 theatres in London a thoroughly good cast at 10 of those theatres at the same time for a drama like the "Ticket of Leave"?—I think there is a great deal of talent of that kind growing up. I have seen those pieces which are performed at the Prince of Wales's Theatre and Sadler's Wells Theatre at the present time, and I have observed that several of the performers are good actors.

6914. Take genteel comedy; is that well acted at present?—If you mean "She Stoops to Conquer," and pieces of that kind, they are not so well acted as they were, because actors are not used to the manners of that age, and cannot fall into them. The actors can get on very well in coats and trousers, but they do not know where they are in those extraordinary footman-looking dresses.

6915. Take a play like "Money," is that easy to fill?—I never saw "Money" performed in any place that it was not successful; and I may add the "Lady of Lyons," provided there was a decent Claude Melnotte.

6916. Those plays are not so difficult to cast, are they?—No, not at all, and the people are always pleased with them.

6917. You do not hold with the view which has been expressed before this Committee, of a falling off in the theatrical talent?—I think there is an inferiority, because I think there is an inferiority in the pieces. I think it is more the literary men's fault than the actors' fault; but I do not blame the literary men, because the taste of the public guides them.

6918. Do you know the views of the actors with respect to performing in music halls?—I never met an actor who did not abuse the music halls.

6919. Notwithstanding that, they might raise their salaries by creating a fresh demand?—They do not think so; the designation of the music halls shows that the managers of them will always think more of music than of acting.

6920. You think that actors would not like much going to music halls even if the music halls gave theatrical performances?—I do not think that celebrated actors would go there, because they are celebrated in another way, and of course they could not be celebrated at the music halls.

6921. Is it the fact, that among actors of all classes there is a prejudice against music halls?—So far as I can judge, it is so.

6922. At all events, there is that feeling?—I think it is a strong trade feeling that it is not their line of life, and they think the music halls empty the theatres.

6923. But if the music halls were allowed to give small pieces, that would clearly create a demand for additional actors, would it not?—It would create an additional demand for a certain class of actors and actresses, and I think you would find that the young women would come out stronger than the men in vaudevelles and mixed pieces of acting and singing. Mrs. Bland first sang at Vauxhall, and that place used to be a large feeder to our theatres.

6924. But actors do not see it at present in that light?—No, they are entirely absorbed in their trade, feeling just as one publican may be supposed to do who wishes to get another public-house out of the same street.

6925. But here it is the actors?—Yes; because they know that it is not the kind of talent that would be desired; it is mostly an acting talent, combined with musical ability, that is wanted at music halls.

6926. You do not think that there is much chance of the music halls performing serious plays?—No, they would never do that.

6927. Only light vaudevilles, and so on?—Yes.

6928. Do you think that they would take much advantage of that permission?—Yes. Now at the Alhambra Music Hall, directly a man has to sing, he has to put a black dress coat on.

6929. They let them dance in costume, but they must sing in plain clothes?—Yes.

6930. Mr. Locke.] They tried to prevent them dancing in costume, did they not?—Yes, but they did not succeed.

6931. Chairman.] Do you think that the amusements of the people are generally up to the mark in the present day?—Not by any means; I think they are injuriously below it.

6932. You include the music halls in that observation, I presume?—Yes; and that is why I wish to give them greater freedom.

6933. Do you think that that comes from the state of the law?—Yes.

6934. In consequence of that they give bad art, you think?—Yes.

6935. It pays, does it not?—Yes, it pays.

6936. Is it worse than it used to be?—No; it is much much better than the "Free and Easies" clubs, and they were an improvement on the "Cock and Hen." Then came the suburban gardens; and now it is all better; the music and the general organisation are far better, and the people are much more civilised.

6937. On the whole, you think that they have taken a turn for the better?—Yes, they have taken a great turn for the better.

6938. The music halls form an important feature, do they not, in these matters?—Yes, very important.

6939. Thirty years ago, were there as many places of this kind as there are now, or were they all on a smaller scale?—They were upon a smaller and more sordid scale, little above public-house parlours; they were not enlarged with any of the forms of a public entertainment; the publicity and elegance of the halls do much good to the manners of the people; and the mixing together in public, in my opinion, does much more towards civilising the people than anything else.

6940. Is the quality of the songs very much improved?—Yes, at Evans's I recollect 20 years ago songs that no woman could hear, and hardly any decent man.

6941. Women were not allowed to go to Evans's, were they?—No, but I have heard the same things at other places; at the gardens at Chelsea, for instance, but such songs are not allowed now anywhere.

F. G. Tomlins, Esq.

1 June 1866.

6942. Chairman.] Do you wish to make any addition to your evidence?—Yes; I wish to correct one statement, and to add very slightly to my evidence with regard to smoking in theatres in Shakespeare's time. There are many evidences of it in the dramas and poems of the day, and, as early as 1598, it is mentioned by Sir John Davies in one of his epigrams, named Skialethia,

"See you him yonder who sits o'er the stage,
With the tobacco pipe now at his mouth?"

In 1604, the prologue to Marston's "Malcontent," shows several customs of the theatre, and amongst others, smoking. The custom is also alluded to in his satire of "The Scourge of Villanie." In 1613, in a play called "Springes to catch Woodcocks," we have the lines,

"And how he sits attended by his page,
That only serves to fill those pipes with smoke."

Ben Jonson, in his "Every Man Out of his Humour," tells us that the gallants smoked in the Lords' Room over the stage. Dekker's "Gull's Horn Book" says, that the gallant made a great display of his smoking abilities at the playhouse. King James, in his "Counterblast" says that smoking was used everywhere, "and no time or action was exempted from the public use of it." I said the other day that 17 theatres were opened in London, and I believe I said at one time, but I do not know that that can be quite substantiated; but at all events there was perfect freedom in those days of Elizabeth and James. The continuator of Stowe says, that there were 17 playhouses built in London between 1570 and 1630, but that includes five inns turned into playhouses, and St. Paul's singing school. I may add also, that on the rolls at the Rolls Chapel, there are several privy seals, and there were grants made to a great number of playhouses. During this period there are many companies of players mentioned, viz.,—the King's players, the Queen's players, the Prince's players, the Duke of York's (afterwards Charles the First) players, the Children of the Revels, the Lord Admiral's players, the Earl of Leicester's players, the Lord Derby's players, the Lord Pembroke's players, the Lord Essex's players, the Lord Strange's players, the Lord Sussex's, the Lord Worcester's, Sir Robert Lane's, Lord Clinton's, and Lord Howard's. Chalmers, who is a very excellent authority, says that at the time of the death of Queen Elizabeth there were 15 companies. There was an Act passed in the 39th of Elizabeth, c. 4, by which noblemen were authorised to license players to act both in town and country. And there was an Act passed in the 1st of James the First, c. 7, which altered the foregoing, and, as Chalmers says, introduced a new policy for the drama, and took away from private persons the privilege of licensing players. James the First granted no exclusive privilege, which is, I think, a very strong point to observe. Concerning the office of the Master of the Revels and the supervision of plays, an important document, the commission to "Edmunde Tylney, Esq.," Master of the Revels, dated the 24th December 1581, is now in existence, being on the patent roll at the Rolls Chapel, and having been printed in extenso in the third volume of the Shakespeare Society's Papers, in 1847. It contains powers more arbitrary than any that would now be allowed. By it the Master of the Revels was empowered to command the services of any painters, embroiderers, tailors, property makers, &c., and in case of their refusal to obey him, to commit them during pleasure, "without bail or mainprize." Over players and playmakers he had absolute power, and could either reform or suppress any of the "playing places" he pleased. I may add, that the musicians paid an annual fee to the Master of the Revels, for a license to perform in the theatres. I have but one more remark to make: I live in the heart of the City, and have lived there many years with my family, which gives me many opportunities of observation in these matters, and I think there is one advantage in the music halls which has not yet been mentioned, namely, that many of the visitors taking their refreshments in the building, get home much earlier than they otherwise would do, because many visitors to the theatres on coming out resort to the public-houses, and stay there. (The Witness handed in the Tylney Commission, 1581.—Vide Appendix.)

Major JOHN JAMES GREIG, called in; and Examined.

Major J. J. Greig.

1 June 1866.

6943. Chairman.] YOU are at the head of the Liverpool police force, are you not?—I am the head constable of the Liverpool police force, and have been so for 14 years.

6944. You are aware that this Committee is inquiring into the system of licenses for theatres and music halls, and the regulations connected with them; and we should be glad to hear something about the working of the system in Liverpool. In Liverpool the magistrates license both the theatres and the music halls, do they not?—Yes; with the exception of the Theatre Royal. There are five theatres in Liverpool; four are licensed by the justices, and the Theatre Royal is licensed by the Lord Chamberlain; and there is a theatrical license granted to a concert hall.

6945. Mr. Locke.] Is that by the magistrates?—Yes, by the magistrates.

6946. Chairman.] Are you acquainted with the form of the license in Liverpool?—It is applied for annually. A plan of the theatre is produced; the magistrates ask questions, especially with regard to the ingress and the egress of the house, and they suggest certain alterations, such as swinging doors, made to open both ways in case of fire.

6947. What is the name of the concert hall where they have a theatrical license?—It is the St. James's Hall, occupied by the Christy Minstrels.

6948. Do they perform plays there?—Burlesque plays. They sing negro songs, and songs of their own composition.

6949. Those licenses are annually renewed, are they not?—Yes; they are annually renewed.

6951. Difficulties were made by the magistrates?—Yes; and a promise required that they would not be admitted.

6952. Was that promise given?—Yes; given and kept.

6953. Do you mean that improper women had been admitted in the audience?—It was too much of a promenade for prostitutes.

6954. Did they enter into any communication with the police to keep them out, or how did they do it?—The police would not disturb a prostitute, so long as she did not appear to be plying her calling, and behaved herself properly.

6955. They were not stopped at the doors?—No.

6956. Therefore, the objection of the magistrates was rather to their promenading in the theatres than to their admission?—It was.

6957. Is there any interference at all with the theatres on the part of either the magistrates or the police?—The police have a right of entry, and they report any irregularity; there are police who attend in some of the theatres.

6958. Are they paid by the manager?—Yes; by the lessee.

6959. It is optional with the lessee to have them in the place, I suppose?—Yes; but it is to his interest to have them, because it checks disorder.

6960. Have you ever known any cases where licenses for new theatres have been refused in Liverpool?—No.

6961. Are the theatres generally pretty full?—They are well attended.

6962. Do you think that the number of theatres in Liverpool would be greater if there were less difficulty in obtaining a license?—I think not; from the social habits of the gentry, who live very much out of town, and who attend less than they might otherwise do, except when a particular star comes, there is not so much inducement to go; but they are respectably attended. There are five theatres; the Theatre Royal, the Amphitheatre, and the Prince of Wales's Theatre, where the gentry go to; the Coliseum and the Adelphi are of a lower class; the working classes principally go there, and not the gentry.

6963. With regard to the second class theatres, is any care taken by the magistrates or by the police, in the way of supervision, with regard to the pieces that are performed, or the danger of fire?—If there was any performance that was at all objectionable, it would be the duty of the police to report it.

6964. Under an Act of Parliament, or under municipal regulations?—The report would be made to the magistrate, and it would be brought against them on the licensing day.

6965. But under what instructions do the police report to the magistrates?—The general instructions; the book of instructions which every man has in his possession.

6966. Is it a police regulation, or is it a magisterial regulation?—The magistrates require that the police should keep them well informed of anything of that kind; and we feel that that comes within the scope of our general duty.

6967. There is no Act of Parliament with regard to that?—No.

6968. But the police act for the magistrates, in reporting for the justices anything objectionable in any of the theatres?—Clearly so.

6969. Suppose there was a theatre where there was danger of the dresses of the ballet-girls catching fire, who would be the authority in Liverpool analogous to that of the Lord Chamberlain in London, and who would require the managers to take precautions?—I think that the Mayor would make a communication through me to the proprietors of that theatre, to say there was danger of life or property.

6970. But would there be any power to interfere effectively, by stopping the performance?—No.

6971. Then what check would there be on such a thing?—There would be the check at the year's end, when the license came to be renewed.

6972. But during the year the manager could practically do as he liked?—I am inclined to say that he would not; he would not so jeopardize his interest.

6973. But legally he could resist any interference?—I think so; but the Mayor's power is very great, so I would rather not answer that as a legal question.

6974. Now with regard to the music halls, are there a great many music halls in Liverpool?—There are five music halls in Liverpool.

6975. Will you kindly state their names?—One is the Philharmonic Hall, which is the Opera House

House of Liverpool; it is the highest class of entertainment, where there are boxes and stalls purchased.

6976. But do they perform dramatic pieces there?—No, it is entirely concerts.

6977. What is the next?—The next is St. George's Hall; that is sometimes let for particular purposes; the volunteer officers and societies give balls.

6978. It is licensed for music, I suppose?—Yes; and they get an occasional wine license for that evening. There is a smaller concert room also which forms part of it.

6979. Mr. Powell.] Is the room where the assizes are held in the same building?—In the same building; it stands to the north of the building. The next is St. James's Hall, which carries with it a theatrical license. The proprietor of that hall was complimented by the magistrates on the last occasion, that the license was granted on account of the extremely good way in which it was conducted. The next is the Lord Nelson-street Concert Hall; established by a number of benevolent and beneficent gentlemen, including the name of Mr. Rathbone, and other prominent names in Liverpool, for the entertainment, amusement, and instruction of the working classes. It is extremely respectably attended by working men and others of a higher class. The mayor goes to it shortly after taking office, and before he quits he goes again to this hall; and he, along with others, addresses the people during the interval of the piano playing or singing, as the case may be. There is no stage play.

6980. Did not Mr. Gladstone appear on one occasion, and make an eloquent speech about music at that hall?—Yes.

6981. Chairman.] Is that all your list?—Yes.

6982. But are there not a great number of other places licensed for music and dancing?—There are 33 public houses which have singing and dancing, 12 beer houses, and three refreshment houses.

6983. Are there no more places than those in all Liverpool where they have music and dancing?—No, no more.

6984. Is there any control whatever over the performances that take place there?—I think it is objectionable to have music and dancing along with a spirit license generally; but I must ask you to bear in mind that there is a very large floating population of sailors in Liverpool, 20,000 seamen; the docks are at our doors; that population is increased by a west wind, and decreased by easterly winds.

6985. But do you think it objectionable that there should be dancing and singing places in Liverpool?—With one exception all the others have been conducted in an objectionable way. It always appeared to me that the inducement to drink had a predominance over the love of amusement.

6986. Do they act burlesques in any of those places?—They act what is known by the name of character dancing, and singing by men and women.

6987. Have they ever attempted in those unlicensed places to give stage plays?—No; I imagine that they would not do that, because the Theatre Act would come into play, and the lessees of the theatres would object.

6988. But if those lessees did not object, would the police or the magistrates interfere with them?—I think not. There is one public house that was built expressly for the purpose; it is advertised in the papers; it bears the name of the Rotunda. It has a small stage erected at one end, and it is a very large room. It has a gallery, and refreshments are sold at the other end. I visited that building, and I found it filled with sailors and mechanics, and there was nothing objectionable in that one; but it is away from the public house in a certain degree; it is built upstairs.

6989. Then are there anything like stage plays there?—There is dumb show; a ballet divertissement.

6990. Have the theatres taken any action against the Rotunda for performing stage plays?—No; because they have only dumb show.

6991. But if they were to go a little beyond that, would the theatrical lessees interfere?—Then they would incur a risk.

6992. You said that there are five music halls in Liverpool; I suppose they are not licensed by the magistrates?—No; except the Christy Minstrels, who have a theatrical license.

6993. Is there smoking and drinking in any of those five music halls in the audience part of the house?—No.

6994. But, besides those music halls, there are public houses in which there is music, singing, and dancing?—Yes, there are 33 of them.

6995. Do you think it would be wise to extend to provincial towns the provisions which we have in London, by which it is necessary for such places to take out a music and dancing license?—I would prefer to answer that question indirectly; I think the concert halls are eagerly attended by the working classes; I think that if there was no singing and dancing in those places it would induce the people to go to a higher class of entertainment in theatres; people when they go to a theatre do not drink inside.

6996. But supposing you had such places, would you have them licensed?—Yes.

6997. At present they can have music and dancing without any license, whereas in London they must have a license?—The magistrates cannot prevent their having music and dancing, or take away the spirit license, so long as the place is properly conducted.

6998. Do you know of any cases of the magistrates having stopped the spirit license for a public house in consequence of the dancing and singing being conducted in a disorderly manner?—No; but there have been informations within the year; there were nine informations against places where music and dancing was carried on.

6999. Were the informations laid on account of offences connected with music and dancing, or on account of general disorder?—General disorder; four of them were public houses, two were refreshment houses, and three were beer houses; those were all the cases in a year.

7000. Then the justices have no power to prevent music and dancing in public houses, so long as good order is maintained?—No.

7001. Supposing the performances were of an objectionable character, what would be the result?—The police would lay the information, and there would be a penalty inflicted.

7002. But supposing there were songs sung that were grossly indecent, would the police interfere if the audience behaved properly?—I think they would.

7003. Have you ever known such a case?—No;

Major J. J. Greig.

1 June 1866.

No; it is generally for indecent behaviour; men and women meeting and drinking, and it is a rather difficult matter to deal with, because some justices hold that if one woman is brought in by a man, she is not there as a prostitute plying her calling.

7004. But do you know of any case where an information has been laid by the police on account of impropriety in the performances?—No.

7005. Should you argue from that that there have been no improprieties in the performances?—None sufficiently gross to call upon the police to interfere.

7006. Do the police consider it part of their duty to watch the performances as well as the conduct of the people?—Yes, entirely. All those places, especially where there is dancing and singing, are open to police inspection; they are visited by the police inspectors, who report to the magistrates.

7007. Where there has been impropriety on the part of the audience the police have interfered?—Yes.

7008. But no impropriety in the performance has ever led to the active interference of the police?—No.

7009. But do you give instructions to the inspectors of police to report upon the performances?—It is naturally part of their duty; any rude language or indecent exhibition, whether within the walls or without the walls, comes within the scope of police report, and inspection.

7010. Do you then think that there is sufficient protection in Liverpool now against improper performances?—There would be greater protection if there was a license attached.

7011. But you have not known of a single case where the police have complained of songs or exhibitions on the stage?—No, they have not complained, though I think that those places have been very much open to objection.

7012. How do you account for the non-interference of the police?—The tonnage of Liverpool brings in so many sailors; those dancing houses are principally where the sailors boarding houses are; they go there, and though you cannot find anything that will carry a conviction, yet the whole conduct of the matter is such that any person who went there I should not like to put in a place of trust.

7013. Mr. Locke.] The sailors themselves dance there with the women?—Yes.

7014. Chairman.] You do not mean dancing on a stage?—No.

7015. Are there many low class places where they have a stage for the performance or singing?—Yes, there is an elevated stage where rough acting goes on; Irish characters principally, and comic songs.

7016. Have those performances ever been objectionable to your knowledge?—I think that they have a very mischievous influence on the young people going to those places.

7017 But some of those places, where there is music and dancing on the stage, are well conducted, I suppose?—It is very exceptional.

7018. Have you got any place in Liverpool which would correspond to the Alhambra in London; are you acquainted with that?—No.

7019. Have you got any large place of the kind?—Where women meet?

7020. No; my question is, are you acquainted with any of the large London music halls?—I am not much acquainted with London.

7021. At Liverpool, are the proprietors of music halls bound to satisfy the magistrates with regard to precautions against fire if they do not take out a theatrical license?—I think that that is a point which has been overlooked until lately by myself. I have not paid that attention to it that I wish to do, since I have heard of this inquiry, but I should like to say that I have seen precautions. When a distinguished gentleman came down to Liverpool, and they had a large meeting at the theatre, I thought that a mischievous voice might cry out fire, when there was no fire, and I went to see the building. In the amphitheatre there are two large hydrants, with hose and branches, and all appliances within the walls of the theatre, and there is also another small one, and there is always a fireman in the amphitheatre whenever there is any performance going on.

7022. Under whose charge are the firemen in Liverpool?—They consist of the police of Liverpool; there are 150 of them who do the ordinary duty of police constables when there is no fire; they are scattered all round the town, and they are doing duty in various parts of the town. There are 19 stations, and the alarm of fire is quickly passed; and when the fire is over, they return to their duty as policemen.

7023. Colonel Sturt.] The policemen leave their beats?—They divide their beats, that is provided for by the inspector; two men take the duty of three.

7024. Chairman.] The number of the police is diminished in a given district whenever there is a fire then?—It does not affect the general duty much; the men are paid a little more, and it does not strip the streets much.

7025. The magistrates, before granting licenses to theatres, satisfy themselves with regard to the mode of ingress and egress, and that there are all necessary precautions taken against fire, do they?—The chairman of the Watch Committee, and some of the justices, have visited them, and pointed out improvements and alterations that would facilitate the dispersing of the house if there was a fire.

7026. But if there is no theatrical license, but merely a spirit license to these large concert halls, no means are taken to ascertain whether they are safe against fire or not; taking the Rotunda, for instance, if any new place like that were to be built, there would be no precautions taken with regard to fire on the part of the magistrates?—Taking the last place which is now being built, which will hold 1,800 people, the Fire Prevention Committee directed the borough surveyor to see the architect, on purpose that the doors might be satisfactory to him in case of accident or panic by fire.

7027. Is it under the regulation of the bench of magistrates?—No, under the Fire Prevention Committee.

7028. What is that committee?—It is a section of the Watch Committee, which is a section of the municipal council.

7029. Is it your opinion that the system of licensing the music halls should be adopted by the magistrates, or could you suggest any other authority?—I would multiply such concerts as are nearest the Christy Minstrels, which are very eagerly attended, but I think dancing and drinking in public houses have a bad tendency.

7030. That is not what my question points to; suppose those licenses to be granted, do you think think that the magistrates are the best persons to grant them?—Distinctly, on account of their local knowledge, and on account of the information they can immediately obtain from the police.

7031. But certain of the magistrates sometimes take one view and others of the magistrates take another view, I suppose; does not that system sometimes produce a divergence of action on different occasions?—No doubt.

7032. Has there not been a great controversy in Liverpool about licensing public houses?—They have been very freely granted lately.

7033. Has that been by a large majority of the magistrates, or has there been a controversy?—The bench of magistrates entertain very different opinions one from the other on that point.

7034. But if it were necessary for proprietors of music halls to take out licenses, do you think they would find that the magistrates would grant them easily, or that they would introduce any difficulties?—I think they would ask generally for a report from the police; my own action would be guided a good deal by the neighbourhood, and the character of the people who abounded there.

7035. I gather from your evidence that your advice would generally be not to grant them?—I think so.

7036. That is the correct deduction from your evidence?—Yes.

7037. Then you would refuse the dancing and music license, guiding yourself by considerations connected with the neighbourhood?—That would guide me a good deal; if they were conducted like the Rotunda, which has the advantage of standing by itself, being built expressly for the purpose, and great correctness observed, I would not report against such an establishment as that.

7038. But in general you would object to dancing and singing in public houses?—I would.

7039. Mr. Locke.] If I understand you rightly, there are three descriptions of places in Liverpool; first the theatres, next the concert halls, and in the third place public houses, where they have music and dancing?—Yes.

7040. Is there any other species of place in your mind now?—No, that comprehends them all; there are assembly rooms, which are employed for teaching dancing, where balls take place; for instance, there is one where a professional person teaches.

7041. That they can do at Liverpool without any license whatever?—Yes.

7042. First of all, let me call your attention to the theatres; I think you were labouring under a mistake when you said that the only power vested in the magistrates was that of withdrawing the license of a theatre upon the licensing day if any impropriety had taken place; did you not say that?—I said so.

7043. Let me call your attention to the 9th section of the Act 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68: "And be it enacted, that the said justices of the peace at a special licensing session, or at some adjournment thereof, shall make suitable rules for preserving order and decency at the several theatres licensed by them within their jurisdiction, and for regulating the times during which they shall severally be allowed to be open, and from time to time, at another special session, of which notice shall be given as aforesaid, may rescind or alter such rules; and it shall be lawful for any of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State to rescind or alter any such rules, and also to make such other rules for the like purpose, as to him shall seem fit; and a copy of all rules which shall be in force for the time being shall be annexed to every such license; and in case any riot or breach of the said rules in any such theatre shall be proved on oath before any two justices usually acting in the jurisdiction where such theatre is situated, it shall be lawful for them to order that the same be closed for such time as to the said justices shall seem fit; and while such order shall be in force, the theatre so ordered to be closed shall be deemed an unlicensed house." It appears, does it not, that not only have the magistrates the power of taking away the license at the next licensing day, but they may close the theatre at any time they please if any riot takes place, or if there is any breach of the rules laid down?—I was not aware that those powers existed.

7044. But at all events that power has never been exercised in Liverpool?—No.

7045. Then the Committee may take it for granted that the theatres have been extremely well conducted in Liverpool, as there has never been any necessity for putting into force the powers of that section?—Yes.

7046. Now are there any rules for the licensing of the theatres drawn up by the magistrates in Liverpool?—None; except the usual terms of the license.

7047. Those rules are to be annexed to the license, are they not?—Yes.

7048. And is a copy of the license given to you?—No.

7049. Therefore you simply act on your own discretion with regard to what you think may be proper or not in the theatres?—Yes; but it is submitted to the town clerk, or a legal gentleman to guide me.

7050. But he does not give you the rules or regulations with regard to the theatres, to guide you?—No, but I could easily have them.

7051. Now will you look at that paper (handing a paper to the Witness); those are the rules and regulations laid down at Sheffield under the provisions of this Act, are they not?—Yes; they appear to be so.

7052. You have nothing of that sort at Liverpool?—No, not that I am aware of.

7053. Now with regard to the concert rooms, as you call them; are those places that have a wine and spirit license granted to them by the magistrates?—Some of them have.

7054. Will you just inform the Committee of those which have a wine and spirit license?—The Philharmonic has an occasional license.

7055. First of all, what is the Philharmonic?—It is the Opera House of Liverpool.

7056. By whom is it licensed?—It is a private proprietary; it has no license.

7057. What kind of entertainment takes place there?—Philharmonic concerts.

7058. Is it confined entirely to that?—Yes, in the way of entertainments; there have been large dinners given there; the Conservative party and the Liberal party have each entertained their friends there.

7059. Who is the proprietor of that hall?—It is the highest class proprietary; boxes and shares are sold as they become vacant, or as a person feels disposed to sell them.

7060. Is there no manager?—There is a secretary, and there is a committee of gentlemen, who have the management of it.

Major J. J. Greig.

1 June 1866.

7061. Now when you grant this occasional license, to whom is it given?—That is taken out of my own hands since the Closing Act passed.

7062. Is it only taken out of your hands since that last Act of Parliament was passed?—Yes.

7063. But I understood you to say that they never held a license at all, unless they had an occasional license; has the Philharmonic Concert Hall an ordinary wine and spirit license granted to it?—No, it has not.

7064. The occasional Licensing Act was passed to give an opportunity to a licensed house to be kept open beyond certain specified hours?—Yes.

7065. But you grant an occasional license to the Philharmonic Concert Hall, which has no other license?—Yes, a license is granted, but I do not grant it.

7066. But it is granted by the justices at Liverpool?—Yes, by the justices at Liverpool.

7067. Do you grant occasional licenses to public houses?—The first Act stated that they must close at one, and then a subsequent Act was passed which took it out of the hands of the police; it is in the hands of the justices, and it is to the justices that they make application to keep open until two, or three, or four o'clock in the morning.

7068. That is the public houses?—Yes, or balls, or any other place.

7069. You have said that the justices grant an occasional license to a place which has no spirit license at all?—Yes, they employ some one who has a spirit license.

7070. They employ somebody to come there who has a license already?—Yes.

7071. And by virtue of the license which this somebody has, he would supply wine and spirits up to one o'clock?—Yes.

7072. And then this person has an occasional license granted to him to keep open beyond that time?—The entertainments never go beyond one o'clock.

7073. Then what do they want with an occasional license?—There are refreshments, such as tea, coffee, and there may be champagne and sherry.

7074. That requires a wine license?—Yes.

7075. But who is the person that comes and has the direction of the supply of the refreshments?—I do not know.

7076. But he is a person who has a license besides the occasional license, is he not?—I believe he is, but I do not know.

7077. Do you know to whom the occasional license is granted?—I do not.

7078. You do not know how it is that the Philharmonic Concert Hall sells wines and spirits?—I do not think they sell spirits.

7079. But they sell wine; it is the same thing, is it not?—Not quite; wine requires a wine license, and the other requires a spirit license.

7080. But the two things are always granted together, are they not?—The licenses are different; the wine license is different from the spirit license.

7081. Not a wine license to sell wine over the counter?—I understand so.

7082. You are thinking of a refreshment house, are you not?—If a refreshment house keeps open between ten o'clock at night and five in the morning, they must have a refreshment license.

7083. But the refreshment house license is not taken from the magistrates at all?—No; the refreshment license is granted by the Excise.

7084. But you started by saying that the license to those persons at the Philharmonic Hall was granted by the magistrates, and now you say that it is not a spirit license, but a wine license; in that case it is not necessary to apply to the magistrates, is it?—I do not know the circumstances at present.

7085. May we then call that Philharmonic Hall a nondescript place?—I do not really know.

7086. At all events, it does not come within the category of a public house nor a music hall, which is licensed by the magistrates to sell wine and spirits?—I said that it was the Opera House of Liverpool, and that it was frequented by the highest persons in the town; I cannot say any more.

7087. Now is this correct (because I have it from a very high authority that this is not an occasional license which the Philharmonic Concert Hall gets); it is a permit from the Excise or magistrates, or both, to a publican already licensed, to sell on a special occasion in another place than his house, just as at races, &c.?—I am always glad to be put right.

7088. The magistrates at Liverpool have at one time been a very strict class of people with regard to this licensing, and at another time they have been less so; is not that so?—Unless you press me I would rather not answer that question; I will give you the figures for it: in 1861 there were 1,567 public houses, in 1862 there were 1,667 public houses, in 1863 there were 1,681 public houses, in 1864 there were 1,837 public houses, and in 1865 there were 1,934 public houses.

7089. But previously to those five years, was there not a great difference of opinion among the magistrates with regard to licensing public houses, and were not the licenses very much more restricted than they are now?—Yes.

7090. Then, I think, the magistrates came to a resolution to grant all licenses applied for, provided the house was a fit house for the purpose, and that the person who was to keep it was a person of good character?—The magistrates have differed in opinion, but the majority of them have been for granting the spirit license freely; they have more control over these places when they have a spirit license; the publicans have more to lose in case of any impropriety than when they have a beer license only.

7091. Have the magistrates considered those two things which I have alluded to, namely, that the house should be a proper house, and that the person keeping it should be respectable?—Those are questions always asked; the suitability of the premises and the character of the person, and the sanitary arrangements.

7092. Then that other ingredient, which all other magistrates that I have ever heard of include, namely, the wants of the neighbourhood, is set on one side at Liverpool?—I am not prepared to speak on that point.

7093. I suppose you have been at the Sessions when those applications have taken place?—No; I keep away entirely.

7094. The wants of the neighbourhood are not an ingredient in the case, at all events?—That is a wide expression.

7095. But the view of the magistrates is this, that it is better, in order to place those persons under their control, that instead of the houses being being merely beer houses where they cannot take away the license, except under very particular circumstances, they should have a wine and spirit license, because then if there is anything improper the magistaates can take away the license?—Yes.

7096. The magistrates take the view that it is better to grant licenses indiscriminately where a man is a man of good character, and the house a proper one, they having the power to take the license away?—That may guide them or not.

7097. But that is the result, is it not?—I have given you the result.

7098. That is the ground on which they license all the public-houses in Liverpool; but now passing from the Philharmonic Concert Hall, what other places are there in Liverpool where performances are given?—There is St. James's Hall.

7099. What do they do there?—The Christy Minstrels perform there, they have burlesques and negro songs; it is exceedingly well conducted, and they have very good music.

7100. I see by an advertisement that they have been giving the "Barber of Seville," but how did they give that there; have they a theatrical license there?—Yes.

7101. Then we need not inquire further into that; but will you kindly mention some place at which performances are given, though they have not a theatrical license?—At those public-houses where they have character dancing, and men and women singing.

7102. Is there any entertainment beyond that given at any of those public houses?—If I understand your question rightly, I should say no, I do not know of any.

7103. You say that you have not been to any of the music halls in London?—No, I go very little from home.

7104. There is no ballet at any of those public-houses in Liverpool, I suppose?—The Rotunda has a ballet; that is to say they have a little dancing and a little singing.

7105. Colonel Sturt.] On a stage?—Yes, on a stage.

7106. Mr. Locke.] Is there scenery?—Yes, there is scenery.

7107. Do the persons dance in character?—Yes. I am not sure that I know what you mean by a ballet.

7108. What we call ballet is a series of dances which has some story in it?—No doubt.

7109. Have you seen ballets at theatres?—Yes.

7110. Do they give a similar thing in this Rotunda?—Yes.

7111. I understood you to say that the Rotunda was very well conducted, and a very proper place of entertainment?—Yes.

7112. Now is there any other place besides the Rotunda where performances of such description are given?—There are 33 public houses, the Rotunda is one, and that leaves 32 where there is singing and dancing, character dancing.

7113. Is there character dancing at all of those 32 public houses?—Not all.

7114. Some of them are places where the visitors dance and sing?—Quite so.

7115. But there are others where performers are engaged to do it?—Yes.

7116. How many of those are there where performers are engaged?—I should say about one third.

7117. In that one-third are those houses well conducted?—I think that music and dancing at such places is always objectionable, because it brings about a certain degree of drinking.

7118. I do not mean places where people dance themselves; I mean places where performers are engaged?—I should say the same with regard to them.

7119. You say that they are not all of them well conducted?—I think not.

7120. Have any complaints been made against them to the magistrates?—No, except that there were nine informations laid in the course of one year.

7121. What were those for?—Those informations were against places where there was music and dancing carried on. Four of them were public houses.

7122. What were the informations about?—For knowingly permitting drunkenness or disorderly conduct.

7123. Against what houses were they laid?—I cannot tell you out of the 1,949.

7124. You are taking all the public houses in Liverpool, then, are you?—Yes.

7125. How many informations were there, did you say?—Nine where there was music and dancing.

7126. How many houses are there where there is music and dancing?—There are 33 public houses, twelve beer houses, and three refreshment houses.

7127. Those informations were confined, I presume, to the public houses?—Four public houses, three beer houses, and two refreshment houses.

7128. Those, in fact, were all the informations during 12 months?—Yes, for one year. The informations for infractions of the law against publicans for the year ending September, which is the end of the police year, were 208.

7129. Keeping open a little later, Sunday trading, and so on?—Yes, all things of that sort.

7130. Yes, but I am speaking with regard to offences connected with those houses which have performances in them; I want to know how many informations have been laid against them?—Nine altogether; four public houses, three beer houses, and two refreshment houses.

7131. There were only four informations, in fact, against those houses where they had performances, during one 12 months?—Just so.

7132. Can you inform the Committee exactly what those four informations were about?—No; but I have no doubt it was for knowingly permitting prostitutes to meet and remain there, or for disorder in the house. By referring I may be able to give you the exact nature of the informations in question.

7133. I am asking you expressly with regard to those houses where performances are given on the stage, and I understand you to say that the number of informations against houses of that description, during one year, is four?—Yes, that is so.

7134. Can you now inform the Committee what these four informations were for?—Yes; I find that two of them were for selling after hours, and I am very sorry to add that the other two were for harbouring the police.

7135. That makes the four cases that you spoke of?—Yes.

7136. I suppose that those policemen would not be harboured unless they liked it?—

Major J. J. Greig.

1 June 1866.

There must be two parties to such a bargain as that.

7137. There is an enormous number of sailors at Liverpool, is there not?—There are 20,000, as a rule, and that number is increased by a west wind.

7138. Do you not think, under all those circumstances (and I am sure it does you very great credit), that those houses at Liverpool are most admirably well conducted, taking into account especially your floating population of 20,000 sailors, a great portion of them absolutely requiring amusement?—The floating population is a great feature in Liverpool; the seamen spend a great deal of money, and that increases the number of women; the proportion to Glasgow and Manchester is extremely large; Liverpool stands prominent in that respect.

7139. The houses are very well conducted, are they not?—It is very difficult to carry a conviction against a public house for knowingly giving drink to a drunken person.

7140. But that is an ordinary public house offence, is it not?—I thought you were asking how the whole of those houses were conducted.

7141. Yes; the whole of them?—Then I would reply that many of them are badly conducted; 127 of those houses are shut up on a Sunday, so that that shows that there are some good ones.

7142. Keeping a house open on a Sunday, after hours, is an ordinary public house offence, is it not?—Yes.

7143. Then we have that question about bonâ fide travellers, I suppose?—No doubt.

7144. Mr. Powell.] I want to ask you a few questions, more for the sake of clearness than anything else, I believe there are five theatres in Liverpool?—Yes.

7145. One of which is a patent theatre?—Yes.

7146. And is licensed under the Lord Chamberlain?—Yes.

7147. Can you supply the Committee with the names of the theatres, and the number of the persons whom each theatre will receive?—The Theatre Royal is open by the license of the Lord Chamberlain, and it contains 2,055 people; the lessee is Mr. Copeland; the Amphitheatre holds 1,950, the Prince of Wales's (which is exceedingly well conducted), holds 1,195 people; the Adelphi holds 1,800 people, and the Colloseum holds 1,700 people, making a total of 8,700.

7148. Is there not, besides those theatres, a scheme more or less matured for building an opera house in Liverpool?—Yes; it is at this moment in a state of progress.

7149. Can you give the Committee any approximation to the number of spectators which they intend to accommodate in that new opera house?—Somewhere about 1,800.

7150. Do you consider that those theatres in Liverpool are well attended with regard to the numbers of the audiences?—I think so; the Prince of Wales's Theatre is generally full; it depends very much on the actor or actress playing.

7151. Have there been any changes in the management of those theatres?—No; almost none; there has been none at the Amphitheatre, or the Theatre Royal, or the Prince of Wales's.

7152. You would probably infer from that that the theatres have been reasonably successful speculations?—I think so.

7153. Do you think that the present state of the law affords any obstruction to the multiplication of theatres?—None whatever.

7154. Is it the custom of the police at Liverpool to visit the theatres with a view to see that there is nothing objectionable in the performances?—Yes.

7155. Did Miss Menken go down to Liverpool?—Yes.

7156. Was not there an objection taken to her proceeding?—Yes; it was represented as a very indecent performance; the mayor communicated with me, and I was sent to say that the performance must be altered, and made more decent.

7157. And your wish was complied with?—The lessee happened to be in London, and it was continued for two nights longer, but care was taken to alter it somewhat.

7158. Was your complaint renewed?—No.

7159. The St. James's Hall has a theatrical license, has it not?—Yes, it is a very favourite place.

7160. In what respect is St. James's Hall not a theatre, seeing that it has a theatrical license; is it in the construction of the building?—Yes, it is in the construction of the building, because it is almost on the level, except with regard to a small stage erected at the east end.

7161. Is there any consumption of beer or spirits, or is there smoking going on in the audience part of the hall?—I am quite sure not.

7162. You have in Liverpool some rooms which you describe as assembly rooms?—Yes.

7163. Are there amateur dramatic performances in those assembly rooms?—No; there is a hall called the Odd Fellows Hall, where sometimes the volunteer officers entertain their men, and sometimes there are Orange meetings there, and there has been a ragged school dinner given there by Mr. Horsfall, but there are no theatrical exhibitions; that is an example of what I mean.

7165. Do I correctly understand you to say that in none of those places of entertainment which you denominate as music halls, is there smoking, eating, and drinking going on among the audience during the performances?—None.

7166. Amongst those places which you have named, several are places of entertainment of the very highest class, frequented by the best families in Liverpool?—Yes; the Philharmonic particularly, it is a proprietary place.

7167. The proprietors have to pay a very considerable sum for the enjoyment of their privileges, have they not?—Yes, they purchase a stall or a box, and the cost is very considerable.

7168. Have you any room in Liverpool of considerable size holding, we will say for example, 300 people, or something more, with a platform whereon performances or singing takes place, and where the audience are smoking, eating, and drinking during the performance?—None, except the Rotunda, on any such scale.

7169. At

Major J. J. Greig.

1 June 1866.

7169. At the Rotunda you have character dancing and ballet?—Yes.

7170. How many persons would be received in the Rotunda at one time?—Speaking approximately, I should say 1,000 people.

7171. Have you found the Rotunda to be a resort of ladies of loose character?—No.

7172. Do you know what steps are taken to exclude them?—I think that the manager is very careful.

7173. Have you many cases of intoxication arising from that place of entertainment?—No, I think not.

7174. I asked you if there was any place holding 300 people or more where there was a platform with smoking, eating, and drinking going on during the performance, and you said there was not, now we will come to the public houses: confining yourself to rooms in public houses, or refreshment rooms, or any place of public resort where character dancing takes place on a stage, and where there is smoking, eating, and drinking going on among the audience, how many of such places should you say there were in Liverpool?—I should say that there is one-third of the number which I gave.

7175. Speaking as accurately as may be, will you give us the number of spectators in each of them, on the average?—I have not a correct answer to give you.

7176. Would they be rooms holding 50 or 60, or 200 or 300 people?—I should say 50 or 60, or up to 100 people.

7177. You mentioned that there had been four complaints in 12 months against such places?—Yes.

7178. That was with regard to entertainment rooms of the class just mentioned?—Yes, where there is singing and dancing on the stage.

7179. Should you say that those four informations were the average number?—I think not; I think the average number is not represented by that, because the magistrates have dealt very severely with those places where loose women get together.

7180. What should you say would be a more accurate average than the four complaints?—I think they would be considerably more.

7181. You have, however, no data with you from which to supply the exact information?—No, except from personal recollection.

7182. How should you describe the general character of the audiences in those places; first, with regard to their station in life?—The working class and sailors, mixed with women.

7183. Do you mean women of a certain class, or the wives of the men?—I mean women who go into such society.

7184. In the case of those rooms where you say 50 or 60 persons, up to 100, assemble, when the license is granted, is any inquiry made with regard to safety of access or egress?—No there has not been.

7185. If it were to be shown by the police that there was risk and danger, owing to the imperfect nature of the access in such places, would the magistrates withdraw their license?—The magistrates would withdraw their license.

7186. Chairman.] Are there many literary and scientific institutions in Liverpool?—Yes.

7187. Do they ever give theatrical performances, as some of them do in London?—There are no similar cases in Liverpool; we have some very excellent institutions, such as the Queen's Institute and the Royal Institution.

7188. Are there not occasionally theatrical performances of that kind?—No.

7189. Are there ever theatrical performance given for charities?—Only in the theatres.

7190. Those performances are not given in any of the unlicensed buildings?—No.

7191. Are there no theatrical performances got up by any of the clubs in Liverpool?—No; the volunteer officers do it sometimes, but they always confine it to the theatres.

7192. You know of no case of a theatrical entertainment being given occasionally in unlicensed places?—I do not.

7193. Mr. Locke.] Do you know the Coloseum?—Yes.

7194. That is a building capable of holding 3,000 people, is it not?—Yes.

7195. Is that an audience of working people?—Chiefly 7196. Is it a well-conducted place?—It is situated in Paradise-street, which is a very busy and a very disorderly thoroughfare.

7197. The people when they get inside are well conducted, I suppose?—They are obliged to be so, to a certain degree, or they would be turned out.

7198. But it is, in fact, a well-conducted place, is it not?—Yes, the police have never reported against it.

7199. Chairman.] Have you anything further to add to your evidence?—No.

John Jackson, Esq., called in; and Examined.

J. Jackson, Esq.

7200. Mr. Locke.] Are you head constable of the borough of Sheffield?—I am.

7201. How long have you held that appointment?—For nearly eight years.

7202. Has your attention been directed to the licensing of theatres and other places of entertainment in Sheffield?—Yes.

7203. First of all, how many theatres are there in Sheffield?—We have but one licensed theatre at present.

7204. What is the name of that theatre?—The Theatre Royal.

7205. Is that theatre licensed by the magistrates?—Yes.

7206. Do the magistrates in licensing the Theatre Royal draw out rules for the regulation of the building?—Yes; certainly.

7207. Have you a copy of the rules there?—Yes; this is a copy of the rules at present enforced (producing a copy.—Vide Appendix)

7208. Those rules are made under the provisions of the 6th & 7th Victoria, are they not?—Yes, they are.

7209. Which Act gives power to the magistrates to license theatres?—Yes.

7210. I see in this copy that the 9th section of the Act of the 6th & 7th Victoria is set out?—It is.

7211. If any of those rules are infringed under that section the magistrates have power to shut up the theatre, have they not?—Certainly.

7212. Has that ever occurred?—Never, to my knowledge.

J. Jackson, Esq.

1 June 1866.

7213. Is the theatre at Sheffield well conducted?—Very well conducted.

7214. How many persons is it capable of accommodating?—I should think 1,500 people, or upwards.

7215. What other places of entertainment are there in Sheffield?—We have a music hall, called the Alexandra Music Hall, capable of holding from about 3,000 to 4,000 people, which is also exceedingly well conducted, but which is unlicensed.

7216. You mean unlicensed as a theatre?—Yes; unlicensed as a theatre.

7217. Is it licensed for the sale of wines and spirits?—It is not licensed for the sale of wines and spirits, but it is licensed for the sale of beer. Beer is sold in refreshment rooms attached to each department of the house.

7218. But not in the place where the people sit?—No; no drinking takes place in that part of the building where performances are going on. There is another building known as a music hall; but that is called a music hall inasmuch as it is more especially used for holding concerts, in most instances, of a very high class. Mr. Sims Reeves, and most of the singers of the Italian Opera Company, when they take their provincial tour, come there, and they give concerts which are very well attended. There are other entertainments given in the same building, such as panoramas, Christy Minstrels, and other entertainments.

7219. Any dancing?—No dancing.

7220. Any tumbling?—I have never seen tumbling there.

7221. What other places of entertainment are there in Sheffield?—We have public houses, at which singing and dancing takes place; at present there is not much dancing, I am glad to say.

7222. You are not fond of dancing?—I am not fond of dancing in public houses in which the audience are permitted to take part.

7223. I want to ask you more particularly with regard to places where there are actors or dancers who give performances on a stage. Are there any places of that description at Sheffield?—None, except those that I have described, and those that take place in a few of the public houses.

7224. Will you mention the name of any one of those public houses in which those entertainments take place?—There is one in Union-street, having a large room, in which public dancing and singing take place on the stage.

7225. Is that a well-conducted place?—It is a well-conducted place.

7226. Do you draw a clear distinction between those places where a performance is given and those places where the audience themselves dance and sing?—Yes.

7227. Those places where performances are given, you say, are well conducted?—They are.

7228. They have merely a wine and spirit license?—Yes; an ordinary public house license.

7229. There is no such thing as a music and dancing license at Sheffield, I suppose?—No.

7230. Nor is there, I believe, a music and dancing license in any place beyond 20 miles of London, unless there is a local Act?—No; there is no public Act authorising the licensing of those places beyond the metropolis.

7231. Chairman.] Is there a Local Act at Sheffield upon that point?—No; not upon that point.

7232. Is there a Local Act in any towns that you know of?—Yes.

7233. In what town?—There is one in Oldham, where I was chief constable for 10 years. We have a Local Act at Sheffield on other matters, of course.

7234. But it does not touch upon this question?—No, it does not.

7235. Mr. Locke.] Is there any other place of the same description at Sheffield where they give performances of the stage?—There are.

7236. Are they all well conducted?—Yes; they are all well conducted. I have had very little reason to complain of them. A short time ago there were two large dancing rooms attached to public houses, in which the audience were permitted to join, and where girls of loose character were permitted to go and dance, and to meet men, and so on. I summoned them for not maintaining good order; and the license in one case was withdrawn, and in the other case the room was shut up; and the consequence is that I now see no great cause of complaint.

7237. But where performances are given, they are well conducted, not only at the theatres but also at those other places?—Yes, there is no disorder.

7238. Do persons take refreshments in the place where they sit below the stage in those places?—Yes, they do.

7239. I suppose you have been to the music halls in London?—I have been in one or two of them.

7240. Are the music halls at Sheffield similar in their arrangements to those in London?—Yes, except that they are not so large, nor so finely fitted up.

7241. You spoke of Oldham, and you say that there is a local Act there?—Yes, there is a local Act at Oldham; it has been obtained since I left, but I know something of its provisions.

7242. Do you know the Act?—No, I only know that it has been obtained since I left the place.

7243. Can you give the Committee the date of that Act?—I believe it was obtained in the Session of Parliament before this; it is very recent, I know, and they are only just beginning to grant licenses under it.

7244. What licenses do they grant under that Act?—I have not seen it.

7245. I understand you to say that those places in Sheffield where entertainments of the stage are given, are well conducted, and that you see no objection to them; is that so?—Yes, they are certainly well conducted.

7246. Now what class of persons frequent those places?—They are principally the better conducted of the working class.

7247. Do the working class who go to those places, go alone, or are they accompanied by their wives?—They take their wives, and in many instances their children.

7248. Do they pay anything for entrance?—There are some at which a fixed charge is made for entrance, and a certain amount of refreshment is returned for it, and there are others where no charge is made, but the person is expected to take refreshments.

7249. Are refreshments taken to any great extent at those places?—I never heard any reports of any drunkenness taking place in them.

7250. Do you think that a woman going with her husband to such a place, would be a check on his getting drunk?—I do.

7251. He would be less likely to get drunk there than if he were to go to a public house alone, where he had nothing to attract his attention but drink?—A man would be less likely to misconduct himself with his wife than without her.

7252. At those places a man is accompanied by his wife?—Yes; of course men go without their wives largely to those places; but it is not an uncommon thing to see a man take his wife.

7253. They conduct themselves properly, you say?—Yes, they conduct themselves very well.

7254. What are the entertainments?—Character singing and dancing.

7255. Did you ever see a ballet given there?—Never at any of those places.

7256. There is part singing?—Yes, character singing partially dressed; nigger songs and Irish songs.

7257. Are the songs of a good description; is there any impropriety?—In two or three of the better conducted places, the nature of the singing is very good, and the character of the persons who attend them is apparently respectable; they are well dressed and well conducted people.

7258. Do you think that those places are beneficial to persons who require amusement?—I think that if the magistrates had more immediate control over them, and they could make rules for their regulation, as they do in the case of theatres, it would be an advantage; it would be well to exclude very young persons from them.

7259. Mr. Miller.] Why?—I do not think it is advisable that very young persons should go to public houses where drinking and smoking takes place; I have seen very young persons there.

7260. Chairman.] How young?—Persons under 12 years of age.

7261. Mr. Powell.] Would you let young women, of ages from 15 to 17, go there?—They would be better away.

7262. Mr. Locke.] Perhaps you think they would be better out of theatres too?—It would a good deal depend on the nature of the performances as to whether I should not think so.

7263. Chairman.] Do you think public opinion at Sheffield would justify such an exclusion as you suggest?—The exclusion of persons of tender age, certainly.

7264. Up to what age would you propose to make that exclusion?—Up to 14.

7265. Mr. Locke.] Suppose they go there with their parents, would you see any objection to that?—I think it is objectionable that they should be there at all; but I think that that would be much less objectionable than if they were there alone.

7266. Suppose a man with his wife and children goes there, and he takes refreshment whilst he is witnessing the performance, do you see any objection to that?—In some of them there is no great objection to that, except that it familiarises the children to seeing drinking and smoking and so on; beyond that there is no objection. I do not mean to say that anything takes place in many of those places which can be considered obscene and rude. There are plenty of places where an innocent person might sit without having his feelings shocked.

7267. Chairman.] Are there other places where things take place, which might be called obscene?—Not what would be technically called obscene, certainly not; I do not mean to say that in some of the dancing there are not things which might suggest improper thoughts to innocent minds.

7268. Lord Eustace Cecil.] Are there such things at Sheffield as casinos at all?—Many persons consider a casino a singing room.

7269. But I mean public dancing rooms?—No; we had two places of that kind, but they have been suppressed.

7270. You have none at the present time?—None.

7271. How many persons would the largest music hall hold?—The Alexandra would accommodate 3,000 or 4,000 people.

7272. You say that it is a well conducted place?—Exceedingly well conducted; I know of none better.

7273. Does the proprietor have policemen there?—Yes, every night.

7274. Where do they stand?—They stand at the door, and if any person who is believed to be an improper character presents himself for admission, the policeman reports it to the doorkeeper, and he refuses him admittance.

7275. Do you think it might be an advantage, with regard to many of the houses in Sheffield, if the police had more distinctly defined powers?—I do not think so; but I do think that if the magistrates had the power to make rules, somewhat similar to the rules for theatres, it would be an advantage.

7276. Mr. Clay.] You have not yourself much experience of those establishments which we called casinos?—No.

7277. The name is taken from a well known establishment in London; do you know sufficiently of those casinos to be aware that they are places where women of notoriously bad character went, for the purpose of plying their profession?—No, I do not know that; if they did go there for that purpose, I should very decidedly object to them.

7278. Are you aware that in some places where those casinos existed, music halls having been subsequently established, the casino has been closed because so many respectable people preferred the more decent entertainment of the music halls?—No, I do not know that; my knowledge is exceedingly limited with regard to that class of house.

7279. Does not it appear to you very probable that if a music hall, with all its ordinary entertainments, which any class of people may enjoy, were started in a place where one of those casinos existed, the tendency would be to take away the more respectable parts of the people who went to the casino, and thereby diminish the evil?—Respectable people will go to respectable places, and disreputable people will go to disreputable places; but inasmuch as I have no knowledge of what takes place in those casinos, I cannot answer your question more definitely.

7280. But if there is only one place of amusement of any kind, both classes of people are likely to go to it, I suppose?—No, I think not; respectable people would not go to a disreputable place, even supposing that no other place of amusement existed.

7281. Mr. Miller.] Are the music halls in Sheffield subject to any magisterial rules?—No; they have a music hall at Sheffield which is nothing nothing more than a concert hall, at which concerts are occasionally held. That is not in any way subject to magisterial interference. It is a hall belonging to a body of proprietors, who built it for the purpose of diffusing a more general feeling in favour of good music. With regard to the other music hall, of which I have been speaking, namely, the Alexandra, which I have already said is well conducted, that is the property of the person who keeps it; of course it is to his advantage to have it filled, and it is exceedingly well conducted.

J. Jackson, Esq.

1 June 1866.

7282. Mr. Locke.] Did you say whether that music hall has a spirit license or not?—It has no spirit license, but beer is sold in refreshment rooms attached to the building, just as though you passed from this room into the lobby.

7283. Mr. Miller.] Are there any establishments in Sheffield where theatrical performances are given, and where the audience are sitting while smoking, eating, and drinking are going on?—None.

7284. Not one at all?—Not one at all.

7285. Mr. Locke.] Are there places where there is dancing in character?—Those are not, in my opinion, theatrical performances; if they were, our police would lay informations against them, under my direction.

7286. Chairman.] Under what authority would the police do that?—Under the 6th & 7th Vict., which imposes a penalty of 20*l.*

7287. You consider it to be your duty to lay informations in all cases where those theatrical performances are given without a license?—Certainly.

7288. But if theatrical performances were got up for charity in some large private house, where they charged an entrance fee of 5*s.*, would you lay information against them, in order to impose that penalty of 20*l.*?—I should have to consider whether or no it was a public performance; if it was, it would be my duty, undoubtedly, to lay an information against them.

7289. Have you ever had a case of that kind?—I have never known it; that question has never arisen.

7290. Have there never been performances in Sheffield where private theatrical entertainments have been given for charitable purposes?—Yes, but they have been held at properly licensed theatres.

7291. But if they had held them in a hall, and they had not first applied to the magistrates for a license, what would have been the result?—I should have laid an information against them. The license only costs 7*s.* 6*d.* to obtain, and they can get it by asking for it.

7292. Mr. Miller.] You have stated, that if any improper characters presented themselves at the doors of certain establishments, they would not be admitted?—Not at the Alexandra music hall.

7293. Did you confine that observation to the Alexandra?—Yes.

7294. Now, supposing a person goes to the Alexandra, and conducts herself with quietness and propriety of manner, and suppose you knew she was an improper character, would you in that case oblige her to leave?—She would not be allowed to enter, if the officer at the door knew she was a common prostitute.

7295. Do you find that you are obliged very frequently to exclude such persons?—No, because it is well known that they cannot get in, and therefore they do not present themselves; my officers rarely report that such characters ever present themselves at all for admission. I have myself frequently looked into the Alexandra, and I never knew such persons to be there.

7296. Do you know the London music halls?—Very little, except from having occasionally gone there when I have been in town.

7297. You must have seen improper characters there, I suppose?—I have in one case seen persons of improper character there, which induced me to leave.

7298. Now, in the case to which you refer, was the place in all other respects respectable?—I was there but for a very short time, but I was so rudely insulted, that I went out immediately.

7299. By whom were you insulted?—By a person who was there.

7300. By a woman?—Yes.

7301. Chairman.] But that never happened to you in Sheffield?—No.

7302. Mr. Locke.] They know you in Sheffield?—Yes.

7303. Mr. Miller.] Do you, in fact, arrive at this conclusion, that if the London halls were conducted with the same stringent regularity that the music hall at Sheffield is conducted with, they would be a great public advantage?—I know a singing room in London that I believe to be exceedingly well conducted; I have gone there frequently, and very much enjoyed myself.

7304. Do you think it practicable in London to put the London rooms on the same footing, and under the same regulations, that the Sheffield rooms are placed under?—There is one which I am now speaking of, Evans's, from which females are entirely excluded, and I do not know that any place could be better conducted than that place appears to be.

7305. There is no smoking at the Alexandra music hall in Sheffield, I suppose?—It is contrary to rule, but I have seen smoking there.

7306. What is the entrance fee?—The upper gallery is 3*d.*; the other prices are 6*d.*, 1*s.*, and 2*s.*

7307. Mr. Powell.] You made some observation to the effect that disreputable people go to disreputable places, and respectable people to respectable places; do you draw a hard line between respectable and disreputable people?—I have a line of my own, made from my own knowledge of the people.

7308. Do you not think there are some respectable people whose respectability is fragile; who, if they were to abstain from certain society would remain respectable, but if they entered into temptation would become disreputable?—I think that is quite likely.

7309. Can you tell me if there are any places of amusement in Sheffield where there is a platform (I avoid the term "stage," because it is a theatrical phrase), on which things are done for the amusement of the audience, while the people in the audience part of the house are smoking, eating, and drinking during the doing of those things?—Yes; we have very nearly a score of public houses at Sheffield where there are performances of that character.

7310. Of what character do you mean?—I mean singing.

7311. You mean in costume?—In costume.

7312. By how many persons at one time?—By not more than two persons; nigger songs, and Irish songs, and matters of that kind.

7313. Any

7313. Any dancing?—Yes, dancing; but not by more than two persons at one time.

7314. By dancing do you mean dancing in the nature of a ballet; mere dumb show; or dancing accompanying the song to give it more effect?—Yes, dancing accompanying the song; at the end of the verse they will dance a little before singing another verse.

7315. But you do not mean ballet?—No; ballets do not at all take place in public houses in Sheffield.

7316. How many persons would there be received within one rooom of this kind, on the average?—They are constantly coming in and going out; there are three rooms that would hold upwards of 100 people each.

7317. How many rooms of that class would there be?—There are four places of that kind.

7318. Could you give the Committee the names of those places?—There is one in Union-street, there is the "Old Tankard" in West Bar, there is another, "The Union Inn," I think it is called, but I am not quite sure; and there is another in Pinfold-street.

7319. Are those places connected with the public houses?—Yes.

7320. Physically and structurally connected?—Yes.

7321. Have those public houses spirit licenses?—Yes.

7322. Is the access to the room through the public house, or by a separate entrance?—In two of the cases the access to the room is separate, and in the other two you pass through the public house.

7323. Are you aware whether the police make any inquiries with regard to safety of access and egress at those four houses?—No; no special report has been made to the magistrates on that subject.

7324. Are you aware of any case where a statement has been made to the bench of magistrates that the building was unsafe, and where the license has been suspended or threatened to be suspended?—No.

7325. Is there any provision against fire, by means of an engine for the purpose, or a hose, or anything of that kind, at those places?—Not at those public houses.

7326. Do you observe that the individuals composing the audience are constantly going backwards and forwards between those rooms and the drinking part of the house, or do they remain in the rooms for a considerable period at a time?—I think that they do not pass backwards and forwards between the room and the public house.

7327. During how many hours does the performance continue?—Those public houses are, of course, forced to close at one o'clock, and in pretty nearly every instance they close even before that time; as a general rule the performance does not begin until about eight o'clock.

7328. And it closes when?—Never later than one o'clock.

7329. Is it the duty of the police to be on the look out for those places, to enter them, and see that things are properly done?—Yes, certainly.

7330. Supposing there was to be a room opened that might or might not be connected with a public house, and it was advertised that there were certain amusements going on, would it be the duty of the police to enter that room to see that there was nothing improper there?—Do you mean a room not connected with a public house?

7331. Yes, put it so, if you like?—What character of amusement?

7332. Singing, or anything to draw the people together for the purpose of amusement?—I do not know if the law would confer any right on the police to go in if the room was not connected with a public house, and if it was not a theatrical entertainment; I know of no power which would give the police a right to enter private rooms.

7333. Chairman.] But the honourable Member is speaking of public concert rooms where money is taken at the doors; would the police be able to enter concert rooms which had not spirit licenses?—The law confers no power on the police with regard to that subject; they would do it if any complaint were made that any impropriety was taking place.

7334. Mr. Powell.] But you issue no such instructions to the police with regard to such places?—We have no such places, therefore I have no occasion to instruct the police.

7335. Have you any literary institutions in Sheffield?—Yes.

7336. Has there been any desire on the part of the persons managing those institutions to perform theatrical pieces?—I have never heard that desire expressed.

7337. Chairman.] Do the police consider it their duty to look after the performances as well as the audience in those places connected with the public houses, where they have singing going on?—Yes, they look to see that no impropriety is taking place, and that the proprietor of the establishment is maintaining good rule and order.

7338. If there were songs sung of an improper and gross character, would the police prevent it?—Undoubtedly.

7339. Have they ever done so?—No, none have ever taken place except in the two instances where the magistrates suppressed the rooms.

7340. Mr. Locke.] That was where there was dancing on the part of the audience?—Yes.

7341. Chairman.] But you know of no case where the police have laid informations against those houses for impropriety in the performance itself?—No, nor do I know of any impropriety in the performance.

7342. During the whole of the 18 years that you have been at Sheffield and Oldham, you have never known the police to interfere with the performances in any of those places?—I can recollect the police laying one information, but not more, in the case of Oldham, a theatrical performance having been acted without a license.

7343. But the police have never interfered with the performances, to your knowledge, on the ground of the performances being improper?—No.

7344. Do you gather from that that there are no improprieties in the performances ever occurring at any time in Sheffield?—I think there are no gross improprieties. I have been in every one of those places in Sheffield, and I never saw anything of the kind.

7345. You have never seen anything objectionable in the character of the songs?—Nothing very objectionable in any of them. There are some of the places, of course, at which the

J. Jackson, Esq.

1 June 1866.

the character of the song is better and much better sung than at others.

7346. But none of such a character that the police would interfere with, or would they interfere in any case?—I am sure they would.

7347. Do you think that it would be an improvement on the present system to make the music halls take out licenses for music and dancing, as is the case in London, or is it better, in your opinion, to leave the matter as it is?—I think it would be better that the magistrates should have the power to introduce such rules as they have introduced at the theatres. I have already spoken of the Alexandra Music Hall as being a well-conducted place; but it might change its proprietor in six months, and it might be in the hands of a totally different person, and he might make the place objectionable.

7348. You would, on the whole, recommend a change in the law, and that licenses should be taken out for music and dancing?—Yes.

7349. That music and dancing should not be allowed without a license?—Yes, and that the license should be granted by the magistrates.

7350. In that case would you anticipate that some of the magistrates would grant a license for music and dancing, and that others would refuse it?—I know of magistrates who have a very strong objection to music and dancing taking place in public houses.

7351. And they might refuse the license simply on that ground?—Yes, they might.

7352. So that if the power of licensing for music and dancing were given to the magistrates, there would be great uncertainty with respect to whether people would be able to obtain the license or not?—Of course if those licenses were granted by the magistrates, they would have to be granted at special sessions, to which the whole of the magistrates would be summoned, and the licenses would represent the opinion of the majority, and I should not hesitate to take that opinion.

7354. Have the police sufficient powers under the present Acts of Parliament to deal both with the music halls, the performances, and every thing of that kind, or are you obliged to go beyond your powers?—I am very careful not to go beyond my powers; I think it is a very unwise thing for any officer to do.

7355. Still I understand you to say that in the concert rooms not licensed it might be a question whether you could interfere or not?—I should direct an officer to go in and see what the improprieties consisted of, and if there were gross immoralities I should find some law which would enable me to deal with that case.

7356. Colonel Sturt.] But if there were no law which would enable you to deal with a case of that kind, you would be liable to have an action brought against you if you interfered, would you not?—Yes, no doubt.

7357. Chairman.] But you have never been pulled up by the absence of sufficient powers with regard to theatrical matters?—Not with regard to theatres; but with regard to the other places, I should prefer, as I have already stated, to see them licensed by the magistrates.

7358. You would consider it your duty to lay information if anything like a theatrical performance were to go on in the concert rooms?—Yes, I should consider it my duty to lay information against them.

7359. Then your inspector would be the judge whether it was a theatrical performance or not?—He would report to me what took place, and I should then, to the best of my judgment, determine whether it was a theatrical performance or not.

7360. Have you ever been in a difficulty about such a case?—I have.

7361. Will you state to the Committee what was the nature of that case?—It was a case in which I laid an information; I was doubtful whether it was a theatrical performance or not, and I procured the assistance of a person well versed in theatrical matters to accompany my inspector, to give his opinion whether it was a theatrical performance or not; I laid the information; the magistrates were satisfied with the evidence which I produced, and there was a conviction.

7362. Mr. Clive.] What was the nature of the performance in that case?—I scarcely recollect it exactly; it occurred many years ago; it is 12 years ago, I should say.

7363. Mr. Locke.] Was it a stage play?—Yes, but I do not recollect what particular stage play it was.

7364. Chairman.] There was no doubt about its being an ordinary stage play?—None whatever.

7365. But what I meant was this; have you ever found yourself in a difficulty as to deciding whether it was a theatrical performance or not; take a case of half concert performance and half theatrical performance, for instance?—Difficulties of that kind have presented themselves to my own mind, no doubt.

7366. And the decision rests with you only?—If I take proceedings, of course it does.

7367. And you are the person who would raise the proceedings?—I should consider it my duty to do so, if I believed a man to be infringing that Act.

7368. The fact is, then, that whether certain performances can be given or not, depends on your decision?—Other persons can lay informations; any theatrical manager could lay an information.

7369. Have you had any difficulties in your own interpretation of the Act?—I have seen myself things taking place in public houses, where I had some difficulty in determining whether it was a theatrical performance or not.

7370. Have you known cases in Sheffield where managers have laid informations?—Yes, I recollect one information being laid against a sort of pantomime which was taking place in a circus, and the information was dismissed; the magistrates did not believe that it was a theatrical performance, and they dismissed it.

7371. Lord Eustace Cecil.] Before the license is granted by the magistrates, do they take any means to inform themselves whether a building is properly constructed with reference to risk from fire?—There is only one theatre in Sheffield, which is well known to every magistrate in the place.

7372. But would that be a condition that would be always looked into?—No doubt.

7373. In your experience in Oldham, did the same thing take place?—Yes.

7374. It is a necessary condition before the license is granted, that the building should be properly constructed?—Yes.

7375. Colonel Sturt.] The police at Sheffield have not any greater powers than the police in other towns, I suppose?—No.

7376. Chairman.] Have you any further observations to make to the Committee?—No.

Mr. Daniel Saunders, called in; and Examined.

7377. Mr. Loche.] I believe that you are the manager of Day's Music Hall, at Birmingham?—Yes.

7378. How long have you been manager of that house?—About three years and a half.

7379. How many persons is it capable of accommodating?—2,500.

7380. How are you licensed?—By the magistrates.

7381. What license have you?—A music and dancing license.

7382. Have you a local Act?—Yes, I produce the Act of 1851.

7383. Can you give the Committee the precise title of the Act and its date; is it an Act of the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 93?—Yes.

7384. It is a local Act?—Yes.

7385. "An Act for transferring to the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Birmingham, in the county of Warwick, the estates, properties, and effects now vested in certain commissioners having jurisdiction over parts of the borough, and to provide for the better draining, lighting, paving, supplying with water, and otherwise improving the said borough, and making provision for the good government, regulation, and management thereof." Under what section of this Act is it that you have your license; is your license a wine and spirit license?—No, but there is a wine and spirit license which was attached to the establishment; previously to its being a music hall, it was a public house.

7386. That license is granted annually by the magistrates?—Yes.

7387. It is attached to the place so long as the magistrates choose to give it?—Yes.

7388. And, in addition to that, you have another license?—Yes; for the large hall, which is for music and dancing.

7389. That is a music and dancing license which is granted to you?—Yes.

7390. Without that license you would be liable to penalties?—Yes; certainly.

7391. What description of music and dancing do you get your license for?—For music and ballet dancing; for dancing on the stage.

7392. Chairman.] You have got a stage there?—Yes.

7393. Mr. Locke.] Have you got a theatrical license?—No, we have not.

7394. But the magistrates at Birmingham grant theatrical licenses, do they not?—Yes.

7395. Do they grant the licenses to the theatres at Birmingham?—They do to one theatre.

7396. They likewise grant the music and dancing license; do they also grant the wine and spirit license?—They do.

7397. You have a stage and scenery there?—Yes.

7398. How many performers have you engaged there?—Probably 120.

7399. Will you inform the Committee what is the description of your performance?—The best thing I can do, I think, is to give you a programme of an evening's entertainment (handing in a specimen programme.)

7400. "Day's Crystal Palace Concert Hall, Smallbrook-street, Birmingham; Sole Proprietor, Mr. James Day. Thursday, May 10th 1866." You begin with a concert, I see?—Yes.

7401. "During which will be exhibited an Act Drop, 'The New Street Station'"?—Yes.

7402. Does that come in the middle of the concert?—Yes; in the middle of the concert, while the overture is being played.

7403. "Grand Garland Divertissement, supported by Miss Fanny Lauri and a New London Corps de Ballet; scenery by Messrs. E. Day and J. Watson;" what was that ballet?—That was a ballet of the usual kind, with appropriate scenery; the scenery in this case was a scene by moonlight.

7404. Did that ballet tell a story?—No; it told no story.

7405. "Grand Selection from Bellini's favourite opera 'Norma,'" and several other pieces?—Yes.

7406. Did those singers sing in character?—No; in evening dress.

7407. Now I see here, "Comic Entertainment, by Mr. J. G. Forde;" what is that?—He is what is called a patter-comic singer, after the style of Mr. Charles Mathews.

7408. Then there is a gymnastic entertainment by the Brothers Ridley, "Reading—Mr. Reuben Roe; Waltz (Gungl) Orchestra;" that is merely music given by the orchestra, I suppose?—Just so.

7409. Then you had a pantomimic ballet, called "The Adventures of Lord Dundreary, supported by the celebrated Lauri family; Comic Song, Serio-comic Song, and Ethiopian Entertainment." You had this pantomimic ballet, the "Adventures of Lord Dundreary;" did that come within the provisions of the 6 & 7 Victoria?—According to my interpretation of it, it does.

7410. Have you been at all proceeded against by the theatrical managers of Birmingham?—We have.

7411. When was that?—That was about 18 months ago.

7412. What was the performance that they objected to?—It was the representation of the Ghost Illusion.

7413. Was that representation of the Ghost Illusion in a piece?—Yes; it was introduced into a piece, which was the vehicle for it.

7414. How many actors were there in that piece?—There were two on the stage, and all the rest were underneath.

7415. You had the same kind of contrivance that they had at the Canterbury Hall?—Yes.

7416. With two performers on the stage, and all the others were merely reflections?—Yes; shadows.

7417. You were proceeded against; and the case was ultimately decided in the Court of Common Pleas?—Yes.

Mr. D. Saunders. 1 June 1866.

7418. And the decision was against you, was it not?—Yes; we were first summoned before the magistrates by Mr. Simpson and Mr. Swanborough; the case was decided against us, and Mr. Day was convicted.

7419. First of all, who were the magistrates?—Mr. Kinnersley, the stipendiary magistrate; I do not remember who were the others.

7420. A case was granted for the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas?—Yes.

7421. And the Court of Common Pleas confirmed the decision of the magistrates, that it was a performance of the stage?—Yes.

7422. In consequence of that did you discontinue performances of that description?—It was a peculiar case; in the first instance, we had a desire to produce the Ghost Illusion, and were in treaty with Mr. Pepper for permission to use his patent; we did not succeed, and previous to the second application Mr. Simpson had purchased the rights; when we went to Mr. Pepper again he said it was too late; that the sole right had been sold to Mr. Simpson. Mr. Day wished again to introduce that illusion; negociations were commenced, and it was at last agreed that Mr. Day should pay over to Mr. Simpson 100*l.* for permission to use it conjointly with himself at Birmingham; the money was paid over, and Mr. Day introduced the entertainment which was prosecuted.

7423. But after that did you discontinue that performance?—We discontinued having the performers on the stage.

7424. Was there any speaking in the performance?—There was in the first instance.

7425. You gave that up?—Yes.

7426. But then having only one person on the stage and no dialogue you continued it?—Yes.

7427. And no further proceedings were taken?—No further proceedings were taken.

7428. But with regard to the pantomimic ballet, the "Adventures of Lord Dundreary," that would come within the Act, would it not?—I think so.

7429. But no proceedings have been taken against you with regard to that?—None.

7430. In fact, proceedings were taken by the manager, on that occasion, in consequence of your interfering with his ghost?—Yes.

7431. Is this play-bill which you have handed in a fair specimen of the performances that you usually give?—Yes.

7432. You always have a piece of this description which you think would come within the Act?—Yes.

7433. What is the average admission fee at your hall?—I do not think it would amount to more than 6*d.*

7434. Will you be good enough to inform the Committee the exact prices?—Admission, 1*s.* front stalls; 6*d.* side stalls; 6*d.* for the floor, with 3*d.* returned in refreshments; 7*d.* or 8*d.* would be the average.

7435. Threepence is returned in refreshments on the floor?—Yes, 3*d.* is returned by check.

7436. Now, what class of people compose the bulk of the audience?—Our audiences are generally composed of a very superior class of people, manufacturers and their wives, tradesmen and their wives, artizans and their wives, and on special occasions, and sometimes without special occasion, the magistrates visit us; and ever since the hall has been opened the magistrates are very well satisfied with the way in which it is conducted, and as the result of that entertainment for the benefit of the Licensed Victuallers' Asylum, I can point out the opinion of one of the magistrates who is chairman of the society.

7437. Who was this gentleman?—Mr. Alderman Phillips.

7438. He is the president of the Licensed Victuallers' Asylum Society, is he not?—Yes.

7439. "The president then proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. James Day, for his kindness in giving a benefit in aid of the funds of the charity; it was not the first benefit Mr. Day had given, for he believed he had given a benefit every year since the opening of the concert hall; he had the pleasure of attending the benefit on the previous evening, and thought it due to Mr. Day to say that the performance gave the highest satisfaction, and that the visitors, including some of the most influential men of the town, were struck with the admirable management of the place." Is that the opinion of the magistrates of the entertainments given at Birmingham?—There are a few magistrates, I believe, who object to anything of the kind, but those who are more liberal say that the place is well conducted, and they are highly satisfied with it.

7440. Now, with regard to the entertainments that you find it necessary to give at the music halls, will you state to the Committee what description of performance you find it necessary to give, in order to make the place attractive?—It is necessary to give a variety; it is necessary to perform ballets; it is necessary to perform good music in the shape of operatic selections; and that pantomimic sketches should be given, it is necessary to make up a programme and to change it; it would be necessary, in fact, to have greater privileges than we have.

7441. What privileges would you desire to have in addition to what you have at present, though indeed I do not know that you have any?—We have none at present; I should like to play a scene from an opera entirely; I should like to play pantomimes, and to perform ballets and burlesques.

7442. Do you think it would be an advantage to you to have the privilege of playing a light vaudeville?—I do.

7443. Or such a piece as "Box and Cox," for instance?—Anything lasting more than three quarters of an hour in a concert hall would be against the interests of the establishment; they like continual change.

7444. If you had the same privilege as the theatres, do you think it would answer your purpose to give any kind of acting beyond a very light piece indeed of one act?—I do not think so.

7445. But you think that would be an advantage?—It would.

7446. You do know that ballet would be more attractive?—Of course, we have been performing ballets at our establishment ever since it has been opened, but we have been acting in fear until it was introduced into our license, and we had permission for stage dancing.

7447. That was introduced into your license by the magistrates, I suppose?—Yes, by the magistrates.

7448. Can you inform the Committee from memory exactly what is introduced into your license?—No; I am sorry to say that I have not got it with me.

7449. Can you furnish the Committee with a copy copy of it?—Yes, I will furnish a copy to-morrow. Speaking from recollection, it is music and dancing; ballet dancing, which is clearly understood to take place on a stage, to make a distinction between that and a casino.

7450. Is that mentioned in the license?—No, but it is understood, for this reason, that the magistrates, when Mr. Day applied first of all for a license, asked him whether he applied for dancing among the audience, or for dancing on the stage, and they said that if it had been a kind of casino it would have been refused, but as it was for stage performances, the license was granted.

7451. Was that license distinctly given to you for a performance on the stage?—It was.

7452. You understood it so?—Yes.

7453. And you acted upon that?—Yes.

7454. If you had asked for a license for the audience to dance in that place, it would have been refused you?—Yes.

7455. The license distinctly was for the purpose of performances being given on the stage?—It was.

7456. Now, is there anything else that you would wish to have, in addition to that; should you wish to be able to act a scene out of a comedy or tragedy?—I do not think that the performance of tragedy would be any advantage to music halls.

7457. Would comedy?—No, not one scene.

7458. Then would it be necessary to have a complete performance, however short?—Yes.

7459. Mr. Walpole.] Do you think that, in any Act of Parliament, you could draw a distinction between those things that should be allowed at the music halls, and those things that should come under the denomination of stage plays?—I think there might be an extension of the privilege; certain things might probably be defined.

7460. Suppose the existing Act of Parliament with regard to the licensing of stage plays, tragedies, and comedies, and things of that kind, was to remain in force, and that it should be the opinion of this Committee that they could recommend to the House of Commons, in the licensing of music halls, to allow them to play operas and ballets, and so on, do you think that that distinction could be drawn so as not to create great difficulty in the interpretation of the Act?—I think it is possible.

7461. Have you ever turned that over in your mind?—The difficulty seems to me to understand what is a stage play or not.

7462. Would you not increase that difficulty if you said that the music halls should be allowed, in certain cases, to have operas, or parts of operas, performed; how could you draw a workable distinction between an opera, or part of an opera, which should be allowed to be performed on the stage, and any other piece of music that might be mixed up with it?—If a general permission to perform operas or operettas complete were granted, all those distinctions might be well made, I think.

7463. Mr. Locke.] I understood you to say that it would not suit your purpose to play any heavy or long pieces?—No.

7464. Mr. Miller.] Could you suggest a clause that should make a clear distinction between plays that were performed at theatres, and those that you might perform at music halls?—I think it might be done in this way, by making the law so that concert halls might be enabled to play ballets and operettas.

7465. But how would you draw a clause so as correctly and clearly to define the difference?—It is a little more than I should be able to manage.

7466. Mr. Powell.] Probably you have not considered that point sufficiently to give an answer to the question, as to how you would legally define the point?—No, I have not.

7467. You give your opinion as to what you would wish, and the legal definition you leave?—Yes, just so.

7468. Mr. Clay.] You say that you would allow music halls to perform operettas; will you kindly inform the Committee what, in your opinion, the legal definition of the word "operetta" would be?—Operettas I understand to be generally played by a limited number of persons.

7469. Do you really think it would be possible for the law to make any such distinction as that?—I think it would be just the same as it is now; it would probably raise contention.

7470. What are commonly understood at the present moment as operettas; are the works of Offenbach; if those are operettas, will you tell me how the law is to distinguish between such a musical performance as that, and that of "L'Elisir d'Amore," which does not require more people, which is not longer in the playing, and the music of which is of quite as light a character?—That is more than I can answer. I do not think it would be possible to distinguish them.

7471. Yet if you had a license which enabled you to play Offenbach, and then if you were to play "L'Elisir d'Amore," should you not expect that the proprietors of the legal establishments would be down on you immediately for infringing their rights?—I should think they would.

7472. Lord Eustace Cecil.] Do you think it would be possible to settle the matter by limiting the number of performers, without making any definition of operetta, comedy, or ballet, or any other performance, because I see in your programme a selection from an opera, and there you have only two actors and one actor?—Three actors.

7473. Would that number of three actors be generally sufficient for all your purposes?—Probably four would be sufficient, with the chorus.

7474. I mean three actors on the stage at one time?—I do not think that would be of any use.

7475. Would four actors be sufficient?—No.

7476. Then what number would be sufficient?—I consider it would differ to some extent, according to the size of the place.

7477. In fact, you could not limit the number?—No; in our place we could not, because the place is so large.

7478. Mr. Clay.] You play selections at your music hall?—Yes.

7479. How many are there in your selections, generally speaking, including the chorus and all?—Probably 20 or 25.

7480. Is the selection, then, the most expensive part of your performance to you?—Yes, it is.

7481. Do you consider that on the whole they are about the most refined of the entertainments which you offer to the public?—I am always of opinion that good music is the foundation of the entertainment at every music hall.

7482. I presume you would not incur so large an expense if you did not find this selection, which is one of the most refined of the entertainments you give, was that which most drew the public to your hall?—I think I should advise them to continue the music in the way that it is given now, probably introducing operettas with it.

Mr. D. Saunders.

1 June 1866.

7483. I suppose your performers in the selections are not in costume?—No; they are in evening dress.

7484. Do you consider that it would be an advantage to you if the law allowed you, instead of giving those selections, to give scenes or acts out of operas?—That is exactly what I want.

7485. Is it the case that to do that would be less expense to you, not obliging you to have so many persons to fill your stage?—I do not think it would be less expensive, but it would be more attractive.

7486. If you had entire freedom, I suppose you would not be likely to play "Macbeth" or "Don Giovanni"?—No; we would not.

7487. But should you object to have the power of doing it if you choose?—We should very much like to have the privilege of doing part of them.

7488. But should you have any objection to be left entirely free to do anything you liked?—Certainly not.

7490. You have no fear that if you were left to do just as you like, that you would turn your hall into a legitimate theatre, and be ruined in consequence?—I have no fear of that kind.

7491. You do not agree with that portion of Mr. Stanley's evidence?—I do not.

7492. You think that if you were limited to three persons it would do you no good at all?—It would not.

7493. If the limit was four or five, or six persons would you not still find many instances in which you would be most inconveniently shackled with regard to the performances that you would like to give?—Certainly, and for this reason: that I could not introduce an opera without a chorus, and there are principals as well as chorus, and it would require 20 or 25 people to do the thing properly.

7494. Then, at all events, so far as those performances which you are likely to wish to give go, it would be a great advantage to you to be unfettered altogether with respect to the number of performers?—Yes; it would.

7495. Then I will ask you again the question which the right honourable gentleman filling the chair, in the absence of Mr. Göschen, asked you, does it not strike you as being altogether impossible to draw any distinction between what are called legitimate performances, and what for the want of a better name, we will call illegitimate performances, which would not lead to numberless disputes?—That would be, in my opinion, the danger of having a line drawn.

7496. Is it your belief that the most satisfactory state of the law for all parties would be to allow the proprietors of every theatre and every music hall free liberty to give that sort of entertainment which they thought best suited for their audiences?—I believe it would be better to do so.

7497. Lord Ernest Bruce.] Do I understand you to say that in this performance of "Norma" you only give give a portion of the opera, and that you have no costume?—None.

7498. And no scenic performances?—No.

7499. But that performance is given on a stage?—Yes.

7500. You have a chairman there?—Yes.

7501. It is more in the style of Evans's Music Hall, in Covent Garden, than anything else?—Yes.

7502. There is no attempt to act, is there?—We have produced a selection from "Il Trovatore," when the whole of the Miserere scene has been performed.

7503. And likewise you have a divertissement, with dancing on the stage before a scene?—Yes.

7504. A bridge, a wood, or a waterfall?—Anything that we may require.

7505. The magistrates grant you your license, do they not?—Yes.

7506. Is the license renewed every year?—Yes.

7507. Do the magistrates ever attend themselves, or does anybody representing them ever attend?—Yes, they frequently attend the hall.

7508. And likewise there are persons who report to the magistrates, I suppose, how the performance goes on?—Yes, we have police there always on duty.

7509. What are your prices?—Five shillings for the boxes, of which there are only two; I have already given the prices.

7510. What o'clock does the performance begin?—At seven o'clock.

7511 And it is over at 11 o'clock?—Yes, all the year round.

7512. Your license is renewed annually, you say?—Yes.

7513. It is, therefore, held during good behaviour?—Yes.

7514. Is there any fee for the license?—It is very small.

7515. A fee to the magistrate's clerk?—Yes.

7516. If you give a new song that you know has never been sung before, do you apply to the Lord Chamberlain for a license?—No.

7517. Or for any new piece?—No.

7518. But you are aware that, correctly speaking, you ought to have a license?—We have never applied for it.

7519. Has there been any displeasure expressed on the part of the magistrates, or any prosecution instituted against you?—No.

7520. How long have you been there?—Three-and-a-half years.

7521. You do not retain a complete dramatic company?—No.

7522. Are there many of those music halls in Birmingham open under this kind of license?—There are three places open for music and dancing, which I think is all.

7523. And one theatre royal?—Yes; and the Prince of Wales's Theatre too.

7524. Mr. Powell.] How many spectators have you room for in your music hall at one time?—It would be very full with 2,500 people.

7525. Is there smoking, eating, and drinking among the audience during the performance?—Yes.

7526. As in the London music halls?—Yes, just the same as in the London music halls.

7527. Do you leave the music hall open after the performances have closed?—No; it is closed with the performance.

7528. And it opens with the performance?—The hall opens with the performance.

7529. Do you take any steps to exclude improper characters?—Yes, we have an officer always at the entrance, and it is his duty, if he is of opinion that a person is an improper character to be admitted, to refuse him admittance.

7530. If there was reason to suppose that a woman of improper character was coming to your hall in pursuit of her unhappy vocation, it would be the officer's duty to exclude her, would it?—Yes, we do not admit them at all if we know it.

7531. If a woman came frequently alone, for example, or if there was any circumstance of that kind, such as to indicate her vocation, would you exclude her?—No, I do not think I should; so long as she conducted herself properly she would have as much right to be there as any one else, in my opinion.

7532. Do you give any free orders?—None; except to the people who exhibit our bills.

7533. Who may give them to their friends, probably?—Yes.

7535. But if you had a series of scenes from operas, each of them not lasting more than an hour, you might give a number of operatic performances in the same evening, might you not?—Yes, if we had permission to do so; but I do not think it would pay us to do so.

7536. Are you not aware that in many of the opera houses abroad the performance does not consist as in England of one complete opera, but of a number of morceaux, as they call them, from different operas.

7537. And you wish to do at the music halls here what is done at such opera houses abroad?—That is exactly what I meant to convey to the Committee.

7538. Can you explain to the Committee, simply and shortly, exactly what you do now at your own music hall?—The programme is generally of the same character as nearly as possible (producing a programme).

7539. In answer to a question from an honourable Member, you have stated that you have a license for a performance of the stage, probably you meant that your license would enable you to perform ballet?—Just so.

7540. Not that your license gave you authority to perform a stage play?—No.

7541. When you gave that Miserere scene from "Il Trovatore," which is a scene of a somewhat melancholy character, did you find that the audience paid attention to it?—Very much so indeed; they were very attentive and very appreciative.

7542. Did the consumption of spirits go on during the performance of that melancholy scene?—The consumption of spirits at those places is not so great as has been asserted here.

Mr. D. Saunders.

1 June 1866.

7543. Then why not abandon it altogether?—A person sitting for three or four hours might require refreshment. It may take 15 minutes to perform a scene like that, and the audience are all quiet, and the waiters are all quiet, at such a time as that.

7544. But if you were to have a scene of engrossing interest, lasting three quarters of an hour, how would that consist with smoking, eating, and drinking?—It would not be all of the same character if it lasted three quarters of an hour.

7545. But the interest, though varying, might be, as I said, engrossing?—I think there would be as much attention there as there would be at the opera house.

7547. Can you point out any section in this private local Act, except section 83, which refers to theatres and music halls, and other places of a kindred character?—I think it is all condensed in that section; but I will put in a copy of the license.

7548. How many music halls are there in Birmingham besides your own?—Two.

7549. By music halls you mean places where there is a platform for singing, or whatever it may be, and a consumption of liquors and smoking of cigars among the audience during the performance?—Yes.

7550. Are there many minor places of entertainment in public houses in your town?—There are none that I know of.

7551. Are there only three music halls in Birmingham altogether?—There are a few places that are licensed for harmonic meetings only.

7552. Are there any rooms in Birmingham holding 50 or 60 visitors at one time, where there is a platform on which singing, or anything else, takes place?—Not one.

7553. And none where there is any dancing going on?—Not one that I know of.

7554. Have you any public gardens, in the nature of the Cremorne gardens, in Birmingham?—No, the only place of that kind is the lower ground at Aston Park.

7555. Chairman.] Have you any further remarks to offer to the Committee?—No, I think not.

Friday, 8th June 1866.

Mr. Clay.	Mr. Taverner John Miller.
Mr. Clive.	Mr. Powell.
Mr. Du Cane.	Mr. Selwin.
Mr. Göschen.	Colonel Sturt.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE GEORGE JOACHIM GOSCHEN IN THE CHAIR.

The Right Honourable Viscount SYDNEY, G.C.B. (attending by permission of the House of Lords); Examined.

Right Hon. Viscount Sydney, G.C.B.

8 June 1866.

7556. Chairman.] WE are anxious to hear your Lordship's views on the present system of theatrical licenses. Several questions have arisen in the course of our investigation with regard to the desirability of maintaining the present system, or of extending it; and we should be much obliged if you would inform the Committee, in the first place, whether you would think it desirable, and if so, whether you think it could be arranged, that your office should license the music halls and superintend the performances there, in the same way as the theatres?—I have been strongly of opinion, for some time, that the theatres and music halls should be under one jurisdiction, either the jurisdiction of the Lord Chamberlain or the Home Office, or a separate branch. I believe that the Lord Chamberlain's department could perfectly deal with it if the Queen should so think fit. Of course it would be necessary that we should have an additional staff, and that might be met by the fees that would be paid on the licenses given to the music halls by the Lord Chamberlain. My idea would be, that there should be two branches, one for the theatres and one for the music halls, the same as there is in Paris.

7557. Mr. Powell.] You would propose that there should be two separate licenses?—Yes, two licenses; separate licenses for the theatres, and separate licenses for the music halls. I may perhaps advert to what is done in Paris, which I have inquired into: the theatres and the cafés chantants are under the Ministre de la Maison de l'Empéreur, which is pretty much the same thing as if they were under the Lord Chamberlain here. Since there has been the liberté des théâtres any person may build a theatre, and use it, upon its being surveyed and reported as a fit place for the performance, and he may act any play which has passed before the Censeur. Then they have a separate branch of the same department for the cafés chantants, and the dancing-places; there the supervision is stricter, and the pieces are looked after a good deal by the Préfet de Police. I should suggest, that whatever department had the management of the theatres and music halls, something of the same kind should be done here, only without the application of the police. I do not think it would suit our habits or manners to have policemen watching everything that is going on; but there is so much liberty in the French cafés chantants and the salles de danse, that it is necessary to have police officers to look after the people.

7558. Do you think it would be wise to extend the same supervision to the music halls, and to put them under a license?—Yes, I think that the present system of licensing is very unsatisfactory; I give that opinion from having had communications with the proprietors of music halls, and also as acting magistrate in Kent, giving licenses for that part of Kent which comes under the Act of George the Second.

7559. Which is beyond the metropolitan district?—Yes, beyond the metropolitan district; Greenwich, Woolwich, and all that part.

7560. Being within a radius of 20 miles, however?—Yes, under the 25th of George the Second. I have always thought, speaking as a magistrate of Kent (for a long time before I turned my mind to this subject), that our jurisdiction is very unsatisfactory; we know very little about those places, which are completely in the hands of the local magistrates, and if we reverse their decision either way, we give great dissatisfaction.

7561. The Lord Chamberlain's Office is not supported by any grant of public money, is it?—We have a grant of a fixed sum from the Civil List, which is settled at the commencement of the reign.

7562. The duties performed, with regard to the theatres, by the Lord Chamberlain and his staff, are paid for by the Queen?—Yes; his staff are paid for by the Queen, except that the Examiner of Plays gets a fee upon the examination of the plays, and there are some small fees upon licenses. Mr. Donne has stated that his fees are a guinea for a single act piece, and two guineas for any longer piece.

7563. Do you think that if the present system were extended to the music halls it would be possible to find the necessary funds without any increase of cost to the public purse, by charging a fee for the licenses?—Yes.

7564. Are fees charged for licenses now, by the Lord Chamberlain, in licensing theatres?—Yes.

7565. And security is taken, is it not?—Yes, to secure the penalties which may be incurred under the Act.

7566. Do you think that that security is more than a sort of form, or that there is any substantial advantage in taking security at present?—I do not know that we have ever had to call upon the securities since I have been in the Lord Chamberlain's Office; but I think that it acts salutarily salutarily on the managers of theatres to make them responsible to us.

7567. The music halls, in the licenses which they get, give no kind of security, do they?—No, not at present.

7568. If the system were extended, do you think that it might be a little difficult with the proprietors of the small music halls to find securities?—I have not turned my attention to that; but I should think there could be no objection to requiring security. Some years ago, when the first collision took place between the theatres and music halls, I had a deputation of managers of theatres on the subject; and after that some of the managers of music halls came to me also, although I had no jurisdiction, and said that they were anxious to express their opinion; and many of them stated to me (Mr. Stanley and others), that they were desirous of being placed under the jurisdiction of the Lord Chamberlain, and under the same regulations that the Lord Chamberlain's Office applied to the theatres. I thought so much of the matter at the time that I mentioned the subject to the late Sir George Lewis, at the Home Office, with a view of altering the law; and I also mentioned it to the late Prince Consort, for the purpose of getting the sanction of the Queen; but Sir George Lewis left the Home Office, and the subject dropped.

7569. Have you formed any opinion whether the Lord Chamberlain's or the Home Office would be the better department for the administration of these matters?—I believe that the Home Office is very much overburthened with business. It was Sir George Lewis's opinion that it would not be desirable to put any more business on them. We could manage it ourselves if we had a proper staff.

7570. A good deal has been said with regard to the desirability of having a permanent officer with an appeal to the Home Office, so that there should be no difficulty with regard to the views taken by the different Lord Chamberlains, or the different Secretaries of State?—That difficulty would apply to every office under the Government. But the Comptroller is a permanent man, and the Inspector of Theatres is a permanent man.

7571. What are the duties of the Comptroller?—He has the general management of the office; he is in the position of a permanent under secretary. Of late years it has been wished that the Comptroller should be a man of a higher class in society than he formerly was, and that he should have the status of a permanent under secretary; he manages the whole of the details of the office, but he cannot do anything out of the common routine without the sanction of the Lord Chamberlain.

7572. He being a permanent officer, there would be likely to be less divergence in the decisions of the office than there would be if the magistrates granted the licenses?—Yes, because they are a fluctuating body.

7573. And a numerous body?—And a numerous body.

7574. Can you inform the Committee the principles which the Lord Chamberlain has generally followed in the granting of licenses for theatres; whether your Lordship has turned your attention chiefly to the demand for theatres, or to the locality for which it was desired to have it, or to the respectability of the parties applying, or what other considerations have guided you?—I have been always disposed to license as many theatres as were compatible with the requirements that we lay down. Of course the locality is to be considered, and we generally consult the chief of the metropolitan police about it with regard to any possible inconvenience in the locality. The next thing is, if a new theatre is built, that proper entrances and proper exits should be made, and that the safety of the public should be considered in every possible way. I never made any objection to grant licenses when it was reported to me that the locality was a good one, and if the plans and specifications that were sent to us coincided with our views. There are two or three new theatres in contemplation now in London; there is one in Holborn, and one in Limehouse, and I have been always ready to license any other. There was one proposed somewhere near the Haymarket, which fell through because it was promoted by a theatrical company that afterwards failed.

Right Hon. Viscount Sydney, G.C.B.

8 June 1866.

7575. Your Lordship has not considered the question of competition in granting or withholding licenses?—No, I think not. I presume that if a manager proposed to build a theatre, he would know his own interest.

7576. It would be an erroneous impression, if such an impression existed, to suppose that the interests of the present proprietors of theatres were considered at all?—Certainly, so far as I am concerned.

7577. Can a manager, who is going to build a theatre, know before he builds it that he can obtain a license. It has been put before the Committee in this way; that it was first necessary to build the theatre, and that after a man had spent his money, it might be difficult to get a license?—The reverse is the case; they come to us to know whether we will grant a theatre in such a locality; then they bring the plans, and we make suggestions or alterations in the plans.

7578. Therefore there is no risk with regard to receiving the license at any later period; I think Mr. Dion Boucicault put the case that he had written to inquire whether it would be likely that he would get a license?—I think that Mr. Boucicault's case was the one which I alluded to near the Haymarket, but it fell through from the Company being bankrupt, and we heard no more about it, though we were quite ready to entertain the question. Highbury Barn was originally a music hall, and it is now turned into a theatre. Mr. Giovanelli, the manager, came to us, and I went personally to look at the place, and sanctioned a license for it. It was just the same when the Surrey Theatre was burnt down; before the new building was erected, the plans were examined in the office, and I sent a surveyor to look after the theatre; of course that was not the case of a new site; but in building a fresh theatre, we make certain conditions that the public shall have proper accommodation and safety secured.

7579. I suppose that you are more strict in providing for this kind of regulations in the new theatres than in the old ones?—Yes, of course. After the passing of Sir James Graham's Act of the 7th & 8th of the Queen, we took over a great many places as theatres which we would not license now if they started fresh. We have altered a great many of them upon surveys made by our surveyors; and I must say that the managers are always willing to fall in with our views, views, and that the interiors are very much improved.

Right Hon. Viscount Sydney, G.C.B.

8 June 1866.

7580. With regard to the safety of the public, you mean?—Yes, the construction of the building.

7581. Do you grant the same form of license to an entertainment, like Mr. German Reed's, as to a theatre?—Yes.

7582. Do you think it would be possible to have two forms of license, one for theatres and one for music-halls?—Yes, I think so.

7583. Have you formed any opinion with regard to whether it would be desirable to give the music-halls the privilege of acting theatrical pieces?—That is a question of policy. Nothing of the kind is allowed in Paris; they will not allow dialogue or dress of any kind; they are very strict on that point.

7584. I was asking the question rather from this point of view, that if the music-halls were to have the right of performing certain pieces, whether it would be possible to define those pieces in the form of the license, or whether the experience of your officer is not, that it is very difficult to say what is a stage play, and what is not?—That has been left in a rather uncertain state by the last decision of the Court of Common Pleas.

7585. Have you any power to deal with those cases, if you choose, when music-halls perform theatrical pieces without licenses?—We do not act as informers; I have always declined to interfere; I believe that the managers of theatres expected that we should interfere, but I entirely declined; we leave it to the law; it is not the business of my department.

7586. Is it, to your Lordship's knowledge, the business of any department at all?—I am not aware that it is.

7587. Do you think it would be desirable that it should be the business of any department?—No, I do not think it should be; I think there ought to be a more rapid process of dealing with such questions than the present process of applying to the magistrates, and then going to the Courts at Westminster; but I do not think it would be desirable to have any system of espionnage.

7588. It is not now treated as a question of offence against the law, but as a question of rights between one party and another; but is it not practically an offence against the law to have theatrical performances without a license?—Yes, I apprehend that it is offending against the law, presuming the law is held to be as it is assumed to be by Mr. Strange and the gentlemen connected with the music-halls.

7589. We have had evidence from the country, for instance, that the police think it their duty to bring cases before the magistrates where the music-halls perform theatrical pieces without a license. There is nothing analogous to that in London, is there?—Not that I am aware of.

7590. But applications have been made to your Lordship to interfere?—Yes; or rather they have called our attention to the subject.

7591. But you have never called on any one to take out a license who was going to perform theatrical pieces without one?—No, it is the reverse; the applications are made to us.

7592. But if those applications were not made to you, so long as no one took any notice of it, and if proprietors of theatres did not move in the matter, no one would move at all?—So far as I am aware no one would move.

7593. But if it is desirable that the music-halls should take out licenses, then it might be necessary to be a little more stringent in enforcing the law?—Perhaps it might be so, but at present we have nothing to do with the music-halls at all, because if they act what is deemed a stage play it is the business of the persons injured to take action.

7594. If a place like the Alhambra were to take to acting stage plays without a license, would you interfere in any way with regard to the lighting and accesses of the theatre?—No; we should not interfere at all. I believe that at the Alhambra they do act what are deemed stage plays. I have not been there, but I am told so.

7595. Mr. Locke.] Do you mean ballets?—Just so; ballets. At the Canterbury-hall again they have ballets. And there were performances introducing Pepper's Ghost, which was coming very near the law. I have seen that personally, but we should never interfere.

7596. That performance was decided against?—Yes, I remember.

7597. Chairman.] Would your Lordship state to the Committee how far you interfere in the conduct of a licensed theatre; over what points you have jurisdiction; you interfere more or less with the regulations with regard to the lighting of theatres, for instance?—Yes; in the annual survey, the surveyor examines the theatres, and points out any circumstances which appear dangerous, and orders the necessary precautions to be taken; that is to say, a report is made to me every September or August; the managers of the theatres are called on to carry out the suggestions of the surveyor; I cannot compel them to do it; but I can say if you do not do that, we will not give you a license, and frequently a license has been suspended for a month until the alterations are made.

7598. Such cases have arisen?—Yes, they arise every year, more or less; they are much less frequent than they used to be formerly, because the managers are ready to fall into our views.

7599. The license is given for a year?—Yes, from Michaelmas to Michaelmas.

7600. Can you stop the license in the middle of the year?—Yes, we can stop it if there is anything against the tenor of it.

7601. Has there been any such case?—No, not in my time, I think.

7602. During the course of the performances, if it were brought to your notice that the footlights were endangering the life of the actors, would your Lordship take any notice of that?—Yes; after the accident to a poor girl two years ago, I sent round a circular to all the theatres, making suggestions about wires being placed round the lights, and wet blankets and other precautions at the wings, to prevent accidents, and almost in all the cases managers fell in with my views. With regard to one of the last accidents at one of the City theatres, the manager sent us word that the safety of the person was entirely owing to our precautions.

7603. You initiated those precautions?—We initiated them.

7604. Has your Lordship's department, in your opinion, sufficient powers at present for all necessary purposes?—We have all the power necessary, I think. That circular was sent in the middle of the year after the licenses were given, and managers fell into it directly; I had an interview with them, and I was willing to hear any suggestions that they might make, it is a kind of negative authority that we possess, and if they had not fell into my suggestions I should not have renewed the license.

7605. Could they have resisted at the time?—No doubt, unless there was some very strong circumstance that would justify our stopping the license.

7606. If there were improprieties in the dresses of the actors or actresses, would that be a case where the department would interfere?—Yes, we should make communications to the managers; I made a private communication with regard to the ballet at Covent Garden in the pantomime, not long ago.

7607. Were the alterations made?—Yes, Mr. Harris fell into it directly. I must say, that the managers of theatres are always willing to do anything suggested to them, or anything that the public would wish carried out.

7608. You have never been in collision with managers on any point of internal regulation?—Never; in fact, last year Mr. Mapleson came to me to ask that we should interfere more behind the scenes; I declined to do so, because I think that the responsibility behind the scenes should rest with the managers.

7609. With regard to what kind of matter did Mr. Mapleson suggest that you should interfere?—As to the gentlemen that go behind the scenes to see the ladies, and I declined to interfere.

7610. Colonel Sturt.] Did Mr. Mapleson mean to say that they went behind the scenes without his permission?—I presume so. But at that time he wanted to throw on me the responsibility of the matter; that was in reference to some of the singers' dresses being burnt; Madame Ilma de Murska being one, I think; he said that so many people came behind the scenes that he could not keep the place clear, and those accidents might happen. I replied, that the responsibility rested entirely with him.

7611. Do you think, however, with regard to what takes before the curtain, that if managers were left to do as they liked, they might safely be trusted to the guidance of their own interests?—No, I think that some supervision is necessary in all public places; it is so in every country in Europe.

7612. Then you would think, perhaps, that there is scarcely enough supervision in many of the music-halls, and that they would require the same regulations as the theatres?—To some extent no doubt they would; but it is a different class of persons who go there. I do not know that you need such strict regulations.

7613. With regard to the censorship of plays; do you think it desirable to keep that up, and that all plays should be read before they are performed?—I think so.

7614. You do not believe that public sentiment would be sufficient to correct any improprieties, either in religious matters, or in other matters?—No; I think there must be some authority to prevent certain things being acted, because tastes differ. I do not think that public opinion would have sufficient power.

7615. There have not been many collisions between dramatic authors and your department, I believe, of late years?—None since I have been in office.

7616. The number of rejected plays has not been very large, has it?—No, not very large.

7617. Do you happen to be aware whether it is the case on the Continent generally, that all plays are submitted to a censorship?—I believe so; in Paris every play is submitted to the censeur, but since there has been the liberté des théâtres, a play having once passed the censorship any person may act it at any theatre; and if a theatre is built or established, the manager need not say for what class of drama it is established, but on the surveyor reporting that it is a fit and proper place, he may act anything he likes.

7618. Do you think that the censorship operates as a hardship on authors?—No, not at all. The authors know pretty well what will be allowed; the only pieces that we have any difficulty with are pieces translated from the French.

7619. Have you had any difficulty with pieces containing political allusions?—In one pantomime, some years ago, there was some allusion to the Emperor of the French, and I told the author that it must be omitted; that is the only case I remember.

7620. You have unlimited powers as to the censorship, have you not?—Yes.

7621. Are you called upon to give any reason at all for any changes that are made in the plays submitted to you?—No.

7622. Suppose there were a Lord Chamberlain who enforced his own peculiar views on any particular subject, would there be any appeal, except to public opinion?—No; there would be no appeal, except to public opinion; the same appeal which there would be with regard to any other man at the head of any other department.

7623. In the first instance, the plays are read by Mr. Donne, are they not?—Yes.

7624. And if he should have doubts about a play, he would refer it to you?—He would send on the play to me. "Ruy Blas" was originally played at the St. James's Theatre, in French; it was acted for one night, and it was stopped the following night (that was not in my time).

7625. Mr. Powell.] Was not that previous to the Queen's marriage?—I daresay it was. "Ruy Blas" has been afterwards acted in my time, in English; and the thing is now put in a different form. That was a case in point where the examiner had doubts, and he sent me the play to read.

7626. Do you think that authors generally know pretty well what will pass, and what will not pass?—Yes.

7627. It has been put to us whether it was not a grievance that an author might write a piece, and that the theatre might prepare to play the piece at some considerable expense, and then it might be rejected at the last moment?—I do not think that is likely. Most of the plays are written by the same people, and they know pretty well what will pass.

7628. Do you remember any particular case of a piece having been got up and prepared, and then having been stopped?—Not in my time; certainly not; I never heard of it. "Ruy Blas" was a case in point, and that was stopped.

7629. Then had the piece passed in the first instance?—I presume it had; it was in French; it was Victor Hugo's piece, as you are aware. It was acted afterwards here by Mr. Fechter; that was a translation.

7630. Do the powers of the Lord Chamberlain extend to the stopping of a piece that has been acted for some time?—Certainly. "Jack Sheppard" was stopped in former days.

7631. If a Lord Chamberlain came into office who

Right Hon. Viscount Sydney, G.C.B.

8 June 1866.

who differed from his predecessor on any point, he might stop a piece that had been passed before?—Yes, certainly, but that kind of risk would apply to any person who was at the head of any department. Suppose a department was formed with a permanent head, he would not live for ever.

7632. I am merely inquiring whether it would be considered right that a play which had once been passed, should be allowed to be withdrawn by another Lord Chamberlain?—I do not think that any Lord Chamberlain would make any such change unless there was some strong cause for it. There might be a change of public opinion, and I believe that that was rather the case with "Jack Sheppard."

7633. I should like to hear your Lordship's view, whether you think it might be convenient that a piece once stamped should be allowed to continue; or whether you would not think it a hardship that a piece which had been brought out should be stopped afterwards?—It is certainly undesirable, unless there were a very strong case; take the case of "La Traviata;" I never thought it necessary to stop that play, but it was not licensed by me.

7634. Would you think it possible that an appeal should be given from the department to a court of justice, with regard to those points?—Would not that be introducing rather a new principle?

7635. I think it would; but do you think it might be decided by the judges, whether a piece had offended against any of the canons that might be laid down?—I do not see how a judge could decide anything unless it were argued before him; that would make a legal process of it.

7636. There are two departments in your office, the department of the comptroller and the department of the censor?—Yes. The examiner of plays is an officer of the department, and the comptroller is the general manager of the office.

7637. Could you state at all what staff might be required for all matters connected with theatres?—I do not think that I could say that off-hand; the examiner does all that part of the business connected with his branch; he prepares the licenses for the plays, and, of course, when the annual licensing of theatres takes place, that part of it is done by the clerks in the office.

7638. They are the same clerks who deal with matters connected with the theatres, and with other matters, so that it would be difficult to form an opinion with regard to the nature of the staff that would be required?—Each clerk has his own particular branch to attend to, as in other offices.

7639. Would your Lordship state generally what changes in the law you would think advisable, or do you think that the law works satisfactorily as it is?—I think that the law ought not to remain as it is with regard to the doubts with reference to what are stage plays, and what are not; it should be more clearly laid down; as it is at present, there is a very unsatisfactory state of things.

7640. Your Lordship is of opinion, I think, that the magistrates licensing could be improved?—I am very strong on that point. I think that the present jurisdiction is a most unsatisfactory one with regard to the licensing of music-halls.

7641. Will you state distinctly to the Committee the grounds of that opinion?—The magistrates are a fluctuating body, and in a good many cases dependent on others; very often I think the licenses are given without any knowledge of the facts of the locality, and of the people who are seeking the license.

7642. With regard to what I would call setting the law in motion, you do not think it would be necessary to have greater powers than you now have?—No; but there might be greater facility of decision; instead of going to a court of law, a case might be decided by the magistrates.

7643. You do not think it would be wise to allow any establishment to evade the law by withdrawing itself from the jurisdiction and not taking out a license, that is supposing all the theatres and music-halls were bound to take one out. The department that granted the license should see that everybody had got a license, I suppose?—Yes, undoubtedly, I think so; just on the same principle, that if a man opened a beershop or a spirit house the police might interfere if there were no license.

7644. At present there is no such power at all; it is nobody's business to see that a place takes out a license, except those who may think themselves aggrieved?—We should interfere if a regular theatre set up without a license, but we should not interfere with a music-hall where it was a doubtful question.

7645. Mr. Locke.] But you do not license the music-halls yourself?—No, the responsibility rests entirely on the manager of the music-hall whether he goes beyond the law or not. I have always told the managers that I am not a public prosecutor.

7646. Chairman.] But if it were a distinctly marked case, do you think that you would interfere, and say, "You must take out a license?"—Yes, certainly.

7647. The general character of the building would decide you with regard to interfering?—Yes, if it was a distinct theatre, taking money at the doors.

7648. Have you ever had any questions arise with literary institutes when there are occasional performances?—Yes, some of them have applied for licenses, and we have always declined, but we have given this year, to the Hanover-square Rooms, a license to enable them to open their house before five o'clock in the afternoon.

7649. For music and dancing?—Yes.

7650. Mr. Locke.] Is that music and dancing, or for stage plays?—Music and dancing. That comes under our original powers. Formerly every place within certain limits was licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, and after the passing of the Stage Play Act no such licenses were given; it was supposed that it was not necessary, but a blot was hit this year before the Middlesex magistrates. County magistrates have only powers to license a building to open at five o'clock in the afternoon, and therefore we, under the advice of the law officers of the Crown, gave a license to certain places, and amongst others the Egyptian Hall and the Hanover-square Rooms, to open the rooms before five o'clock for the same performances for which they are licensed by the justices after that hour.

7651. I believe that the decision of the law officers is this, that the 6th and 7th Victoria did not deprive you of the privilege which you had previously to the passing of that Act?—That was the first opinion; they gave a stronger one afterwards. I did not consider the first opinion sufficient.

7652. Chairman.]

7652. Chairman.] Would you state to the Committee why you have declined licenses to literary institutes for occasional performances?—We have always held that our duty related entirely to theatres, and had nothing to do with literary institutions.

7653. You think that it would be rather an infraction of the spirit of the law?—Just so. The Lord Chamberlain of the day, after Sir James Graham's Act was passed, conceived, whether rightly or wrongly, that he was to confine his attention entirely to the theatres, and that every other place of public entertainment was under the jurisdiction of the magistrates. That was the view on which my predecessor acted. I found it so, and I left it so until the matter was raised before the Middlesex magistrates last autumn.

7654. It would come to this, that a literary institute could not get a license from the Lord Chamberlain's department, and it could not get one from the magistrates because the magistrates could not give any license for a theatrical performance; therefore they would not be able to get a license at all?—A literary institute would not be a place built for theatrical performances.

7655. No; but some of them have suggested that they would like to give performances once a month, or so?—I do not know that we have had any application of that nature for literary institutes to have theatrical performances. I thought you meant with regard to the opening of the rooms. I am not aware that we have had any applications of that kind.

7656. But have there not been applications to your department from places that were not theatres, for occasional performances, without which they would bring themselves within the power of informers?—Yes, there have been applications of that kind, and we have always refused them, because we could not be answerable for the safety of the place, or anything of that kind.

7657. Does not your Lordship think that rather a rigid state of the law?—It would otherwise come to this; that we should be licensing a place which was perhaps unsafe, and we should be acting contrary to our regulations with regard to theatres. Take St. Martin's Hall; that would not be safe at present, because there is a coach-maker's shop underneath, with a great quantity of inflammable matter. If they would make the necessary alterations, there would be no objection on my part, but I would not do it now, because it is not safe. I do not think it would be right that we should exact those regulations from the theatres, and give licenses without them to institutes for temporary purposes, when they could not take the usual precautions.

7658. Do you never grant occasional licenses for special performances?—I think that we have always declined; where we do give them under particular regulations, is at Windsor, because the theatre is never open while the boys are at Eton, but there during the holidays we give a license for occasional performances.

7659. If I understand your Lordship correctly, if any institution were to give a private theatrical entertainment for a charitable purpose, and they were to take money at the doors for tickets, they would be offending against the law?—Yes, just so. We had applications of that kind once or twice from Brighton, so long as Brighton was a royal residence, but now we have no longer any jurisdiction at Brighton.

7660. Then the state of the law at present is this, that it is impossible to get a license for theatrical performances, except in a regular licensed theatre?—Yes; but that would, of course, depend on the Lord Chamberlain of the day. As a matter of practice, it has never been done, either by myself or by my predecessors.

Right Hon. Viscount Sydney, G.C.B.

8 June 1866.

7661. That is a matter of discretion?—Yes; but in my opinion it is not desirable, and we have always given that opinion.

7662. Do you think it would be unfair to be less stringent in cases of special performances?—I think that the same rule should apply to everybody.

7663. Would it not be fair to consider that the danger would be much greater if there was a large performance going on every night, than on any special occasion?—On a special occasion there would not be the same precaution taken. St. Martin's Hall is quite a case in point.

7664. In fact, in many cases you would think that occasional theatrical performances are more dangerous than regular theatrical performances, because the same precautions are not taken?—Yes.

7665. The guiding principle of your department in that matter, at present, is the safety of the public?—Yes.

7666. It is not a question of competition?—No, not at all.

7667. But it is a question of fire and the public safety?—Yes. I should never for a moment consider the question of competition; I think there should be perfectly free trade.

7668. You think that there should be perfectly free trade in theatres, subject to proper regulations?—Yes.

7669. Would you say that there is perfectly free trade in theatres at present?—Not, perhaps, as great liberty as there is in Paris; but any person who built a proper theatre would be licensed by me. The real difficulty is in getting proper sites in London, on account of the enormous expense and the value of land.

7670. In what respect is there less free trade in London than there is in France?—In France there is less space for building theatres than there is in London.

7671. But, so far as the law and practice are concerned, if the site is paid for, and people build proper theatres, they can have perfect freedom?—Yes, just so. The fact is, that there would have been more theatres if it were not for the difficulties attending the question of site.

7672. You think that there would be far more theatres if it were not for the great expense of buying the land?—I should think so; some of those distant theatres fill immensely.

7673. Mr. Locke.] Your Lordship has stated that you think the Lord Chamberlain's office could license all the theatres and all the music-halls, in fact, every description of place for public amusements, if you had a greater staff?—Yes. I must qualify that by saying, that it is necessary for me to have the Queen's consent, because it is an office specially under Her control, and paid for out of the Civil List.

7674. But you think, supposing the Queen's consent were obtained, and that arrangement were made, the Lord Chamberlain could perform the duty of licensing all the theatres and music halls, and, in fact, all places of public amusement?—That is my opinion.

7675. Does your Lordship confine that observation to the present area over which the Lord Chamberlain has jurisdiction, or to the whole of the country?—I should confine it to the present jurisdiction, and the metropolitan parishes perhaps. I have no means of knowing what might be the demand in the country at all.

Right Hon. Viscount Sydney, G.C.B.

8 June 1866.

7676. Your Lordship thinks that the Lord Chamberlain would be able to ascertain what the demand would be in the area over which he now has jurisdiction, and likewise how he ought to meet that demand?—Yes, if we had a proper staff.

7677. But your Lordship does not think that the licensing of the buildings might be extended beyond the present jurisdiction?—I have not considered that point, therefore I should not be able to give an opinion, because I do not know what the demand for country theatres is; but I believe, as a matter of fact, that there are much fewer theatres than there used to be.

7678. But I presume that the Lord Chamberlain could very easily obtain information to guide him, with regard to a theatre being built in any particular place in whatever part of England it might be?—I have not considered that subject; but I do not see why that should not be done, provided we had a sufficient staff.

7679. But your Lordship has not considered what that staff ought to be?—No, that would be a matter of departmental arrangement. I do not see how we could give an opinion about that until we see how the matter worked.

7680. Now, with regard to the licensing of plays; can an unlicensed play be acted in any part of the country now, without coming under the jurisdiction of the Lord Chamberlain?—No; every play that is acted in the country has been licensed by us.

7681. Therefore you have jurisdiction with regard to the licensing of plays throughout the whole of the country?—Just so.

7682. But not the licensing of the theatres?—But not the licensing of the theatres. But, as a matter of fact, I may state that most of the plays acted in the country are those that have been acted here.

7683. There is very seldom any new piece brought out in the country?—Very seldom.

7684. But suppose a piece were brought out in any theatre in the country without the Lord Chamberlain's license, the Lord Chamberlain would interfere, I suppose?—Yes.

7685. Therefore, with regard to the licensing of theatres, and the licensing of plays, I presume there would be no difficulty; probably the number of new theatres built in the course of a year would not be half-a-dozen throughout the whole country?—I have no means of knowing; I believe that the theatres in the country have diminished. Formerly, the young actors began at Bath, or elsewhere in the country, and learnt their profession there, and then came to London; but now they come to London first. People will tell you, that one reason why acting is not so good as it formerly was, is that actors have not to go through that probation; but that is a matter of opinion.

7686. But the question with regard to the conduct of a theatre would be another thing; there might be some difficulty in that, inasmuch as the Lord Chamberlain would be at a distance, and would not have so much opportunity of seeing how the theatres were conducted, as the magistrates in the locality would: for all that, there would be a further staff required?—Yes; but I do not think it would be desirable that we should have that jurisdiction, and for that very reason we should have no local staff; but I have not considered that very much.

7687. When you license a theatre, do you lay down any specific rules with regard to the mode in which the theatre is to be conducted; first, you have to approve of the plans, have you not?—Yes, the plans are sent to us.

7688. But with regard to the mode in which a theatre is to be conducted, you do not allow any eating and drinking in the auditorium?—No.

7689. Is that a rule laid down?—Yes.

7690. And if that rule is broken, the license is taken away?—We have never had occasion to interfere, that I know of.

7691. But would the license be taken away if the rule were broken?—I do not know whether we should practically do that, but their attention would be called to it; I am not aware that it has been ever attempted.

7692. Chairman.] You would remonstrate with the manager?—Yes.

7693. Mr. Locke.] With what view is that regulation made?—That part of the public who want to go to the theatre, have the means of going to the buffet to obtain necessary refreshments. I do not think that it would be consonant with the feelings of the public who attend the theatres to have eating and drinking in the pit, or in the boxes.

7694. A theatre is so constructed that that could not very well take place without great inconvenience?—Yes.

7695. But taking a place built after the manner of the music halls, where people go partly for the purpose of seeing the performance, and partly for the purpose of taking refreshments; supposing you had the power of licensing places of that description, and there were a demand for them, do you see any objection to granting licenses for theatrical performances there?—I think that would be altering the tone of the theatres.

7696. But there would be the theatre pure and simple, and there would be likewise this place where people took their refreshments, and in addition to that witnessed a performance?—There is a buffet at some of the theatres now; since the Lords of the Treasury withdrew their interdict upon the Commissioners of Excise issuing spirit licenses, that has been done. I always thought it was a very questionable thing, the Lords of the Treasury having prevented that license.

7697. The theatres have precisely the same wine and spirit license as the public-houses, have they not?—Yes.

7698. And they have a right to demand it as a matter of course when your Lordship grants them a theatrical license?—Yes.

7699. What restriction is laid down by your Lordship with regard to the place where refreshment is to be taken in the house?—That it should not be taken in the auditorium; so far as I know, I never heard the question raised by any manager. The present system works well.

7700. But your Lordship must be aware that there are a great many more music halls than theatres in London, and I believe in the provinces too?—I do not know about the provinces, but there are in London.

7701. But according to the evidence that we have had, there are five or six music halls to one theatre (in fact, a great many more very well built and decorated music halls) in many provincial towns; there seems therefore to be a demand demand for places of entertainment of that description; I wish to know, supposing your Lordship had the licensing of both theatres and music halls, if your Lordship sees any objection to granting those music halls a license for the performance of plays?—That comes to a question with regard to the state of the law.

7702. But suppose the law were to be altered, could there be any objection, if music halls were well conducted (seeing that the people wish it), to getting rid of the objection which is now taken to a performance of a theatrical piece taking place at a music hall. Should you object in that case to giving a music hall a theatrical license?—I do not know myself that I should object to do it, under proper regulations; we must clearly define what they should be permitted to enact, I think.

7703. Of course we can hardly suppose that music hall proprietors would wish to enact a long tragedy or comedy; but any light performance such as a burletta, or ballet, or vaudeville, might be compatible with the conditions of the place, the audience fluctuating and moving about at times?—That is no doubt conceivable.

7705. Do you think, for instance, that what is called burletta might be performed at the music halls?—I have not considered that point.

7706. But probably you think, do you not, that certain kinds of light pieces might be performed there?—I think, at all events, that the constant collision now going on between the theatres and music halls should be stopped.

7707. Do not you think it might be an advantage that a better species of performance should be given, and one more calculated to elevate the taste of the public, than entertainments confined to tumbling, nigger songs, and things of that description, to which they are compelled to adhere because they are not properly licensed for theatrical purposes?—Of course anything that would elevate the taste or morals of the people would be desirable.

7708. How long has your Lordship held the office of Lord Chamberlain?—Seven years.

7709. Your Lordship was not Lord Chamberlain when "Robert le Diable" was first introduced into this country?—No; that was many years ago.

7710. Does your Lordship recollect that by the former Lord Chamberlain, after "Robert le Diable" had been prepared by Mr. Lumley, and he had gone to the expense of scenery, dresses, and so on, it was interdicted?—This is the first time I have heard of that.

7711. The reason assigned was that the ballet girls appeared as spirits rising from the grave?—That is the case in "Robert le Diable," but I never heard of the interdiction.

7712. Colonel Sturt.] Your Lordship is not aware that Mr. Lumley tells that story in his "Reminiscences of the Opera"?—I daresay he did; but I have often witnessed that in "Robert le Diable."

7713. But that was stopped at great inconvenience and expense, was it not, when Lord Spencer was Lord Chamberlain?—I do not know that.

7714. Mr. Locke.] But I asked that question more especially with regard to whether your Lordship thinks there might be some mode of revising the decisions of the Lord Chamberlain, if he took very particular views; or does your Lordship think that must be left to be dealt with in the same way as decisions of the judges are?—I think that a man at the head of a department must be responsible to the public, like a Secretary of State; and if there is any malfeasance, Parliament should deal with it. Any other form of appeal would take away the responsibility of the head of any office.

7715. Chairman.] The advantage of an appeal to the Home Secretary would be that he could be called to account in Parliament?—Yes, certainly there would be that advantage; but, as a matter of fact, we do refer now to the Home Secretary in case of difficulty.

7716. So that if a difficulty were left in the hands of the Home Secretary, the Home Secretary would even now be attacked in Parliament?—Yes, we communicate with him.

7717. Mr. Locke.] But if a fresh Act were passed, and the law were altered, and all those powers were vested in the Lord Chamberlain, does not your Lordship think it would be necessary that there should be some accessible person connected with the office of Lord Chamberlain in the House of Commons, or in the House of Lords?—In the House of Lords, of course the Lord Chamberlain would answer for himself; and in the House of Commons the Home Secretary can always answer, for anything connected with theatres, on the part of the Lord Chamberlain; he has done so two or three times.

7718. Probably difficult questions might arise more frequently if his powers were extended?—Possibly; but I should hope that when things get into a quieter state, that would not be necessary.

7719. Now, to come to the subject of new theatres, taking for example the new theatre in Holborn; what is the mode of ingress and egress from that theatre; is there more than the front access?—Yes; but I cannot carry all the details in my mind; I saw the plans at the time.

7720. I have never seen the plans, but I have seen the site?—There was a question of another theatre being built close to it; but that is given up, because it would not do to have two theatres so close to one another.

7721. In most theatres they have partitioned off the front part of the pit for stalls?—Yes.

7722. The access to the stalls is often a very narrow passage indeed; now, has any attention been paid to that; if there were a fire, how would people get out of the stalls in a small theatre?—A great many of the small theatres are not such places as we should like. We took them over as they were, after the passing of Sir James Graham's Act. Of course, the surveyor who makes his report to us is more or less responsible for the professional part of the question. But I may state, as a matter of fact, that at the Haymarket Theatre there was once only one access to the stalls. I remonstrated with Mr. Buckstone about it, and, though he said there was great difficulty, he has made the alteration.

7723. At several of the theatres there is only an access on one side to the stalls, is your Lordship aware of that?—That is the case at some of them, I have no doubt.

Right Hon. Viscount Sydney, G.C.B.

8 June 1866.

7724. I mean at some of the theatres that have been recently altered?—I am not aware of that.

7725. Does your Lordship think that extremely dangerous, in case there was a fire?—There is no doubt that great improvements might be made at the theatres, but practically, it is very difficult to make them.

7726. Persons in the stalls might get from the stalls over the backs of the chairs into the pit, but that would be their only chance of getting out of the theatre; would not that be so?—I suppose so.

7727. Has your Lordship ever turned your attention to the new French theatres, the Châtelet and the Gaieties?—I have been at the Lyrique, but I have not been to the others.

7728. Now at the Lyrique, I believe, there is only ingress and egress in front, although the whole space round the theatre is quite clear; still that is fitted up all along with shops?—I do not remember. The great fault with all the French theatres is that they have only one access; nothing can be more dangerous than the iron staircase in the Palais Royal; it is a thing that we should not sanction; the whole mass of the public in the boxes and galleries have to go out at one end.

7729. It is the same at the Variétés, is it not?—There is more space at the Variétés, but the minister of the day, before the theatres were handed over to the Ministre de la Maison de l'Empéreur, told me that they had great difficulty in dealing with them there, and that he was in the same position as I am; they could not pull down the Palais Royal, and they are obliged to allow a system of which they disapprove; just as objectionable things are cut out at rehearsal, but are frequently repeated when the plays are acted; they do not like to stop them unless there is something very strongly political.

7730. Chairman.] In France has this matter been taken away from the Ministre des Théâtres, aud put into the hands of the Ministre de la Maison de l'Empéreur?—Yes, three years ago that separation took place; the principle is exactly the same, only there is a different minister.

7731. Mr. Locke.] Is it not the fact, that at Drury Lane Theatre people can get out at all the four sides?—I have not been to Drury Lane Theatre for some years.

7732. The pit entrance is at the side, in Vinegar-yard; then there is an entrance to the private boxes on the other side, in Russell-street; then there is the front, and I presume that there is a way out at the back. Does your Lordship think it would be an advantage that a theatre should stand by itself, not having houses built up against its sides?—Yes, I should think that would be an advantage.

7733. Chairman.] But that would be very difficult to carry out in London, would it not?—Yes.

7734. Mr. Locke.] Suppose a new theatre was about to be built, would not that be an advantageous mode of proceeding, namely, that there should be a clear way out round the whole of the building?—I do not think that that should be made a sine quâ non, but it stands to reason that it would be safer.

7735. They are so built in France, are they not?—The last two new ones are so built.

7736. But still they have not taken advantage of that, inasmuch as they have built shops at the two sides?—Yes.

7737. I do not know whether your Lordship saw that Bill which was brought in last Session; but, in the schedule of that Bill, there were certain rules and regulations inserted for the building of theatres?—Yes; I saw that Bill last year, but I forget the rules and regulations now.

7738. We have had the evidence of Captain Shaw, the Superintendent of the London Fire Brigade, who said that they were very well, so far as they went, but that they were not sufficient; and we have this morning a paper from Captain Shaw, containing suggestions for the building of theatres; perhaps your Lordship has not seen those suggestions?—No. I believe that Captain Shaw would wish to have an enormous quantity of water, which would be quite impossible in this country. The French theatres have a certain number of sapeurs et pompiers for which they pay. I do not know how our managers would like that; it is compulsory in France.

7739. Colonel Sturt.] Does your Lordship's department interfere with the fencing of the lights on the stage, for the safety of the performers?—I sent a circular to the managers of the theatres last year, or the year before, on that subject.

7740. It was at your Lordship's instigation that the footlights were fenced?—Yes.

7741. That was after some accident, where a girl was burnt at one of the City theatres?—Yes; but the girl admitted to Mr. Ponsonby, who examined her, that it was entirely her own fault.

7742. I heard a very different story to that?—I do not know.

7743. Lord Eustace Cecil.] Are you aware whether the expenses of the Lord Chamberlain's department are entirely defrayed from the Consolidated Fund, or whether any portions of those expenses are defrayed by fees which are exacted from the theatres?—The Examiner, Mr. Donne, is paid by the fees, but he has a small salary from the department as well.

7744. You do not remember what the fees from the theatres annually amount to, I suppose?—I do not.

7745. I presume that it is a very insignificant sum?—Yes, very insignificant.

7746. Mr. Miller.] Suppose the whole of the music halls and theatres were placed under the authority of the Lord Chamberlain, do you think that you could levy fees enough from them to make them pay their own expenses, taking the whole country at large?—We have considered that, and we thought so.

7747. Supposing the expenses were not sufficient, would you make them up from the county rate, or the Consolidated Fund, or a municipal rate, or how?—I think, if the expenses of management did not pay themselves, it should not be under our department. There would be a great difficulty in asking the Consolidated Fund to pay for the expenses to a department over which they had no control, because the Lord Chamberlain is paid a certain amount from the Civil List, which is fixed, and there would then be some complication.

7748. But if an independent authority were appointed, the whole of the expenses connected with the theatre must be paid by that one office, whereas, at present, the Lord Chamberlain and his staff are paid by the Consolidated Fund to do all the duties, the theatrical licenses included?—Yes, there is no expense to the country at all.

7749. Could your Lordship give any idea at all of the expense of conducting the office, supposing any independent office were established for for granting licenses, and managing the theatres and music-halls?—No, I have not had an opportunity of considering that; I have not gone into it, but I know the expenses of the theatres in Paris come to about 86,000*l.* a year.

7750. Chairman.] Does that include subventions?—That includes subventions, the Emperor's boxes, the encouragements to artists and secours to dramatic authors and the staff.

7751. Lord Eustace Cecil.] All those items are defrayed out of the Civil List in this country, are they not?—Yes, it costs the country nothing.

7752. Mr. Powell.] It is paid by the Queen; it comes out of her pocket?—Yes, except the fees paid by the managers.

7753. So that, if you were to make your staff more expensive, you would practically be taking money out of the Queen's pocket?—Yes, I could not propose the change to Her Majesty unless we had sufficient power for obtaining fees to pay the expenses.

7754. Mr. Miller.] Suppose there were one authority for the whole country, would you recommend that that authority should be exercised by the municipal authority, or by the county magistrates?—I should say the municipal authorities; the county magistrates would know very little what was going on in the towns.

7755. You would give to the municipal authorities the power of appointing a person to be a sort of inspector in the borough to which he was appointed?—Just so.

7756. Would not that multiply, unnecessarily, the number of inspectors, and so increase the expense?—No doubt it would multiply the inspectors; but I do not know how the magistrates exercise their jurisdiction in the country; whether they do make an inspection of the theatres, or not; I think it would be desirable, but whether that is done by the municipal authorities or not, I do not know.

7757. The magistrates, according to the evidence before us, do inspect the theatres through the medium of what is called a "Watch Committee;" in fact, it is a police committee?—I do not know.

7758. Mr. Powell.] Mr. Boucicault stated in his evidence at question 4409, that it was "not through the Lord Chamberlain's Office, or any member connected with that office, that he was prevented from building a theatre;" do you corroborate his evidence on that point?—Yes.

7759. Do you think that with respect to licensing new theatres, regard should be had to the wishes of those who may live in the neighbourhood of the proposed theatre?—Yes, I think so; I think we have consulted the churchwardens.

7760. You think that that is a principle which ought to be maintained?—I think it should be considered; I do not say that it should be a complete negative.

7761. You have not considered the cost of the staff which you would think sufficient to carry out the superintendence in the metropolitan district?—No, we could not do that yet.

7762. What should you describe as the duties of the staff which you would require?—There would be the censure, and of course the survey of a great many more places, and a great deal more correspondence.

7763. Should you consider it the duty of the staff to visit the theatres night by night to see that the performances agreed with the licenses given?—No, I do not think that is necessary; we have never done that.

7764. Then what steps would you think it desirable to take in order to ensure that nothing was done by the theatres except what is licensed?—If anything is said to be going wrong I have frequently sent Mr. Donne, and he has reported to me if anything is really wrong at the representation.

7765. You do exercise a sort of slight general supervision at this moment?—Yes; we do not send a person every night on purpose, but if I heard of anything wrong going on, I should send for the Examiner of Plays to go and see.

7766. I think that one of the members of your staff, either Mr. Ponsonby or Mr. Donne, or both, have stated that they do visit the theatres occasionally with a view to see that there is nothing irregular going on?—Yes, and I have done so myself.

7767. I suppose you would not think it any part of the duty of your staff to report on the conduct of the audience?—No.

7768. You would leave it in the hands of the police?—I would leave it in the hands of the manager; he might, if he pleased, call on the police; the great object is to throw the responsibility on the manager himself. There is quite a different view of these matters taken by the managers of the theatres from what was formerly taken; Mr. Macready was the originator of getting rid of women of the town in theatres.

7769. The managers appear perfectly willing to continue that system?—Yes; I must say that the managers have always met, in a very fair spirit, any suggestion made by me or anybody in my office.

7770. Your Lordship is unable to supply the Committee with any definition of what you would allow the music halls to perform?—Just so.

7771. But you think that everything that is done ought to be licensed?—Yes.

7772. Then how would you deal with those rooms (which are considerable in number) which are not dignified with that name, but which in law are music halls; namely, small rooms attached to public-houses; rooms we will say receiving 100 visitors?—I should think that we should take over those places which are now licensed by the magistrates under the Act of George the Second.

7773. You would include in your view places of amusement of the class which I have endeavoured to describe?—Yes.

7774. Would you throw the entire burden of instituting proceedings on individuals in case of violations of your license?—No, not in case of violations; in that case it would be our duty to take some steps.

7775. But anything in the performance which was not licensed by you would be a violation of your license?—Yes.

7776. Consequently, if the music halls acting under a restricted license were to do things beyond that license, they would be doing that which was prohibited by the license, and they would therefore come within your censure?—Yes, assuming that they were put under our jurisdiction.

7777. You expressed an opinion adverse to the granting of occasional licenses on the grounds which you have mentioned?—Yes.

7778. An honourable member asked you a question with regard to the county magistrates.

Right Hon. Viscount Sydney, G.C.B.

8 June 186 .

It being the custom of the county magistrates to meet the local bench who represent the feeling of the particular district, do you not think that they would be conversant with the feelings, wishes, and necessities of the district, even supposing it were a town?—Yes, but the inconvenience of the present arrangement is this; in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, it is the local magistrates who examine the thing, and it is decided at Quarter Sessions; in the county of Kent we have been sometimes in collision with the local magistrates, when they have either given a license or refused it.

7779. Do you think it would be practicable to superintend these matters throughout the kingdom, by such a staff as has been suggested?—Personally, I do not think it would be advisable; we should have to keep a very large staff at such a place as Birmingham. I should leave it entirely to the municipal authorities. I do not think they would like to be interfered with.

7780. Chairman.] You do not think it possible or advisable to extend the central authority to the country?—No, I do not.

7781. Have you any knowledge of a personal character, with regard to the increase or diminution of theatres in towns in the country?—No, I have no personal knowledge.

7782. Your evidence is given from hearsay?—Merely from hearsay.

7783. Mr. Dion Boucicault said, in answer to question 4402, with regard to obtaining a license, "When I was about to apply for a license, I was told that there would be a difficulty about it, and I thought it very unfair. I was told that the other managers would be called together in the west end, to say what reasons they could allege for my not having a license; I think it is unfair, if a person wishes to go into an enterprise, that those persons who are in competition with him in the same enterprise, are to be brought together and to be asked if they object." Do you know any grounds at all for that statement?—No, I know of no grounds for that. I had an interview with Mr. Boucicault, but nothing passed on that subject, that I remember.

7784. Is there anything that could have led him to the idea that the other managers would be called together to consult on the subject of another theatre?—I never heard of anything to that effect.

7785. There is no foundation for that idea, so far as you know?—None at all.

7786. His notion would seem to be that it would be by the Lord Chamberlain's authority that they would be called together, because he says, "I was told that there would be a difficulty about it, and I thought it very unfair. I was told that the other managers would be called together in the West-end to say what reasons they could allege for my not having a license?"—I cannot answer for what he was told; but so far as I know he was told that if he was able to produce a theatre the license would be given him; the difficulty was the space, and the money, I believe.

7787. But if it were in any particular district where the managers of the theatres had property, would the managers be able to act through the churchwardens, who, you say, are sometimes consulted?—I never heard of that kind of thing.

7788. Was "Moses in Egypt" brought out while your Lordship was Chamberlain?—No, that was a great many years ago. I think the prayer was stopped at the suggestion of the late Bishop of London; but I speak from memory entirely.

7789. Mr. Clay.] Your Lordship has given an opinion that the music halls might be allowed to act light pieces?—Yes.

7790. Would you suggest any definition of those light pieces?—I have already said that I am not prepared to offer a definition at present.

7791. I should be glad to know whether it does not appear to you to be utterly impossible to arrive at any definition which would answer the purpose?—I think that in the present state of the law there would be a difficulty.

7792. Mr. Clive.] Do you think that any limit with regard to the number of actors to be allowed on the stage at one time would meet the case?—No, I should think not; if you allow them to perform pieces, you must allow any number of actors; at present, dialogue is contrary to the law.

7793. Do you think that if they were to be confined to two or three actors that would answer the purpose?—I am not prepared to go into that matter in detail at present.

7794. Mr. Locke.] If you have a piece, of course you must have actors to act it?—No doubt.

7795. Chairman.] Has your Lordship any further remarks to offer to the Committee?—No, I think not.

Mr. Inspector Richard Reason called in; and Examined.

Mr. Inspector R. Reason.

7796. Chairman.] You are an Inspector in the Police Force in London?—I am the chief inspector of common lodging houses and dangerous structures.

7797. Is it part of your duty to superintend the smallest theatres?—No; my duties are principally confined to inspecting common lodging houses and dangerous structures. I am confined to that duty, officially.

7798. Colonel Sturt.] Probably you know something about music-halls and theatres?—Only by casually visiting those at the East-end: Whitechapel, Ratcliffe-highway, &c.

7799. Chairman.] It is not part of your duty to inspect these places?—No.

7800. Are there any other Inspectors in the police force that do inspect those buildings?—I should say not, unless they suspected something wrong was going on, then the police would make it a part of their duty to visit them and report thereon to the Commissioner.

7801. When you have visited such places, have the performances been of a respectable character?—I think so.

7802. By whom are they mostly attended?—Some of them are well attended; for example, take "Mahogany Bar," Wellclose-passage, Wellclose-square.

7803. Is that a large hall?—It is a large hall.

7804. How many people would it accommodate?—I should hardly like to say, but I should think 1,500; it is only a guess.

7805. Have you seen it full?—Yes.

7806. What is the character of the performances that go on there?—Music, singing, dancing, acrobats, &c.

7807. Mr.

7807. Mr. Locke.] Are there a great many penny gaffs, as they are called, in Whitechapel-road?—There are two.

7808. Are those places licensed?—I think so, for music, by the county magistrates.

7809. For music and dancing?—Yes.

7810. What performances do they give; what are their nature?—They are comic songs, principally, and sometimes a negro dance.

7811. What are the names of those two places?—We know them by the name of penny gaffs.

7812. They have no particular name?—No; I think not. I have only been in one.

7813. Was there any performance of the stage at this penny gaff?—There was singing only while I was there.

7814. Negro melodies, and that sort of thing?—Yes.

7815. Where was that?—In High-street, Whitechapel, near the "Effingham."

7816. Have you been into any of those places in Ratcliff-highway?—No. But there are music-rooms attached to many of the public-houses, and I have been to them.

7817. Those are dancing-houses, where the visitors dance themselves, are they not?—Yes; they are principally sailors and females.

7818. What licenses have they?—They are licensed victuallers, most of them; and, in addition, many of them have dancing licenses, and some music and dancing license.

7819. Chairman.] Do you know of any cases where the police have reported misconduct in the performance in those places?—I do not.

7820. Are they singing places?—Many of them are.

7821. Mr. Locke.] Have they a stage?—Some of them have a slightly-raised stage, when they are licensed for music and dancing.

7822. Chairman.] If improper songs were sung there, would the police interfere?—Yes; on the ensuing licensing day.

7823. It would be brought up the next licensing day?—There is no doubt of it.

7824. Have you known cases where such matters were brought up?—No.

7825. How do you account for that?—I am not attached to that district; it is the H and K Division at the East-end of London.

7826. But in the district to which you are attached, are you aware that cases of that kind have been brought before the magistrates?—No. My special duties, before alluded to, do not give me much opportunity of gaining information on this subject.

7827. But have the police ever reported upon improprieties in the performances at those places?—Never, within my knowledge.

7828. Do you believe that they do?—I have not the slightest doubt that they do it, but I do not know of any cases in particular.

7829. Do children go much to those penny theatres?—Yes, that is the worst part of it; very few adults go there, they are principally children.

7830. Are the places licensed?—They must be.

7831. By the county magistrates?—Yes.

7832. Chairman.] Not in London?—Yes, for music and dancing.

7833. Mr. Locke.] But we are speaking of penny gaffs?—There is a penny admission for each person.

7834. Is there any low-class theatre in the Whitechapel-road, or in that neighbourhood?—Only those two penny gaffs that I am aware of.

7835. What kind of performances are there?—Dancing and singing.

7836. But are there any theatrical performances at those places?—None that I am aware of.

7837. Do children go to those places for dancing and singing?—There is nothing else for them to see, that I am aware of.

7838. Is there drinking going on at the same time in those places?—No.

7839. Colonel Sturt.] Is there smoking going on?—I think they do smoke At the dancing rooms attached to the public-houses there is drinking going on.

7840. Chairman.] What do they get for their penny at the penny gaffs?—There is a little dancing, and they probably hear a little comic singing.

7841. Dancing on the stage?—Yes.

7842. A kind of ballet?—No, a man or a women will come on and sing a song and retire.

7843. Then the dancing is on a stage?—Yes.

7844. Do you know what is the lowest charge for admission at the theatres at the East-end?—I should think that sixpence is the lowest charge of admission to the theatres in that neighbourhood.

7845. Do the police go into these theatres at all?—Yes. In some they are applied for specially to be in attendance at the doors or in the interior.

7846. Colonel Sturt.] You do not know who licenses those penny theatres?—I imagine it to be the county magistrate.

7847. Do you think that those penny theatres are an evil?—I think so, by encouraging so many children, because they will get a penny to go there somehow or other.

7848. Mr. Powell.] The boys and girls are led into mischief at these penny gaffs, you think?—I have no doubt of it, but I do not know.

7849. From your knowledge of that class of society, you think it is likely to be so?—Yes.

7850. Mr. Locke.] Have they plays acted there?—No.

7851. Merely dancing and singing?—Yes.

7852. Chairman.] Do you think that those little theatres at the East-end are as well conducted as the theatres at the West-end?—Yes.

7853. Mr. Miller.] What part of London are you speaking of?—Whitechapel-road, just beyond the Church.

7854. Do you know a place called the "Rodney," at Whitechapel?—No.

7855. A place licensed for the sale of spirits and for music and dancing?—There is a theatre, the "Effingham Arms," where they sell both spirits and wine; that is in the Whitechapel-road, on the right-hand side.

7856. That is a theatre licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, I suppose?—Yes.

7857. Are there many of those penny gaffs?—I have never been to more than one.

7858. How many would each one hold?—I think that the one I have been into would hold 120 people.

7859. If there was any impropriety going on, I suppose a report would be made to the magistrates on the licensing day?—Yes, if it came to the knowledge of the police.

7860. That is to say, if complaints were made?—Yes.

7861. And upon complaint and conviction, the license would be lost?—Yes.

Mr. Inspector R. Reason.

8 June 1866.

7862. Has any such case occurred?—Not to my knowledge.

7863. How long have those places existed?—One of them has existed to my knowledge for 14 or 15 years; how long previously I do not know.

7864. Are those places visited principally by the poor?—Yes, by the poorer class of children.

7865. Exclusively?—Yes. The place is too dirty inside to invite any person of respectability.

7866. When the children get inside do they witness a kind of scene which you think is injurious to them?—No; but it is pitiful to see the poor faces there, the dirt and filth they are in.

7867. How late do those places keep open?—Eleven o'clock. They have perhaps two or three performances during the evening. They do not keep up all the evening any one performance; they let the people out, and then admit a fresh audience.

7868. Do the children go by themselves?—Yes, principally.

7869. Do they consist of the criminal population chiefly?—I have no doubt that they do, but I am not in a position to say.

7870.—And if they are not criminals when they go there, they soon get contaminated, I suppose; but has it ever occurred to you whether any check could be placed on those proceedings?—Only this, that I think it would be well to give the proprietors a caution not to admit children under a certain age into the place; that might do good perhaps.

7871. Do you think that that is practicable?—Not to the strict letter, perhaps, but very young children might be excluded.

7872. Are you aware that that plan is adopted in some provincial places?—No.

7873. Mr. Locke.] Is there any impropriety going on in those places?—No.

7874. If the children were not there they might be at some place that would be worse for them, I suppose?—I do not know.

7875. You say that there is no impropriety going on there, and there must be a great many places where there is impropriety going on?—No doubt.

7876. Are the songs proper songs?—Yes.

7877. And is the music proper music?—It is bad music.

7878. But the poor children like it, it amuses them?—Just so.

7879. Colonel Sturt.] What is the class of people who go there?—I should think there is a great number of the criminal class, and some of the children of the working classes.

7880. Mr. Locke.] The boys do not pick one another's pockets while they are there I suppose?—No, I suppose not.

7881. And when they are inside, they are not picking other people's pockets?—No.

7882. Therefore it keeps them out of mischief?—Yes.

7883. Chairman.] Have the police much occasion to interfere with the dancing-rooms where the sailors go?—I think not.

7884. Have the police instructions to see what kind of performances are going on at those places?—I have no doubt they have some such instructions.

7885. They have instructions to report if they see any misconduct, you think?—Decidedly.

MEMORANDUM ON THEATRES.

Lord Chamberlain's Office,
12 March 1866.

THE following observations as to the licensing of theatres and public entertainments, and as to the Lord Chamberlain's supervision of them from 1628 to the present date (1866) are drawn from the Records in the Lord Chamberlain's Office.

The Lord Chamberlain's authority over theatres and public entertainments in early times, was no doubt derived from the Royal prerogative. The Court was the mainstay of the different companies of actors, the best of whom were sworn in as servants of the king, acted before him in London, and accompanied him in his progresses through England. The Lord Chamberlain and his subordinate officer, the Master of the Revels, thus came to be licensers of theatrical entertainments and of theatrical pieces. That the Chamberlain's authority proceeded from the Sovereign alone is clear, from the fact that no Act of Parliament, previous to the 10 Geo. 2, c. 28 (passed in 1737), alludes to his licensing powers, though he was constantly exercising them.

The Office Records prove that between 1628 (when they commence) and 1660, the Lord Chamberlain licensed and closed theatres, interfered in the copyright of plays, and either personally, or through the Master of the Revels, had complete control over managers and actors.

In 1662 and 1663, King Charles II. granted the two well known patents to Thomas Killigrew and Sir William Davenant, for all kinds of stage entertainments as therein named, and by these two Patents all other companies in London and Westminster were silenced.

The two patents were united by indenture in 1692, the intention of the combining patentees being to create a monopoly for their exclusive advantage, The Duke of Dorset, then Lord Chamberlain, represented the matter to the king, who took the opinion of his law officers, and was advised that a patent by one Sovereign could not tie up the hands of his successor. Accordingly, in 1695, King William III. granted a license to Betterton and his company of actors, to set up another theatre, and from that time forward there were again two theatres in London. The license granted to Betterton was renewed from time to time, and at last converted into a patent of 21 years' duration, and it was under this authority, and under the Killigrew and Davenant patent united in one, that the Theatres Royal Covent Garden and Drury Lane kept their position for so many years as the two national theatres; the only two theatres, in fact, where the legitimate drama could be played at all times and seasons.

The position of the two great theatres was not maintained without dispute or opposition; in fact the bulk of the correspondence preserved in this office from 1660 to 1843, consists of endeavours on the part of the patent theatres to put all others down, and of attempts by the minor theatres (which were established from time to time) to encroach on the privileges of the great theatres.

The Italian Opera House was the result of a license granted by Queen Anne to Sir John Vanbrugh in 1704, and it was soon settled by authority that at this theatre (now represented by Her Majesty's Theatre) English plays should not be given, and that on the other hand Italian operas should not be given at the patent theatres.

About the year 1731, the theatre now known as the Haymarket Theatre came into existence; it was occasionally licensed from 1749, was known as Foote's Theatre, and, after 1778, received an annual license for the regular drama; but only during the summer months, so that it might not hurt the interests of the winter theatres, as Covent Garden and Drury Lane were then called.

In 1809, the Lyceum, which, for some years before, had been licensed for music and dancing, was licensed for "musical dramatic entertainmens and ballets of action." And about the same time the theatre, now called the Adelphi, was permitted to give "burlettas, music and dancing, with spectacle and pantomime." In 1813, the Olympic was licensed for the same performances, and for horsemanship, and another minor theatre in Catherine-street, Strand, was similarly licensed. Burletta licenses were also granted for the St. James's Theatre in 1835, and for the Strand Theatre in 1836.

At this time also various theatres had been established beyond the Lord Chamberlain's jurisdiction, such as the Surrey, the Coburg, Astley's, and others; and several places called saloons sprung up, which were really public-houses, enlivened by theatrical entertainments. These theatres and saloons were beyond the liberties of Westminster, and there was no law in existence under which they could be licensed; they pretended, however, to be open under a magistrate's license for "music, dancing, and public entertainments"; but this authority afforded them no protection, when it was thought worth while to prosecute the managers.

As regards legislation between 1660 and 1843, it may be remarked, that the early Acts of Parliament relating to players were, in reality, Vagrant Acts, and it was not till 1737 that the question of theatrical licenses, and of the censorship, received a solution at the hands of Parliament. The 10 Geo. 2, c. 28, passed in that year, empowered the Lord Chamberlain to grant licenses for theatrical entertainments, as therein defined, within the city and liberties of Westminster, and wherever the Sovereign might reside, and it constitutes him licenser of all new plays throughout Great Britain.

Copy of Act, Appendix A.

The 25 Geo. 2, c. 30, passed in 1751, enabled the justices of the peace to license houses for music, dancing, and public entertainment after 5 o'clock in the afternoon, but Section 4 of the Act excepts the patent theatres, Crown licenses, and the Lord Chamberlain's licenses from the penalties of the Act.

List of occasional Licenses, Appendix B.

Under this power, therefore, the Lord Chamberlain granted licenses for music, dancing, recitation, conjuring, and many kinds of public entertainments, which cannot be classed as stage plays, from 1751 to 1843. He ceased to grant these licenses in 1843, when the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68, was passed, believing it to be the intention of the Legislature that his licenses should thenceforward be limited to stage plays; but the law officers of the Crown have recently reported (1866) that his powers to grant licenses for music, dancing, and miscellaneous entertainments under this Act have not been repealed by the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68.

Copy of Act, Appendix C.

In 1787, the 28 Geo. 3, c. 30, enabled justices of the peace to license theatrical entertainments occasionally under the restrictions therein contained, but they could not grant licenses within 20 miles of London, nor near any Royal residence.

Theatrical matters stood thus immediately before the Act of 1843.

The two patent theatres were open for all performances, as they still are, under the patents as before explained. The Lord Chamberlain, under the 10 Geo. 2, c. 28, was giving, within the liberties of Westminster, annual licenses to the Opera House for Italian operas and ballets; to the Haymarket Theatre, for plays during a portion of the year; to the Lyceum, for English operas and ballets; and, to the several minor theatres, for burlettas, spectacle, and pantomime, which terms seems to have comprised all performances except tragedy and comedy. He was also licensing, under the 25 Geo. 2, c. 30, music, dancing, and all kinds of public entertainments. The justices of the peace were also under the latter Act, licensing public houses, gardens, &c., for music and dancing after 5 o'clock in the afternoon, and, finally, various theatres and saloons were open illegally for stage performances beyond the liberties of Westminster.

Copy of Act, Appendix D.

The Act of 1843, 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68,* extended the Lord Chamberlain's jurisdiction, from Westminster to the Parliamentary boundaries, and so defined the word "stage plays," that the Lord Chamberlain decided to grant the same license to all theatres, both those in Westminster and those brought within his authority by the new Act. The managers of all theatres and saloons were licensed to give stage plays in the fullest sense of the word, and during the whole year, under a bond with the Lord Chamberlain, as prescribed by the Act of Parliament, 24 theatres or saloons were thus licensed at Michaelmas 1843, after the passing of the Act; of these seven had been previously licensed by the Lord Chamberlain; and 10 theatres and seven saloons came, for the first time, under the Lord Chamberlain's authority. All respectable places of entertainment established before the passing of the Act were licensed; and in the case of saloons the Lord Chamberlain ruled that the entrances to the stage should not be through the bars or taprooms of the taverns to which they were attached, that no drinking or smoking should be allowed during the hours of performance,† and that no saloon should be open before 5 o'clock P.M.

List of Theatres and Saloons licensed in 1843, Appendix G.

The form of license to the saloons was somewhat altered in 1845, smoking being still interdicted, and refreshments allowed only during the intervals between the performances, as at theatres. Tables or stands for refreshment were also forbidden.

Of the saloons licensed in 1843 not one remains in 1866. The Grecian, Britannia, Effingham, and Bower Saloons are now regular theatres, and the Albert, Albion, and Apollo Saloons have been pulled down or converted to other purposes.

All the metropolitan theatres licensed in 1843 still exist, and in addition to these the Gallery of Illustration was licensed in 1861, the Cabinet Theatre in 1862, and the Alexandra Theatre in 1865. The plans of a new theatre, to be erected in Holborn, have also been approved in 1865.

The number of theatres in London, licensed by the Lord Chamberlain in 1865, was 25.

Appendix, No. 1.

It would appear that the 24 or 25 theatres licensed, annually, from 1843 to the present time, have been sufficient for the theatrical wants of the metropolis, for it is certain that no bonâ fide application for a new theatre to meet the wants of increasing population has been received by the Lord Chamberlain until the last year. Many applications for stage play licenses have been made and declined, but they have been for buildings not originally designed as theatres and not safe for the reception of large audiences; sometimes the applicants have asked for the Lord Chamberlain's license on forfeiture of their music and dancing licenses; some of the applications have been to give stage plays at baths, taverns, music halls, or in parts only of larger buildings. Some literary institutions have applied for occasional licenses, either for charitable purposes or to raise funds for their own benefit. The majority of applicants, however, of late years, have been proprietors of music halls, who, in consequence of the pressure put upon them by the theatres, have endeavoured to obtain protection for the quasi-theatrical performances which they have given to attract visitors.

Many of the applicants had no primâ facie case at all in favour of a license. If there appeared to be any reasonable ground for entertaining their request, an inspection of the building was at once made by the inspector of theatres (an officer in the Lord Chamberlain's Department), assisted by a professional surveyor. The result of the inspection usually brought to light that the place was not safe for the reception of audiences, or did not possess sufficient means for egress in case of alarm.

In deciding upon applications for new licenses, the question of safety has been the first consideration, but the Lord Chamberlain has been, in other respects, guided by the interests of the public. He has required that an applicant should produce a petition signed by many of the inhabitants in the immediate vicinity, in favour of the proposed theatre, he has requested the Police Commissioners to verify the truth of the petition, and to report whether inconvenience was likely to result in the way of interruption of traffic, or otherwise, from the establishment of a new theatre. He has usually obtained the opinion of the parish authorities, and, in short, he has endeavoured to convince himself generally that the grant of the license would satisfy a legitimate want and not create a permanent nuisance.

Copy of Letter to Mr. Parkinson, Appendix I.

The views of the Lord Chamberlain, in 1844, are well explained, in answer to an application to give stage plays at the Rotunda.

In the case of building a new theatre, the Lord Chamberlain now requires that a plan of the site should be produced, and examines the site; and if the establishment of a new theatre appears to be free from objection he examines the plans of the proposed building, so as to be convinced that the passages and exits are sufficiently large, and that the security of the audience is cared for in all essential points. The plans, as finally approved, must be adhered to in the construction of the building, and there is a final inspection of the theatre when completed.

It may be here conveniently explained in full what measures the Lord Chamberlain has taken of late years in regard to the security and convenience of the public.

No Act of Parliament enjoins any survey or inspection of existing theatres, though the Metropolitan Building Act comes into operation in the case of new theatres, so far as the stability of the structure and the use of certain materials are concerned.

The earliest instance of a compulsory survey of a theatre by the Lord Chamberlain appears to be that of the Pantheon, in 1812.

The Opera House in the Haymarket was surveyed between 1825 and 1829; and in 1828 the Covent Garden Theatre proprietors were compelled to produce an architect's report of the safety of the building before it was opened.

In the same year the Surveyor of His Majesty's works caused a survey to be made of all the theatres in the Lord Chamberlain's jurisdiction, at the request of the latter. The reports, however, were confined to the stability of the walls and structure generally of the buildings, and no notice appears to have been taken of accessory arrangements as affecting the security and comfort of the audience.

The first move in this direction was made in 1850, when the Commissioners of Police were requested by the Lord Chamberlain to report as to the means of egress from all the theatres in London. They reported unfavourably of five theatres, and notice to this effect was sent by the Lord Chamberlain to the managers.

In 1852, the Lord Chamberlain, after consulting the official referees under the Building Act, required from the proprietor of every theatre a certificate as to the safety of the structure, to be made either by the district surveyor or some other competent architect or surveyor; and it was desired that the architect should also certify that the theatre possessed sufficient means of egress in case of alarm, and should further attest the stability of the gallery fronts, of the stair balustrades, and of such other accessories of the building as in any way involved the safety of the public.

In 1853, the Lord Chamberlain addressed a circular to all the managers, recommending improved ventilation in their theatres.

In the licenses of 1854–55, a condition was attached to the grant of every license making its validity depend on an observation of the rules as to ventilation, facility of egress, and other precautions, which the Lord Chamberlain might think fit to make during the currency of the license.

In the autumn of 1855, the first annual inspection took place of the whole of the metropolitan theatres. It was made by an officer of the Lord Chamberlain's Department, assisted by a surveyor, and the chief points of investigation were—

1st. Means of egress in case of fire or other alarm, involving alteration of doors, removal of inconvenient barriers and awkward steps, and alteration of staircases.

2d. Improvement of ventilation.

Appendix, No. 1.

3d. Means of extinguishing fire, state of water supply, force pumps, supply of buckets, and state of gas burners.

4th. Safe hanging of chandeliers.

5th. Cleanliness of the building, and state of urinaries and closets.

In the spring of 1856, letters were sent to the managers pointing out the defects which had been observed, enjoining them at once to remedy the most important, and recommending improvements of lesser moment.

Since 1856, the metropolitan theatres have been examined once every year from roof to basement, and the inspector reports that very great improvement has resulted from the examination, and that, taking into consideration the indifferent sites upon which many of the theatres are built, they are now as safe and convenient as they can be made; the labour of the inspection has in consequence much decreased. There is no door in any theatre in London which opens inwards, so as to obstruct the escape of the audience. Many barriers have been removed, and staircases strengthened. Considerable water supplies have been added, and force-pumps, buckets, and other precautions against fire are provided at all the theatres. Pewter gas-piping, which is liable to breakage resulting in accidents, has been also generally superseded by iron piping. Alterations and improvements of still more importance have been carried out at several of the theatres, at the earnest advice of the Lord Chamberlain, involving a partial reconstruction of the theatre, and the addition of new staircases and exits for the public.

The Lord Chamberlain has further, within the last few years, extended his inspection to some of the stage arrangements, in consequence of fatal accidents which occurred to dancers from the ignition of their dresses. Without relieving the managers from their responsibility in these respects, he has enjoined that the footlights shall at all theatres be protected by wire guards, and that no lights shall be placed at the wings lower than four feet from the ground. He has also, without making a positive order, recommended the use of uninflammable material for women's dresses on the stage.

It is due to the proprietors and managers to state, that they have shown great willingness to follow the Lord Chamberlain's directions and advice in all matters connected with the inspection of theatres.

In describing the further intervention of the Lord Chamberlain in theatrical matters, his office as licenser of plays, under the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68, must be first mentioned.

List of Plays refused, Appendix K.

The returns show that from the beginning of 1852 to the end of 1865, 2,816 plays were submitted for license, out of which only 19 were rejected; of those, two were from Scripture subjects, seven were of the swell mob and burglary school, and the bulk of the remainder were French plays of an immoral tendency or English versions of them.

The Lord Chamberlain has always endeavoured to exercise his power as censor without vexatious interference. In order, however, to make the supervision effective, the playbills of all London theatres are sent weekly to the Lord Chamberlain's office, and examined by the Reader of Plays, who also attends any performance when important alterations have been made in a piece submitted for license.

By a circular to the managers in 1847, the Lord Chamberlain expressed his disapprobation of the practice which had existed of admitting prostitutes into the theatres, as such; and from that time there is reason to believe that the system has been entirely discontinued.

In 1846, he required that the police should be admitted to all London theatres, and particular tickets were then provided for the purpose.

At various times the Lord Chamberlain has prohibited at theatres certain performances which had become popular from the excitement of the risk attending them, such as the exhibition of trained wild beasts, and performances like those of Blondin. He has also discouraged masquerades, which, if they have taken place at any of the theatres, have been contrary to his express wish.

In 1846, the Lord Chamberlain was memorialised by the manager of the Surrey Theatre to order a discontinuance of the low prices which had been commenced by some of the saloon managers, and followed by the smaller theatres; his Lordship, however, declined to interfere, looking to the meaning of the law which, by allowing the additional theatres and saloons in 1843, had no doubt in view the enlargement of the means of entertainment to the poorer classes of London; while endeavouring by proper rules to keep these low priced theatres within the bounds of propriety, he declined to use any repressive action as to their prices of admission.

The correspondence on the above-mentioned memorial elicited a fact which deserves consideration, that the theatrical saloons depending upon the sale of excisable liquors and refreshments, could afford to open at less prices than the theatres where wine and spirits could not legally be sold. It must also be mentioned that for the few years after 1843, when the theatrical saloons were first licensed, many more complaints were made against them than against the theatres. It was found necessary to suspend their licenses, or to grant them for a very limited time, so as to keep the managers in check; and the Lord Chamberlain has gladly conceded from time to time to the saloon proprietors the privilege of converting them into regular theatres.

It should here be mentioned that, in 1835, an Act was passed, 5 & 6 Guilmo. c. 39, empowering the Excise to give spirit licenses to all places licensed by the justices of the peace or by the Lord Chamberlain. At the representation of the publicans, this Act was suspended by a Treasury Order, dated 28th August 1835. In 1859, however, on a petition from the managers to the Treasury, the opinion of the law officers was taken, who reported that the order in question could not be maintained, and upon this, excise licenses were taken out by most of the metropolitan managers.

It

It was competent to the Lord Chamberlain to prevent this by his regulations in the case of theatres, but as he was perfectly aware that excisable liquors had all along been illegally sold at the theatres, he did not think it advisable to interfere. It was, however, understood that the sale should be confined to the refreshment rooms of the theatres, and not take place in the parts of the theatre set apart for the audience. No evil has resulted from this measure, and no complaints whatever have resulted from it as to disorderly conduct or drunkenness.

The saloons have been succeeded by the music halls, where ballets and effects of scene and costume are nightly represented, although the proprietors have no license for stage plays.

The difference between theatres and music halls is this, that at the former, the dramatic element is the chief feature, and the refreshment very subordinate; whereas, at the music halls, the performances are entirely accessory to the drinking, smoking, and refreshment.

The practice of introducing pantomime and ballet in the music halls commenced some years ago at Canterbury Hall, and was soon followed by other music halls.

The managers of theatres who considered their licenses to be invaded by this innovation, requested the Lord Chamberlain's interference, but as the law does not make him prosecutor, he preferred to leave the matter in the hands of those whose interests were most concerned. The managers of theatres thereupon took proceedings, and various decisions, chiefly adverse to the music halls, were obtained. The late decision, however, in the Court of Common Pleas, though it went to the question of fact, and not to the question of law, has practically left the music halls proprietors in a position to give ballets with costume and scenic effect, without any such control or precautions, as are exercised in theatres under the Lord Chamberlain's authority.

The length of the litigation was due, no doubt, to the obscurity of the definition of the word "stage plays" in the 6 & 7 Vict., c. 68, and of "music, dancing," and public entertainments in the Act 25 of George 2, c. 30.

The Lord Chamberlain has also not considered it his province to prosecute the managers of unlicensed places of entertainment, although, from time to time, he has called the attention of the police authorities to complaints which have reached him. In 1858 Sir Richard Mayne reported that 28 unlicensed places of entertainment were open in London, and, no doubt, this number has since considerably increased. The police authorities do not consider themselves bound to make a voluntary crusade against them, and Sir Richard Mayne has explained that the Police Act, under the provisions of which they would summarily interfere, bears a construction different to the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68. Practically, therefore, many unlicensed places exist without check or control.

It should also be mentioned that up to 1861 the theatres in the Lord Chamberlain's jurisdiction were closed for dramatic performances during Passion Week. In consequence, however, of the strong representations made by the managers of the hardship inflicted upon them by restrictions, which were placed upon no other class in the community, the limitation clause as to Passion Week was omitted in the licenses issued in 1861, always excepting Good Friday, and the question of opening in Passion Week is now left to the discretion of managers.

Another point to be mentioned is, that of late years the theatres have been used on Sundays for prayers and preaching. An application was made to the Lord Chamberlain to put a stop to this, but as, in his opinion, no harm could result from it, he declined to interfere.

Cap. XXXVI.

AN ACT for the better preventing Thefts and Robberies, and for regulating Places of public Entertainment, and punishing Persons keeping disorderly Houses.

WHEREAS the advertising a Reward with no Questions asked, for the Return of things which have been lost or stolen is one great Cause and Encouragement of Thefts and Robberies: Be it enacted by the King's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the Authority of the same, That from and after the First Day of June One thousand seven hundred and fifty-two, any person publicly advertising a Reward with no Questions asked for the Return of Things which have been stolen or lost, or making use of any Words in such public Advertisement purporting that such Reward shall be given or paid without seizing or making Inquiry after the Person producing such Thing so stolen or lost, or promising or offering in any such public Advertisement to return to any Pawnbroker or other Person who may have bought or advanced Money by way of Loan upon such Thing so stolen or lost the Money so paid or advanced, or any other sum of Money or Reward, for the Return of such Thing, and any Person printing or or publishing such Advertisement, shall respectively forfeit the sum of Fifty Pounds for every such offence to any Person who shall sue for the same.

Unlicensed Places of public Entertainment deemed disorderly Houses.

II. And whereas the Multitude of Places of Entertainment for the lower Sort of People is another great Cause of Thefts and Robberies as they are thereby tempted to spend their small Substance in riotous Pleasures, and in consequence are put on unlawful Methods of supplying their Wants and renewing their Pleasures: In order, therefore, to prevent the said Temptation to Thefts and Robberies, and to correct as far as may be the Habit of Idleness which is become too general over the whole Kingdom, and is productive of much Mischief and Inconvenience: Be it enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That from and after the First Day of December One thousand seven hundred and fifty-two any House, Room, Garden, or other Place kept for public Dancing, Music, or other public Entertainment of the like Kind, in the Cities of London and Westminster, or within Twenty Miles thereof, without a Licence had for that Purpose from the last preceding Michaelmas Quarter Sessions of the Peace to be holden for the County, City, Riding, Liberty, or Division in which such House, Room, Garden, or other Place is situate (who are hereby authorized and empowered to grant such Licences as they in their Discretion shall think proper), signified under the Hands and Seals of Four or more of the Justices there assembled, shall be deemed a disorderly House or Place; and every such Licence shall be signed and sealed by the said Justices in open Court, and afterwards be publicly read by the Clerk of the Peace, together with the Names of the Justices subscribing the same; and no such Licence shall be granted at any adjourned Sessions, nor shall any fee or reward be taken for any such Licence; and it shall and may be lawful to and for any Constable or other Person, being thereunto authorised by Warrant under the Hand and Seal of One or more of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace of the County, City, Riding, Division, or Liberty where such House or Place shall be situate, to enter such House or Place, and to seize every Person who shall be found therein, in order that they may be dealt with according to Law; and every Person keeping such House, Room, Garden, or other Place, without such Licence as aforesaid, shall forfeit the Sum of One hundreds Pounds to such Person as will sue for the same, and be otherwise punishable as the Law directs in Cases of disorderly Houses.

Constables may enter and seize all Persons found therein.

Person keeping the same to forfeit 100 l.

Licensed Places to have an Inscription over them; and not to be opened before Five in the Evening.

III. Provided always, and it is hereby further enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That, in order to give public Notice what Places are licensed pursuant to this Act, there shall be affixed and kept up in some notorious Place over the Door or Entrance of every such House, Room, Garden, or other Place kept for any of the said purposes, and so licensed as aforesaid, an Inscription in large Capital Letters in the Words following; videlicet, LICENSED PURSUANT TO ACT OF PARLIAMENT OF THE TWENTY-FIFTH OF KING GEORGE THE SECOND; and that no such House, Room, Garden, or other Place, kept for any of the said Purposes, although licensed as aforesaid, shall be open to any of the said Purposes before the Hour of Five in the Afternoon; and that the affixing and keeping of such Inscription as aforesaid, and the said Limitation or Restriction in point of Time, shall be inserted and made Conditions of every such Licence; and in case of any Breach of either of the said Conditions such Licence shall be forfeited, and shall be revoked by the Justices of Peace in their next General or Quarter Sessions, and shall not be renewed, nor shall any new Licence be granted to the same Person or Persons, or any other Person on his or their or any of their Behalf, or for their Use or Benefit, directly or indirectly, for keeping any such House, Room, Garden, or other Place for any of the Purposes aforesaid.

On Breach of either of the said Conditions the Licence to be revoked.

The Theatres and other Places licensed by the Crown or Lord Chamberlain excepted out of this Act.

IV. Provided always, That nothing in this Act contained shall extend or be construed to extend to the Theatres Royal in Drury Lane and Covent Garden, or the Theatre commonly called the King's Theatre, in the Haymarket, or any of them, nor to such Performances and public Entertainments as are or shall be lawfully exercised and carried on under or by virtue of Letter Patents, or Licence of the Crown, or the Licence of the Lord Chamberlain of His Majesty's Household, anything herein contained notwithstanding.

Constable's Duty upon Notice given him of Persons keeping a Bawdy House, Gaming House, or other disorderly Houses, &c.

V. And in order to encourage Prosecutions against Persons keeping Bawdy Houses, Gaming Houses, or other disorderly Houses, be it enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That if any Two Inhabitants of any Parish or Place, paying Scot and bearing Lot therein, do give Notice in Writing to any Constable (or other Peace Officer of the like Nature, where there is no Constable), of such Parish or Place of any Person keeping a Bawdy House, Gaming House, or other disorderly House in such Parish or Place, the Constable, or such Officer as aforesaid so receiving such Notice, shall forthwith go with such Inhabitants to One of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace of the County, City, Riding, Division, or Liberty in which such Parish or Place does lie, and shall upon such Inhabitants making Oath before such Justice that they do believe the Contents of such Notice to be true, and entering into a Recognizance in the penal Sum of Twenty Pounds each to give or produce material Evidence against such Person for such Offence, enter into a Recognizance in the penal Sum of Thirty Pounds to prosecute with Effect such Person for such Offence at the next General or Quarter Session of the Peace, or at the next Assizes to be holden for the County in which such Parish or Place does lie, as to the said Justices shall seem meet; and such Constable or other Officer shall be allowed all the reasonable Expenses of such Prosecution, to be ascertained by any Two Justices of the Peace

The Charges of Prosecution, and 10 l. on Conviction,

Peace of the County, City, Riding, Division, or Liberty where the Offence shall have been committed, and shall be paid the same by the Overseers of the Poor of such Parish or Place; and in case such Person shall be convicted of such Offence the Overseers of the Poor of such Parish or Place shall forthwith pay the Sum of Ten Pounds to each of such Inhabitants; and in case such Overseer shall neglect or refuse to pay to such Constable or other Officer such Expenses of the Prosecution as aforesaid, or shall neglect or refuse to pay, upon Demand, the said Sums of Ten Pounds, and Ten Pounds, such Overseers, and each of them, shall forfeit to the Person entitled to the same double the sum so refused or neglected to be paid.

to each of the Two Inhabitants, to be paid by the Overseers, on Penalty of forfeiting double the Sum.

VI. Provided always, and be it enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That upon such Constable or other Officer entering into such Recognisance to prosecute as aforesaid, the said Justice of the Peace shall forthwith make out his Warrant to bring the Person so accused of keeping a Bawdy House, Gaming House, or other disorderly House before him, and shall bind him or her over to appear at such General or Quarter Sessions or Assizes, there to answer to such Bill of Indictment as shall be found against him or her for such Offence; and such Justice shall and may, if in his Discretion he thinks fit, likewise demand and take Security for such Person's good Behaviour in the meantime, and until such Indictment shall be found, heard, and determined, or be returned by the Grand Jury not to be a true Bill.

Persons keeping such Bawdy House, &c., to be bound over to appear to answer the Indictment.

VII. Provided also, That in case such Constable shall neglect or refuse, upon such Notice, to go before any Justice of the Peace, or to enter into such Recognizance, or shall be wilfully negligent in carrying on the said Prosecution, he shall for every such Offence forfeit the Sum of Twenty Pounds to each of such Inhabitants so giving Notice as aforesaid.

Constable neglecting his Duty forfeits 20 l.

VIII. And whereas, by reason of the many subtle and crafty Contrivances of Persons keeping Bawdy Houses, Gaming Houses, or other disorderly Houses, it is difficult to prove who is the real Owner or Keeper thereof, by which Means many notorious Offenders have escaped Punishment: Be it enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That any Person who shall at any Time hereafter appear, act, or behave him or herself as Master or Mistress, or as the Person having the Care, Government, or Management of any Bawdy House, Gaming House, or other disorderly House, shall be deemed and taken to be the Keeper thereof, and shall be liable to be prosecuted and punished as such, notwithstanding he or she shall not in fact be the real Owner or Keeper thereof.

Who shall be deemed the Keeper of such Bawdy House, &c.

IX. Provided nevertheless, That upon any such Prosecution against any Person for keeping a Bawdy House, Gaming House, or other disorderly House, any Person may give Evidence against the Defendant, or on behalf of the Defendant, in such Prosecution, notwithstanding his or her being an Inhabitant or Parishioner of the said Parish or Place, or having entered into such Recognizance as aforesaid.

Evidence may be given for or against the Defendant, by an Inhabitant, &c.

X. And be it further enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That no Indictment shall at any Time after the said First Day of June be preferred against any Person for keeping a Bawdy House, Gaming House, or other disorderly House, shall be removed by any Writ of Certiorari into any other Court, but such Indictment shall be heard, tried, and finally determined at the same General or Quarter Session or Assizes where such Indictment shall have been preferred (unless the Court shall think proper, upon Cause shown, to adjourn the same), any such Writ or Allowance thereof notwithstanding.

Indictment not removable by Certiorari into any other Court.

XI. And whereas many Persons are deterred from prosecuting Persons guilty of Felony upon account of the Expense attending such Prosecutions, which is another great Cause and Encouragement of Thefts and Robberies: In order, therefore, to encourage the bringing Offenders to Justice, be it enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That it shall and may be in the Power of the Court before whom any Person has been tried and convicted of any Grand or Petit Larceny or other Felony, at the Prayer of the Prosecutor, and on consideration of his Circumstances, to order the Treasurer of the County in which the Offence shall have been committed to pay unto such Prosecutor such Sum of Money as to the said Court shall seem reasonable, not exceeding the Expenses which it shall appear to the Court the Psosecutor was put unto in carrying on such Prosecution, making him a reasonable Allowance for his Time and Trouble therein; which Order the Clerk of Assize or Clerk of the Peace respectively is hereby directed and required forthwith to make out and to deliver unto such Prosecutor, upon being paid for the same the Sum of One Shilling, and no more; and the Treasurer of the County is hereby authorised and required, upon Sight of such Order, forthwith to pay to such Prosecutor or other Person authorised to receive the same, such Sum of Money as aforesaid, and shall be allowed the same in his Accounts.

In Prosecutions for Felony, Court may make Orders for Payment of the Prosecutor's Expenses.

Clerk's Fee for such Order.

County Treasurer to pay the Order on Sight.

XII. And for the better discovering and bringing to Justice Thieves, Robbers, and other Persons maintaining themselves by pilfering and defrauding Mankind, be it enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That it shall and may be lawful to and for any Two or more of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in any County, City, or Liberty, in case any Person apprehended, upon any general privy Search, or by virtue of any special Warrant, shall be charged before them with being a Rogue and Vagabond, or an idle and disorderly Person, or with Suspicion of Felony (although no direct Proof be then made thereof), to examine such Person upon Oath, not only as to the Parish or Place where he was last legally settled, but also as to his Means of Livelihood, the Substance of which the Examination to be signed, and transmitted to the Quarter Sessions.

Justices may examine on Oath Rogues, Vagabonds, and other disorderly Persons brought before them:

Person not giving a satisfactory Account of himself, &c., to be committed; and an Advertisement to be published, describing his Person, and the Things found on him.

Examination shall be put into Writing, and be subscribed or signed by the Person so examined, and the said Justices shall likewise sign the same, and transmit it to the next General or Quarter Sessions of the Peace to be holden for the same County, City, or Liberty, there to be filed and to be kept on Record, and if such Person shall not make it appear to such Justices that he has a lawful Way of getting his Livelihood, or shall not procure some responsible Housekeeper to appear to his Character, and to give Security for his Appearance before such Justice at some other Day to be fixed for that Purpose (in case the same shall be required), to commit such Person to some Prison or House of Correction for any Time not exceeding Six Days, and in the meantime to order the Overseers of the Poor, or One of them, of the Parish or Place in which such Person shall be apprehended, to insert an Advertisement in some public Paper, describing such suspicious Person, and any Thing or Things which shall have been found upon him or in his Custody, and which he shall be suspected not to have come honestly by, and mentioning the Place to which such Person is committed, and specifying the Time and Place when and where such Person is to be again brought before them to be re-examined, and if no Accusation shall be then laid against him, then such Person shall be discharged, or otherwise dealt with according to Law.

Recovery of Forfeitures.

XIII. And be it further enacted by the Authority aforesaid, that any Person entitled to any of the Forfeitures by this Act imposed may sue for the same by Action of Debt in any of His Majesty's Courts of Record at Westminster, in which it shall be sufficient to declare that the Defendant is indebted to the Plaintiff in the sum of being forfeited by an Act, intituled An Act for the better preventing Thefts and Robberies, and for regulating Places of public Entertainment, and punishing Persons keeping disorderly Houses; and the Plaintiff, if he recover in any such Action, shall have his full Costs.

Full Costs.

Limitation of Actions.

XIV. Provided, That no Action shall be brought by virtue of this Act unless the same shall be commenced within the Space of Six Calendar Months after the Offence committed.

Act to be in force for Three Years.

XV. And be it further enacted, by the Authority aforesaid, That this Act shall continue in force until the Expiration of Three Years, to be computed from the First Day of this Session of Parliament, and from thence to the End of the then next Session of Parliament, and no longer.

LETTER to Mr. Parkinson declining a License for the ROTUNDA.

Sir, 9 May 1844.

I HAVE received and fully considered your application for a license for the performance of stage plays at the Rotunda, near Blackfriars Bridge, in the borough of Southwark, and all the papers from you in support of that application; and I have received from the rector, churchwardens and overseers of Christchurch, Surrey, the parish in which the Rotunda is situate, the expression of their decided opinion that such a license is not only wholly unnecessary, but highly objectionable; an opinion, which, upon further reference to them, it is stated they have arrived at after mature deliberation, and after having fully considered the improper purposes to which the Rotunda has been so long applied. Having also come to the conclusion, from the best information which I have been able to collect, that the wishes of a large number of the most respectable residents, inhabitants of the district, are in opposition to the prayer of the petition, and as it is not shown that any public necessity exists for such a grant, there being already three licensed theatres within a short distance from the Rotunda, I beg to acquaint you, that with every wish to deal with the question upon its utmost merits, it does not appear to me that I should be justified in complying with your request.

I am, &c.

These are, therefore, to require you to swear and admit William Bodham Donne, Esq., into the place and quality of an Examiner of all and every the above recited plays, tragedies, comedies, operas, farces, interludes, or other entertainment of the stage of what denomination soever, in the room of John Mitchell Kemble, deceased;

Authority as Inspector of Theatres.

"The Lord Chamberlain in order to insure greater efficiency in the Office of Examiner of Plays, has desired it to be communicated to that officer, and to be registered in the books of the Lord Chamberlain's Office.—1st. That the Reader of Plays shall reside in London for the greater facility of communication with the Lord Chamberlain, and with the managers of theatres, as well as for the general efficient performance of his duties; and that he shall attend at the Lord Chamberlain's Office at least once a week to examine the Play Bills of all the Metropolitan Theatres, so as to satisfy himself that no theatrical pieces are announced contrary to the Lord Chamberlain's decision. 2d. That the Reader shall attend personally at Theatres or Saloons in any case when important alterations have been made in Plays submitted to the Lord Chamberlain for license, or whenever any report has been made of impropriety either in a drama itself, or the mode of placing it on the stage; it being the opinion of the Lord Chamberlain that the duty of Examiner is not only to read plays submitted for license and advise him thereon, but that he is responsible to him for seeing that the play when acted corresponds in every respect with the play as licensed by the Lord Chamberlain. 3d. That as the Lord Chamberlain's attention has been directed during the last few years to the improvement of the theatres, especially as regards a proper space being afforded to the public, not only in the boxes, but more particularly in the pit and the galleries, with a view of insuring by such arrangements increased comfort, order, and decency, and also as regards a more perfect system of lighting and ventilation, security from fire, and an easy ingress and egress in the case of a sudden panic, he wishes the attention of the Reader of the Plays to be particularly directed to these points, and to consider it his duty (with the assistance of a professional surveyor), annually, or, should it be deemed necessary, more frequently, to report to the Lord Chamberlain the state of progress which is made in these respects, and to offer any suggestions which may advance the objects the Lord Chamberlain has in view.

By order of the Lord Chamberlain,

2. Not only all Theatres and other places for scenic representations, but also all places at which any stage dancing, whether "ballet d'action," or "ballet divertissement," (see Wigan v. Strange, 1 Law Reports, Common Pleas), takes place to be licensed solely by the Lord Chamberlain.
3. The justices to be empowered to grant Licenses either for music only, or for music and dancing, but such dancing to be that of the public and not of performers.
4. No place to be licensed for dancing (except under a special temporary License) unless rated at not less than 200 l. a year.
5. No place licensed either for music, or for music and dancing, to be open for any such purpose between midnight and 6 a.m., or on Sundays, &c.
6. Justices to be empowered to grant special temporary License to any place, either for music, or music and dancing, in the same manner as now provided as to a temporary License for the sale of exciseable liquors.
7. Places licensed for music, or for music and dancing, to be subject to like visitation and inspection of police, as houses licensed for sale of exciseable liquors, and all offences to be dealt with in like manner, but the penalties should be more heavy. No penalties by qui tam actions.
8. Licenses to be granted to the holder of the place of entertainment, and not for the user of the place without regard to the holder.
9. Any License for music, or for music and dancing, to be transferred at Petty Sessions, as in the case of Licenses for sale of exciseable liquors.
10. A fee of 10 s. to be paid on the grant of a License, and a fee of 5 s. on a transfer.

PUBLIC MUSIC and DANCING LICENSES under 25 Geo. 2, c. 36.

The statute empowering justices to grant music and dancing licenses is the 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, and owes its origin to a pamphlet published by the celebrated Henry Fielding, entitled, "An Enquiry into the Causes of the late Increase of Robbers, &c.," which he attributes to the increased luxury of the higher classes, and the attempts to imitate them by the classes. But while (says our author) I am recommending some restraint of this luxury, namely, public entertainments, I would be understood to aim at the retrenchment only, not at the extirpation of diversion. Throughout this pamphlet the object is to curtail the amusements of the working classes, which it must be admitted participated largely in the barbarous and debauching character of the age. A few advertisements of the day will abundantly prove.

The Act is entitled "An Act for the better preventing Thefts and Robberies, and for regulating Places of Public Entertainments, and punishing Persons keeping Disorderly Houses."

The first clause recites, "that the advertising a reward with no questions asked, for the return of things which have been lost or stolen, is one great cause and encouragement of thefts and robberies," and prohibits under pains and penalties the issuing such advertisements.

The second section then proceeds to recite, "that the multitude of places of entertainment for the lowest sort of people is another cause of thefts and robberies, as they are thereby tempted to spend their small substance in riotous pleasures, and in consequence are put on unlawful methods to supply their costs and renew their pleasures," and enacts, "that in order to prevent the said temptation to theft and robbery and to correct, as far as may be by the habit of idleness, which is become too general over the whole kingdom, and is productive of much mischief, and it enacts no house, room, garden, or other place shall be kept for public dancing, music, or other public entertainment of the kind within the city of London or Westminster, or within 20 miles thereof, without a license from the justices assembled at the Michaelmas Quarter Sessions, under a penalty of 100 l., and that all houses or places which shall be so kept or used without such license shall be deemed to be disorderly houses or places, and punished accordingly; and power is given to any constable or other person being thereto authorised by a justice's warrant, to enter into such house or place and seize every person who shall be found therein, to be dealt with according to law." This provision is repealed by Stat. 5 Geo. 4, c. 83. The third section provides, that all persons so licensed shall place an inscription in large capital letters over the entrance of every such house or place, and shall not open such house for any other purpose of the Act before the hour of 5 o'clock in the afternoon, and upon breach of either of these these conditions the license shall be forfeited and not renewed, and that no new license shall ever hereafter be granted to the person so offending. The 4th section exempts from the operation of the Act the two great theatres and the Opera-house, and all such performances and public entertainments as shall be lawfully carried on by virtue of letters-patent or license of the Crown or the Lord Chamberlain. It is almost impossible to take even a cursory view of the morals, habits, amusements, or pursuits of the community at the period when these enactments became law, without arriving at the conclusion that it was framed to meet the requirements of a state of society differing widely in character, circumstances, and conduct from that of the present day. (See Advertisements.)

"We are informed by the 'St. James's Chronicle' of August 1779, that in 1768 two women fought for a new shift valued 2*s.* 6*d.*, in the Spawfields, near Islington. The battle was won by a woman called 'bruising Peg,' who beat her antagonist in a terrible manner.' In the summer of the same year an extraordinary battle was fought in Spawfields by two women against two taylors, for a guinea a head, which was won by the women, who beat the taylors in a severe manner. On Saturday the 28th August 1779, a scene took place in Spawfields, bills had been stuck up and otherwise circulated, that an ox would be roasted whole and been given to the friends of their King and country who were invited to enlist; and that two gold-laced hats should be the reward of the two best cudgel players; that a gown, a shift, and a pair of shoes and stockings, should be run for by four old women; and that 3 lb. of tobacco, three bottles of gin, and a silver-laced hat should be grinned for by three old men, the frightfullest grinner to be the winner. It was no uncommon thing before the passing of this Act to see notices that after dog fighting a man-bull to be drest up with fireworks, and turned loose in the game place; likewise a dog to be drest up with fireworks over him, and turned loose with the bull amongst the men in the ground. Also a bear to be turned loose at the same time, and a cat to be ty'd to the bull's tail."

The powerful body of influential and thinking men who now form the middle classes of society, had then no political existence, whilst the lower classes of society were uneducated, owning few enjoyments but of the most sensual and debasing kind. In those days few of the intellectual pursuits of the present age were unknown. The taste for music (except among the higher classes) was at the lowest ebb; mechanics' institutions and schools of science for tradesman and artisan were unknown. Then our goals were schools of vice and profligacy, whilst our municipal regulations were disgracefully defective, and the poor neglected. Until a few years before the passing of the Act in question, no license was required for the sale of spirituous liquors, which were even carried about in wheelbarrows, and retailed openly in sheds and stalls in the public streets; men used to parade the streets with boards at their backs, notifying where individuals might be drunk for a penny, and have clean straw to lie upon. Such was the character of the age when the law first came into operation, and notwithstanding the increased civilization continues the law at the present time. Such is its exactments, that if the trustees of Exeter Hall should permit the oratorio of the Messiah to be once performed in their splendid building before five o'clock in the afternoon, their license would be forfeited, and the Hall must be for ever closed as a place of public amusement; the same may be said of the Hanover Square and Willis' Rooms, and all similar establishments within 20 miles of the metropolis. What effect the Act had in curtailing the number of places for public music and dancing, it is not easy to determine, but it had little or no effect on the more degrading and brutalising amusement of the lower classes. The cock-pit, badger and dog fighting, continued for many years a favourite amusement.

The number of applications for music and dancing were but few. The number of licensed places for the first 40 years were, Sadlers Wells, Ranelagh (discontinued in 1805), the Mary-le-bone Tea-gardens (discontinued in 1774), the Bell, Edmonton (discontinued in 1781), the Angel, its rival (discontinued in 1802), Hamstead Long Rooms (discontinued 1796), and the King's Head, Enfield, which continues licensed to the present time. In the year 1790, the Festino, or ancient concert-room, Hanover Square, obtained a license, which was discontinued in 1805. In 1798 White Conduit House and Bagnigge Wells obtained licenses, and the Islington Spa, or New Tonbridge Wells, now the site of the Spa Fields Chapel. During the whole of this half century we find instances of 12 rejections only, namely, Bagnigge Wells, in 1772, the Castle Inn, Sunbury, in 1773, the Amphitheatrical Building, St. Pancras, and Astley's Royal Tent, Whitechapel; as also, White Conduit House, in 1785, the Amphitheatre, Mulberry Gardens, Mile End, in 1788, the Lyceum Theatre, in 1795, the Rooms, Rolls Building, in 1797, the Adam and Eve Tea-gardens, in 1798, and the Shepherd and Shepherdess, City-road, and the Hoxton-square Tea-gardens, 1799. It is unnecessary to follow in detail the number of licenses granted or refused. Since the formation of the Sacred Harmonic Society, and the unrivalled concerts which they have given at Exeter Hall and the Crystal Palace, a general desire for musical entertainments has manifested itself in all classes of society. It was not, however, deemed to be in accordance with the Licensing Act to grant licenses either for music or dancing separately, although the justices were desirous of doing so. In 1834 a case was laid before Lord Campbell, upon this point, and it was his opinion that a license could not be given for music only, but that every license must follow the words of the statute, and include public dancing, music, and other public entertainments of the like kind. The justices, therefore, continued to grant licenses as heretofore till 1851, when the following case and opinion was taken, and has been since acted upon. The following are the number of licenses granted before this opinion was taken, and since:—

The number of licenses granted in—

1845.	For music and dancing (the license for music only was not granted until 1851) - -	67
1855.	For music only - - -	255
	For music and dancing - -	50
1865.	For music only - - -	291
	For music and dancing - -	60

The following are the orders and regulations of the Court of Quarter Sessions relating to these licenses:—

CASE and OPINION referred to above.

CASE.

Exparte the Justices of the Peace for Middlesex.

By the statute of 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, s. 2, intituled

intituled "An Act for the better preventing Thefts and Robberies, and for regulating Places of Public Entertainment, and punishing Persons keeping Disorderly Houses," it is declared and enacted as follows:—

"And whereas the multitude of places of entertainment for the lower sort of people is another great cause of thefts and robberies, as they are thereby tempted to spend their small substance in riotous pleasures, and in consequence are put on unlawful methods of supplying their wants and renewing their pleasures; in order, therefore, to prevent the said temptation to thefts and robberies, and to correct as far as may be the habit of idleness which is become too general over the whole kingdom, and is productive of much mischief and inconvenience, be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, that from and after the 1st day of December 1752, any house, room, garden, or other place kept for public dancing, music, or other public entertainment of the like kind, in the Cities of London and Westminster, or within 20 miles thereof, without a license had for that purpose from the last preceding Michaelmas quarter sessions of the peace, to be holden for the county, city, riding, liberty, or division in which such house, room, garden, or other place is situate (who are hereby authorised and empowered to grant such licenses as they in their discretion shall think proper) signified under the hands and seals of four or more of the justices there assembled, shall be deemed a disorderly house or place, and every such license shall be signed and sealed by the said justices in open court, and afterwards be publicly read by the clerk of the peace, together with the names of the justices subscribing the same, and no such license shall be granted at any adjourned sessions, nor shall any fee or reward be taken for any such license; and it shall and may be lawful to and for any constable or other person, being thereunto authorised by warrant under the hand and seal of one or more of his Majesty's justices of the peace of the county, city, riding, division, or liberty where such house or place shall be situate, to enter such house or place, and to seize every person who shall be found therein, in order that they be dealt with according to law; and every person keeping such house, room, garden, or other place, without such license as aforesaid, shall forfeit the sum of 100 l. to such person as will sue for the same, and be otherwise punishable as the law directs in cases of disorderly houses."

Hitherto it has been customary for the justices of the peace for Middlesex to grant licenses for "public dancing, music, or other public entertainment of the like kind," adopting all the words of the statute, and under colour of those licenses, the persons licensed have given scenic representations.

By the Act of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68, s. 2, intituled "An Act for regulating Theatres," it is enacted that, except as to licenses then in force, "it shall not be lawful for any person to have or keep any house, or other place of public resort in Great Britain, for the public performance of stage plays, without authority, by virtue of letters patent from Her Majesty, Her heirs and successors, or predecessors, or without license from the Lord Chamberlain of Her Majesty's household for the time being, or from the justices of the peace as* thereinafter provided; and every person who shall offend against this enactment, shall be liable to forfeit" a specified penalty.

By section 22, it is enacted, "That in this Act the word stage play shall be taken to include every tragedy, comedy, farce, opera, burletta, interlude, melodrama, pantomime, or other entertainment of the stage, or any part thereof.

On the subject of the licenses granted under the Act of 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, Mr. Serjeant Adams, the Assistant Judge of the Middlesex Sessions, addressed a letter to the Middlesex Justices in February 1850, of which a print is herewith left. In a note to page 19, he seems to think that, so far as relates to "other public entertainment of the like kind," the Act of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68, has superseded the power of the Justices to grant licenses in London and Westminster, or within 20 miles thereof.

By the statute 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 1, it is enacted, that all provisions theretofore made relative to idle and disorderly persons, rogues, or other vagrants in England, shall be and the same are thereby repealed, except as thereinafter excepted.

The Middlesex Justices are desirous of being advised—

1st. Whether the Middlesex Justices are at liberty to grant licenses under the 25 Geo. 2, for any one sort of entertainment of the nature specified or referred to in that Act, exclusively of all others, viz., for "public dancing and music," or "public music" only, or whether the Justices' powers are confined to the grant of licenses for "public dancing, music, or other public entertainment of the like kind," collectively?

2dly. Whether the statute 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68, does or not indirectly repeal the statute 25 Geo. 2, c. 37, so far as relates to "other public entertainment of the like kind," and whether persons who, under colour of the licenses granted under the 25 Geo. 2, suffer scenic representations to be performed in their houses, are not liable to the penalty given by the 6 & 7 Vict.

3dly. Whether the enactment of the 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, referred to in the case, takes away the power given to Justices of the Peace by the 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, s. 2, to issue their warrants to constables to enter the houses or places therein mentioned (and which, by the last-mentioned Act, are to be deemed disorderly houses or places) and to seize the persons found therein?

Opinion.

1. We are of opinion that the Middlesex Justices are not compelled to grant licenses for "public dancing, music, or other public entertainment of the like kind," collectively, but that they may, at their discretion, grant the license for music only, or for dancing only, or for music and dancing; nor can we entertain any doubt upon this point when we observe the words of the Act to be in the disjunctive, which seems to leave no ground for any other construction.

2. We should have thought, if the question had been open to us, that the 25 Geo. 2 did not apply to scenic representations at all, but the words "other public entertainment of the like kind," have been so long treated or acted upon as including scenic representations, that we are precluded from expressing our own independent opinion opinion upon the point, and are compelled to accept the interpretation which has been put upon them, and from which it necessarily follows that the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68, does indirectly repeal this portion of the 25 Geo. 2, and that parties would be liable to the penalties of the latter Act, for suffering scenic representations to be performed in their houses.

* N.B.—Section 5 authorises Justices in special session beyond the limits of the Lord Chamberlain's authority to grant licenses for these purposes.

3. We are of opinion that the 5 Geo. 4 does not repeal the 25 Geo. 2, as to the power given in the last-named statute for the Justices to issue their warrants to constables to enter disorderly houses. We find some difficulty in understanding what the Act intended should be done with the persons, not the keepers of the houses, who may be seized "in order that they may be dealt with according to law." Provision is made for punishing the keepers of disorderly houses, but nothing is said as to how the persons are to be dealt with who are found in them.

The Court has expressed a strong opinion of the impropriety of keeping open on Sundays the saloon and other parts of the premises used for public amusements, and that such practice should be discontinued, and the house used on Sundays only as a common tavern, if licensed as such.

The within license is granted by authority of the Act of the 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, intituled "An Act for the better preventing Thefts and Robberies, and for regulating places of Public Entertainment, and punishing Persons keeping Disorderly Houses;" the second section of which Act directs that no fee or reward shall be taken for the license.

Appendix, No. 3.

PAPERS handed in by Mr. Frederick Stanley.

App. No. 3.

STATEMENT of Mr. Frederick Stanley, of No. 19, Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, Solicitor, on behalf of the London Music Hall Proprietors' Protection Association.

I HAVE had considerable experience, during a period of about 17 years, in the management of music halls, having been connected with the "Canterbury Hall" from the time it was first opened.

I subsequently, in 1860, became one of the proprietors of the "Canterbury Hall," in partnership with Mr. Charles Morton, the originator of the present system of music halls. We shortly afterwards built "The Oxford," in Oxford-street, and carried on the business of both establishments until March 1863, when I was desirous of resuming my profession. I then sold my interest to Mr. Morton, who became sole proprietor of both establishments.

My experience is confined to London.

In consequence of a Bill having been brought into Parliament in 1860, at the instigation of the theatrical managers, for the purpose of extending the definition of "stage plays," in the Act 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68, a protection society was formed by the music hall proprietors, of which society I was appointed chairman, and so acted until my retirement from the business. I was then appointed solicitor to the society. I have therefore had opportunities of observing how the music halls of London have been conducted.

Upon the present question, I represent nearly all the proprietors of the principal music halls in London, who are members of the society, and am well acquainted with their views upon the present question.

Origin of music halls.

The first "Canterbury Hall," which was the first music hall in London, was opened by Mr. Morton about 17 or 18 years ago. Prior to the hall being built, the house was an ordinary public-house called the "Canterbury Arms," situate in a narrow, unfrequented street in the Westminster-road.

At this period many publicans were in the habit of holding singing meetings, generally about once a week; these meetings were attended by tradesmen and mechanics, who amused themselves by singing. This kind of singing-room was known as a "Free-and-easy."

Mr. Morton opened a singing-room in the "Canterbury Arms." The room was capable of holding about 100 persons; it was opened once a week, from about seven until twelve o'clock, and was visited by respectable tradesmen and mechanics. Subsequently it was opened twice a week. At first professional singers were not engaged, but afterwards two or three were engaged, and subsequently a larger number.

The visitors continually urged Mr. Morton to open the room upon one evening each week, and admit their wives. This he did, and the place soon obtained a good reputation; and visitors came, with their wives and friends, from long distances.

Mr. Morton soon found his room was not large enough. He then obtained some ground at the back of the premises, and built a handsome hall, capable of holding about 400 or 500 persons, and having succeeded in getting a licence from the magistrates, he opened it as a concert-room. The entertainment was by professional singers from a platform, and consisted of glees, madrigals, choruses, songs, and comic songs.

This was the first "Canterbury Hall," and was opened about 17 or 18 years ago.

The visitors were tradesmen, mechanics, their wives and families. Children were not admitted, and it was a rule that all visitors should be properly attired.

A small price for admission was charged.

Women of a certain class did not visit the place.

Attempts to raise the character of music halls.

A musical conductor was engaged, and the glees, choruses, &c., were rehearsed, and afterwards performed before the public in a manner which soon gained for the place a widely-spread reputation. The hall very soon became crowded every night. On Monday and Saturday evenings hundreds of persons were in the habit of waiting for the opening of the doors, and in consequence I have seen the street almost impassable.

This went on for a few years, when Mr. Morton, finding he had not room for his visitors, built the present "Canterbury Hall," which has been open for about 12 years. It is capable of holding nearly 2,000 persons.

Before

Before the first hall was opened, I should think a large number of the visitors had never heard a glee or chorus properly sung; but it soon became evident that the entertainment had created a taste for music.

Mr. Morton then engaged a gentleman of talent as a musical director, and a staff of operatic singers, and selections from some of the best operas were produced. These selections have from that period to the present time formed the leading part of the entertainment offered by Mr. Morton to the public.

As Mr. Morton progressed in the character of his entertainment, so did his visitors improve. I cannot say in respectability; but judging from their apparent station in life.

It has always been the steady aim of Mr. Morton to raise the character of his establishment, and with this view he added a handsome picture gallery to the "Canterbury Hall," at a cost of about 8,000 l. He purchased first-class pictures at a cost of nearly 10,000 l., which were always open to the view of the public.

The total cost of the hall, picture gallery, and pictures, must have amounted to at least 40,000 l.

In order to induce first-class vocalists to sing at music halls, Mr. Morton offered Mr. Sims Reeves 1,200 l. for a month, to sing once each evening.

The next hall was opened by Mr. Weston, in Holborn, and afterwards music halls were opened in various parts of London. There are now about 23 places of entertainment which may be designated as music halls.

Low singing-rooms have ceased to exist since the establishment of music halls.

During the early portion of the period I have alluded to, there were many singing rooms at the west end of London where professional singers were engaged. These rooms were not opened until late at night, or if opened, were not attened by visitors until about the time the theatres closed. They were considered to be supper-rooms, and were only visited by men. The principal or most attractive portion of the entertainment consisted of obscene songs.

Since the establishment of music halls the old established "free-and-easy" concerts at public-houses have ceased to exist. So also have the supper-rooms I have described, and with them the disgusting obscene songs. In the present day I do not think a place exists where an obscene song could be heard, and I do not think they would be tolerated by the public.

Before the establishment of music halls, persons who now frequent them were in the habit of spending their evenings in public-houses. They now take their wives and families with them to music halls.

"The Oxford" and "Canterbury Hall."

"The Oxford," in Oxford-street, was built by Mr. Morton and myself. We opened it in 1861. We expended about 35,000 l. upon it before it was opened.

Attempts to improve the character of the entertainment.

We were very anxious to raise the character and tone of music halls, and with this view we engaged some of the first artistes of the day, including Madame Parepa and Mr. Santley. We offered Mr. Sims Reeves 100 guineas to sing one song, but he was engaged and could not appear. We also offered the latter gentleman his own terms to sing and assist us in the object we had in view. He expressed his willingness to do so, and promised to endeavour to arrange an engagement at a future time.

"The Oxford" and "Canterbury Hall" being then under one management, the operatic selections were always kept as the leading entertainment at both establishments.

During the two years I was interested in the two establishments we paid 24,828 l. for salaries of artistes and professional persons, or at the rate of 12,414 l. per year, or about 238 l. per week. As much as 20 l. and 30 l. per week has been paid for a single performer.

The operatic selections are not produced without a vast amount of trouble and expense. A new selection is usually rehearsed three or four months almost daily before it is produced to the public.

A large portion of the public have become familiar with the music of the great masters, entirely through the selections at the music halls.

Many new operas, composed abroad, have been produced at "The Oxford" for the first time in this country, and have been subsequently produced at the opera houses.

The great feature in music halls, and upon which their success has depended, is the variety of the entertainment, and the limited time allotted to each kind of entertainment. A selection from an opera would last from half an hour to 40 minutes, which would be followed by some comic singing, and other entertainments.

Although there has not been any difficulty in keeping pace with the improving taste of the public in the production of good music, yet there has been immense difficulty in improving the comic element, and the other parts of the general entertainment, owing to the restrictions by the Theatrical Act.

I believe it is impossible to get a comic song written worthy of the present age. Mr. Morton once offered, and paid a premium for the purpose, but it was unsuccessful.

Prosecutions by theatrical managers.

An attempt was made at "Canterbury Hall" during the festive season of Christmas to produce a pantomimic sketch, its chief object being to show the talent of two persons in representing the various characters usually seen in a Christmas pantomime, and the rapidity with which the change of dress was accomplished; they represented about seventeen characters.

No suggestion was made that there was the slightest impropriety in the performance, but the theatrical managers combined, and the performance was attacked by a summons before a police magistrate upon the ground that it was a stage play; after much discussion and evidence, a fine of 5 l. was inflicted.

The theatrical managers openly announced their intention of taking proceedings against music hall proprietors, if they brought themselves within the operation of the Stage Play Act; they even contended that a comic duet or a comic song, if in character, was an infringement of the law.

The music hall proprietors have frequently urged the theatrical managers to come to an agreement upon the question, by defining the line, the music hall proprietors disclaiming all idea of performing legitimate stage plays; and ultimately the theatrical managers were induced to meet the music hall proprietors at the Adelphi Theatre, but after a long discussion, the meeting ended in the theatrical managers declaring they did not require any alteration in the law.

Subsequently a general attack was made upon the music halls, and several of the proprietors were fined for performing stage plays. One proprietor was fined for permitting two persons to burlesque "Mazeppa," with the aid of an imitation horse made of basket-work. I believe there was no scenery or other necessaries of a theatre.

The next objectionable performance was the introduction of the celebrated scientific optical illusion, known as the "Ghost" performance, brought out by Mr. Pepper at the Polytechnic Institution. This entertainment was offered to the public at the "Canterbury Hall," and at Day's "Crystal Palace," Birmingham. Proceedings were taken for both these performances, and fines inflicted.

The last case was that of the ballet at the "Alhambra," which was taken on appeal to the Court of Common Pleas.

None of these proceedings had been originated by the public, or by any public officer, but by the theatrical managers, and their only ground is, that they are entitled to a monopoly in stage plays.

Opinion of the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas.

In the "Alhambra" case it was suggested that the ballet was immoral. The Lord Chief Justice, in his judgment, remarked (see Law Reports, C. P. 182):—"Much has been said by the learned serjeant about the danger to the interests of morality and decency, if an entertainment like this be held to be removed from the control of the Lord Chamberlain. But I cannot perceive that these are at all endangered by the performance here described. The simple question for us to determine is, whether a cheap entertainment of this sort should be allowed to be given in a place licensed by the magistrates, or is to be confined for the future to the theatres licensed by and under the control of the Lord Chamberlain. Those who contend for the latter proposition ought to show something in the shape of a necessity for such a construction of the Acts of Parliament."

It was decided that the ballet in question was not a stage play.

In consequence of the conflict between the music hall proprietors and the theatrical managers, I put myself in communication with the late Sir George Cornewall Lewis, when he was Secretary of State for the Home Department, with the view to an alteration in the law concerning stage plays. Sir George Cornewall Lewis was of opinion that a line should be drawn defining the kind of amusements to be given at music halls, and at his suggestion I prepared a draft Bill, and ultimately submitted it to him. He approved of it, and requested me to get it introduced by a private Member, and he promised me his support.

Copy of this Bill I shall be prepared to hand to the Committee.

The definition of stage plays was fully discussed by all the music hall proprietors in London; and the Bill was the result of their deliberations.

Immediately after the draft Bill was submitted to Sir George Cornewall Lewis, he was transferred to the War Department. Consequently the Bill was never introduced to the House.

The theatrical managers for a time stayed their prosecutions, and the question of stage plays was allowed to drop.

It may be here convenient to state that the music hall proprietors of London do not desire that the right of performance of stage plays should be entirely thrown open. They only desire the right of performance of light pieces, and that the number of performers in a stage play should be limited, say to five or six persons.

Management of music halls.

With reference to the conduct of management of the music halls in London:—

They usually open between seven and eight o'clock in the evening, and close before twelve. The proprietors are, as a rule, in constant attendance at their halls; they constantly walk about, ready to check any impropriety which may by possibility take place.

It is a very rare occurrence that disturbance takes place at a music hall. I believe complaints against the conduct of the public in music halls are almost unknown. At all events the police reports are free from charges connected with music halls.

I have never heard of a complaint by the neighbours of a music hall as to its being a nuisance, or in any way an annoyance to them, and I believe none such have ever been made.

Very few women of a certain class visit "The Oxford" and "Canterbury Hall."

In order to discourage them as much as possible, there is a rule at "The Oxford" and "Canterbury Hall" prohibiting any lady entering the stalls (being the most commodious part of the house), unless accompanied by a gentleman; and women are not allowed to promenade.

The

The opinions of the press have always been complimentary to the proprietors of music halls.

I can refer to extracts from the "Times" and other leading newspapers in support of the statement.

Private rooms.

With reference to the statement which has been given in evidence before the Committee, that there are private rooms in music halls used by the public where immoralities prevail, I can give a most positive denial that there is anything of the kind, or ever has been, at either the "Canterbury Hall" or "The Oxford;" and, with reference to the other music halls, with the conduct of which I have been personally acquainted, I can make the same statement.

I have consulted the proprietors upon the subject, and they most indignantly deny that there is any ground for the suggestion.

There is a canteen behind the stage at the Alhambra, used by Mr. Strange, I believe, for the accommodation of the persons employed by him; but I do not believe any immorality takes place there.

The general body of music hall proprietors do not approve of such places, upon the ground that they might possibly give rise to suggestions that music halls are not properly conducted, and I believe Mr. Strange is the only person who permits any of the public to go behind his stage. At "The Oxford" and "Canterbury" strangers are not permitted behind the stage upon any consideration.

Sale of spirits and refreshments in music halls.

With reference to the sale of spirits and refreshments in music halls:

I believe such of the public who visit music halls in preference to theatres are those who are desirous of obtaining amusement for a limited period; and inasmuch as most of those persons are smokers, they can enjoy their cigar or pipe, as the case may be, and be amused with short entertainments, without the necessity of attending at a fixed time and sitting for some hours throughout a performance, as at a theatre.

The entertainments at music halls are varied, and it is seldom that any single entertainment lasts more than 20 minutes or half an hour, except selections from operas, which may last a little longer.

I believe the enjoyment is derived from the privilege of smoking and the lounge whilst witnessing the performance.

I have made a calculation in order to show the average amount expended in refreshments. The calculation is from my balance-sheets during the two years I was one of the proprietors of "The Oxford," and I find the average amount expended by each person is from 6 d. to 7 d.

During the year ending March 1862, at "The Oxford," the number of persons who paid at the doors was 384,982, and during the following year the number was 428,448, or at the rate of 8,239 per week.

It has been stated in evidence that the system of the music halls is, that persons paying at the doors receive the value of the admission money in drink. This is not the case; there is a distinct price for admission to the performance, and the public are not required or called upon to have any refreshment at all unless they please.

The profit on refreshments is certainly not the primary object of the music halls. At the same time, without the aid of such profit it would be impossible for the music halls to be kept open and give a good entertainment at a cheap rate.

Music-hall proprietors frequently expend more than their receipts for admission in the cost of the entertainments which they produce. They expend a portion of their profits on refreshments, and therefore if the privilege of selling refreshments be taken away, the prices of the entertainment must be considerably higher, or its quality lower, or music halls cannot be carried on at a profit.

System of licensing.

The present system of licensing is bad.

I think the tribunal for granting music and dancing licenses is unsatisfactory. It is composed of a vast number of gentlemen who are appointed magistrates by political influence.

The number of judges is too great; they have no fixed rules for the granting or withholding of music and dancing licenses; it is entirely a matter of discretion, and is decided according to the opinion of the magistrates who happen to be present upon the occasion. Upon another occasion a different decision might be arrived at, so that it is a matter of accident.

Persons who have had their licenses refused, ultimately succeed by continual applications upon the same facts.

Their mode of taking evidence is objectionable, inasmuch as the evidence is not always confined to facts, but matters of opinion are entertained, and irregular discussions take place.

There is no appeal from the October sessions.

There is a good deal of private influence used in matters of licenses.

If one or two magistrates are desirous, in consequence of their opinions, of restricting licenses, there is not the slightest difficulty in their going round to the other magistrates and getting a majority upon a particular occasion.

Upon the application of Mr. Morton and myself for a renewal of a license which had been granted for the ground upon which "The Oxford" is built, I discovered that a great deal of private influence had been brought to bear in support of an opposition to the license, and I found it necessary to take steps to get a very large attendance of magistrates in order to overwhelm any private influence, and upon that occasion there was a very large attendance.

App. No. 3

I have been concerned professionally in applications for and oppositions against music licenses, and I have constantly attended the sessions for the purpose. I have noticed that at times there is a disposition to grant licenses very freely, and at other times the feeling of the Bench has been quite the reverse.

No reasons are given for the decisions arrived at.

A proprietor may be ruined by the extreme opinions of the majority of the magistrates present on any particular occasion.

I remember hearing one case where an application was made for a renewal of a dancing license for a public-house by the widow of a person who had died within the 12 months, and whose husband had carried on the place for a great number of years under the license. A clergyman of the district attended, and made a complaint against the system of dancing in public-houses. A discussion consequently arose between the magistrates, and ultimately the license was lost by a small majority. The applicant had no opportunity of meeting such an opposition, and had no appeal.

Stage plays.

The present law defining stage plays is very objectionable.

It is extremely difficult even for lawyers to ascertain what is a stage play, yet the police have power to enter any place not licensed for stage plays, and take into custody the whole of the audience, if an entertainment be produced which ultimately turns out to be a stage play.

At the "Canterbury Hall" a constable is provided from the police station, and paid for by the proprietor, in order to have some person in authority in case of need.

Mr. Morton applied to have a policeman allotted to him at the "Oxford," but was refused by the police authorities.

Although constables are employed in the way described, it is a very rare occurrence that their services are required. In the case of any slight disturbance on the part of the audience, I have always found a little persuasion remedied the matter. I have never known a serious disturbance at a music hall.

As to Stage Plays.

Suggestions for an amendment of the law.

The restriction on the performance of stage plays should be partially removed.

There is no reason why their performance should be confined to a few theatres, as at present.

The proprietors of the principal music halls in London have fully discussed the subject, and they are of opinion that it would not be prudent at present entirely to remove the restriction, because the music halls are not adapted to the performance of heavy theatrical pieces, and because the public do not require long entertainments.

The public who frequent music halls prefer the comfort of a music hall, where they can enjoy a cigar and a lounge, to the formality of a theatre, where it is necessary to sit still for hours.

The proprietors therefore desire the right to perform small pieces, limiting the number of performers, say to five or six persons—say operas, operettas, pantomimes, burlesques, interludes, farces, ballets, or by whatever name they may be called.

It must be understood that the limitation of number should not apply to the representation of the music in any opera unless accompanied by acting and scenery.

It is desirable that there should be a distinction between theatres and music halls; many persons object to smoking.

It is advisable to proceed by steps; first, the restriction should be partially removed, which will give an opportunity of ascertaining whether it will be advisable to remove the restriction entirely hereafter.

Licensing of Plays or Entertainments.

It is not necessary that these should be licensed before being produced before the public.

Public feeling is against anything immoral or indecent being placed upon a stage; anything of the kind would be hissed off the stage.

Hitherto the proprietors of music halls have not been compelled to submit their entertainments for approval. No complaints had been made of anything immoral or indecent having been produced. I can state from experience that the proprietors have an objection to anything of the kind.

Licensing plays affords no protection.

Ballets and pantomimes cannot be read, although they may tend to immorality.

It would be extremely difficult, almost impossible, for proprietors of music halls to submit their entertainments for approval; they are so numerous.

The entertainment is not determined before the evening commences. The programme is frequently arranged as the performances proceed.

Make the proprietors liable to penalities if anything improper is put upon the stage. This will be sufficient protection.

The proprietors ought to have the privilege of selecting their entertainments; they know best how to please the public.

The suggestion that particular kinds of entertainments should be provided in certain places would not work well.

The public like variety in every establishment.

New Tribunal for Licensing.

It is advisable that a new tribunal should be appointed, for the purpose of granting licenses for music halls and of hearing complaints against the proprietors.

It should be composed of at least two persons, who should be high in authority, inasmuch as the property under their control represents great wealth.

They should have assistants or inspectors to visit the places. These should not be policemen.

It is very undesirable and unfair to the proprietors that the Lord Chamberlain should have control over the music halls.

1st. Because he is an officer attached to, and his principal duties are in connection with, the Royal Family and the nobility, and therefore not acquainted with the habits and requirements of the middle and lower classes.

2d. Because he and his officers, in consequence of their long connection with the theatrical managers, have become strong partisans in the theatrical interest.

Theatres and music halls should not be under the same authority—

Because they are distinct in character, and should be kept so, to suit the different tastes of the public.

If it be desirable that a theatre should be turned into a music hall, let the proprietor make application for a license, and conform to the law. So, also, if it be required to turn a music hall into a theatre.

The new tribunal should sit in open court, at stated intervals, to hear applications and complaints.

All matters should be determined by legal evidence. Parties should have liberty to appear either in person or by attorney or counsel.

There should be leading rules to govern decisions, particularly with regard to applications for beer licenses.

The granting of music licenses should depend upon the requirements of the neighbourhood, it being objectionable to promote too much competition, inasmuch as places of entertainment, if not successful, would degenerate.

The capabilities of the building should be taken into consideration, and particularly the means of ingress and egress.

The character of the applicant should also be considered.

In matters of complaint against proprietors due notice of the complaint should be given by way of summons, in order to give opportunity for defence and for production of evidence.

Upon points of law there should be an appeal to one of the superior courts, but not upon matters of discretion.

Licensing of Places of Entertainment for the Sale of Wines, Spirits, and Refreshments.

The new tribunal should have power to add a license for this purpose to any new license for amusements or entertainment.

It would be unfair and ruinous to the present proprietors to interfere with their existing licenses so long as they conduct their establishments with propriety.

Some of the present music halls have ordinary public-houses attached to them, wherein the ordinary business of a licensed victualler is carried on. These public-houses are quite disconnected from the halls.

It is suggested that the license for the sale of spirits, &c., which will be under the control of the new tribunal, should be confined to sales in the music halls, leaving the public-house license to be dealt with, as at present, by the licensing magistrates.

Police Supervision.

No more police supervision is necessary. This is proved by the evidence of the police magistrates, given before the Committee, of the absence of charges connected with music halls.

The police are not favourites with the public; they are uneducated, and therefore officious when in power.

Their presence is objectionable amongst orderly persons who desire rational amusement.

Their functions should be confined to disorderly persons and criminals.

Their aid would be called in by proprietors if requisite.

2 & 3 Vict. c. 67, s. 46.

6 & 7 Vict. c. 68, s. 2.

Whereas by the Act of the Session holden in the 25th year of the reign of King George the Second, chapter 36, intituled "An Act for the better preventing Thefts and Robberies, and for regulating Places of Public Entertainment, and punishing Persons keeping Disorderly Houses," justices at the Michaelmas Quarter Sessions of the peace are authorised and empowered to grant licenses for any house, room, garden, or other place to be kept for public dancing, music, or other public entertainment of the like kind in the Cities of London and Westminster, or within 20 miles thereof: And whereas by an Act of the session holden in the second and third years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter 47, section 46, provision is made concerning any house or room kept or used within the Metropolitan Police District for stage-plays or dramatic entertainments, into which admission is obtained by payment of money, and which is not a licensed theatre: And whereas by an Act of the session holden in the sixth and seventh years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter 68, section 2, intituled "An Act for regulating Theatres," it is enacted, that (except as in the said Act is mentioned) it shall not be lawful for any person to have or keep any house or other place of public resort in Great Britain for the public performance of stage-plays without authority, by virtue of letters patent from Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, or predecessors, or without license from the Lord Chamberlain of Her Majesty's household for the time being, or from the justices of the peace as thereinafter provided; and every person who shall offend against this enactment shall be liable to forfeit such sum as shall be awarded by the court in which, or the justices by whom, he shall be convicted, not exceeding 20 l. for every day on which such house or place shall have been so kept open by him for the purpose aforesaid without legal authority. And by section 23 of such last mentioned Act it is enacted, "That in this Act the word stage-play shall be taken to include any tragedy, comedy, farce, opera, burletta, interlude, melodrama, pantomime, or other entertainment of the stage, or any part thereof."

And whereas it is expedient that the two last-mentioned Acts should be amended: Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:—

1. The Acts of the second and third year of Her Majesty, chapter 47, and the sixth and seventh year of Her Majesty, chapter 68, shall not be construed to prevent or prohibit any person using or keeping any concert room or public garden for the performance or representation of the music of any opera, operetta, burlesque, or other piece, or for the performance or representation (without acting or change of scene) of the music of any opera, operetta, burlesque, or other piece, or for the performance or representation of dancing on a platform or stage, or for the performance or representation (without change of scene) of any entertainment consisting of dancing, singing, or dialogue, by not more than persons, or for the performance or representation of any negro or Ethiopian entertainment: Provided always, that nothing in this Act shall be construed to render it unnecessary to obtain a license from the said justices pursuant to the the said Act of the 23d year of King George the Second, chapter 26.

The London music halls, concert halls, &c. the earliest of which was built in 1851, and the latest in 1864, have their value very fairly, though roughly, estimated in the above table, from which a number of small tavern concert rooms are excluded. Some halls may be overrated and some underrated in this table: for example, the Alhambra is put down at 50,000*l.*, although it cost 100,000*l.*, because the smaller sum more nearly represents its value, but the totals are tolerably correct for an estimate.

The music halls, concert halls, &c. in the country that have sprung into existence since the passing of the Act of 1843, may be estimated as bearing the same proportion to the country theatres as the London halls do to the London theatres, viz., nearly two to one. The capital invested in them cannot be far short of a million sterling, and they provide nightly accommodation for at least half a million persons.

PAPERS received from the Foreign Office, and laid before the Committee by the Clerk of the Committee.

Décret du 6 Janvier 1864 relatif à la Liberté de l'Industrie Théâtrale.

Rapport à l'Empereur.

Sire, Paris, le 6 Janvier 1864.

Dans la séance solennelle du 5 Novembre dernier, Votre Majesté annonçait Elle-même la suppression prochaine des priviléges auxquels l'exploitation des théâtres était jusqu'à présent assujettie. Accueillie avec joie et reconnaissance par les écrivains et par les artistes, cette mesure va recevoir aujourd'hui son exécution.

Grâce à la généreuse initiative et aux intentions libérales de Votre Majesté, aucune entrave ne s'opposera plus désormais au libre développement d'une industrie dont l'influence sur le mouvement des lettres et des arts peut être si grande et si féconde.

Tandis que les auteurs et les compositeurs vivants pourront trouver partout des débouchés pour leurs productions nouvelles, les chefs-d'œuvre de l'ancien répertoire, affranchis des liens qui les rattachaient exclusivement aux deux premiers Théâtres français, iront, sans déchoir, honorer les scènes populaires et y porter leur utile enseignement. De son côté, le Gouvernement restera en possession du droit de soutenir, en les subventionnant, des établissements de premier ordre, qui seront pour les autres des exemples à suivre et des modèles à égaler.

On peut donc espérer, Sire, que le niveau de l'art ne fera que s'élever sous l'empire de la législation nouvelle, et que le bon goût public se réveillera lui-même en se sentant plus libre.

Le moment est favorable pour faire loyalement une expérience qui n'a jamais eu lieu dans des conditions pareilles. En permettant à la liberté industrielle, littéraire et artistique, de produire tout le bien qu'on doit en attendre, on n'a pas à en craindre les abus et les excès. La société, l'ordre et la morale conservent toutes leurs garanties, et, loin de désarmer l'Administration, le décret nouveau confirme l'autorité protectrice des lois actuellement en vigueur.

J'ai l'honneur, en conséquence, de soumettre à Votre Majesté le projet de décret ci-joint.

Je suis, avec le plus profond respect,
Sire,
De Votre Majesté,
Le très-humble, très-obéissant serviteur et très-fidèle sujet,
Le Maréchal de France,

Ministre de la Maison de l'Empereur et des Beaux-Arts,
Vaillant.

Décret.

À tous présents et à venir, salut.

Vu le décret du 30 Décembre 1852;

Notre Conseil d'État entendu,

Avons décrété et décrétons ce qui suit:

Article 1er. Tout individu peut faire construire et exploiter un théâtre, à la charge de faire une déclaration au ministère de notre Maison et des Beaux-Arts, et à la préfecture de police pour Paris; à la préfecture, dans les départements.

Les théâtres qui paraîtront plus particulièrement dignes d'encouragement pourront être subventionnés, soit par l'État, soit par les communes.

Art. 2. Les entrepreneurs de théâtres devront se conformer aux ordonnances, décrets et règlements pour tout ce qui concerne l'ordre, la sécurité et la salubrité publics.

Continueront d'être exécutées les lois existantes sur la police et la fermeture des théâtres ainsi que sur la redevance établie au profit des pauvres et des hospices.

Art. 3. Toute œuvre dramatique, avant d'être représentée, devra, aux termes du décret du 30 Décembre 1852, être examinée et autorisée par le ministre de notre Maison et des Beaux-Arts, pour les théâtres de Paris; par les préfets, pour les théâtres des départements.

Cette autorisation pourra toujours être retirée pour des motifs d'ordre public.

Art. 4. Les ouvrages dramatiques de tous les genres, y compris les pièces entrées dans le domaine public, pourront être représentés sur tous les théâtres.

Art. 5. Les théâtres d'acteurs-enfants continuent d'être interdits.

Art. 6. Les spectacles de curiosités, de marionnettes, les cafés dits cafés-chantants, cafés-concerts et autres établissements du même genre restent restent soumis aux règlements présentement en vigueur.

Toutefois, ces divers établissements seront désormais affranchis de la redevance établie par l'article 11 de l'ordonnance du 8 Décembre 1824 en faveur des directeurs des départements, et ils n'auront à supporter aucun prélèvement autre que la redevance au profit des pauvres ou des hospices.

Art. 7. Les directeurs actuels des théâtres, autres que les théâtres subventionnés, sont et demeurent affranchis envers l'Administration de toutes les clauses et conditions de leurs cahiers des charges, en tant qu'elles sont contraires au présent décret.

Art. 8. Sont abrogées toutes les dispositions des décrets, ordonnances et règlements antérieures dans ce qu'elles ont de contraire au présent décret.

Art. 9. Le ministre de notre Maison et des Beaux-Arts est chargé de l'exécution du présent décret, qui sera inséré au "Bulletin des Lois," et recevra son exécution à partir du 1er Juillet 1864.

Fait au palais des Tuileries, le 6 Janvier 1864.

Napoleon.

Par l'Empereur :
Le Maréchale de France,

Ministre de la Maison de l'Empereur et des Beaux-Arts,
Vaillant.

Ministère de la Maison de l'Empereur et des Beaux-Arts.—Surintendance Générale des Théâtres.

Palais de Tuileries, le 28 Avril 1864.

Monsieur le Préfet,

Le décret impérial du 6 Janvier dernier, qui supprime les priviléges auxquels l'exploitation des théâtres était assujettie, devant recevoir son exécution à partir du 1er Juillet prochain, je crois utile de vous donner dès à présent quelques explications sur la marche à suivre pour l'application du décret, afin de prévenir toute difficulté d'interprétation, et de vous mettre à même d'éclairer vos administrés sur les droits et les devoirs résultant pour eux du changement de législation.

Aux termes de l'article 1er, tout individu peut construire et exploiter un théâtre, à la charge de faire une déclaration au ministère de la Maison de l'Empereur et des Beaux-Arts et à la préfecture de police pour Paris ; à la préfecture, dans les départements.

Une autorisation ministérielle n'est donc plus nécessaire comme par le passé, et le préfet lui-même n'intervient pas pour autoriser la construction ou l'exploitation d'un théâtre dans son département ; il reçoit la déclaration du constructeur et celle de l'exploitant, et se borne à faire respecter, aux termes de l'article 2, les ordonnances, décrets et règlements pour tout ce qui concerne l'ordre, la sécurité et la salubrité publics.

Vous pouvez, à cet effet, consulter les ordonnances de police concernant les dispositions intérieures et extérieures à prendre pour la construction des théâtres, notamment celle du 9 Juin 1829.

Une fois les salles construites, c'est à leur propriétaire, ou à tout entrepreneur qui s'en rend locataire, que l'exploitation théâtrale appartient, sans autre limite que celle de leur volonté, de leurs intérêts et de leurs droits.

Toute latitude étant donnée à l'industrie théâtrale, l'art. 1er du décret du 6 Janvier réserve à l'État et aux communes le droit de subventionner les théâtres qui paraîtraient plus particulièrement dignes d'encouragement. Pour le moment, Monsieur le Préfet, vos efforts doivent tendre à ce que les subventions existantes ne soient pas retirées et à ce qu'il en soit plutôt accordé de nouvelles, à la veille d'une épreuve qui veut être faite avec loyauté, mais avec prudence. Ainsi, le mouvement des lettres et des arts sera à la fois développé par la concurrence et soutenu par des libéralités utiles.

Si le décret du 6 Janvier supprime les anciens priviléges dans l'intérêt de l'art et de l'industrie, il ne supprime aucune des garanties qui protégeaient la société, l'ordre et la morale ; il les confirme au contraire, et c'est dans ce but que l'art. 3 consacre la législation relative à la censure théâtrale, conformément au décret du 30 Novembre 1852.

Je vous rappelle à ce propos, Monsieur le Préfet, 1°. que c'est à vous qu'il appartient d'examiner et d'autoriser, s'il y a lieu, les pièces nouvelles destinées à être représentées pour la première fois sur un des théâtres de votre département ; 2°. que celles qui ont été interdites à Paris sont par cela même interdites pour toute la France; 3°. que si, parmi celles qui y ont été autorisées, il s'en trouve que vous jugiez ne pouvoir être jouées sans danger dans votre département, vous avez toujours le droit d'en défendre la représentation, en m'en donnant avis. Les formalités ordinaires continueront donc à être observées ; les brochures et les répertoires devront être visés comme d'habitude ; et je vous adresserai, au moins une fois par an, le titre des pièces qui auraient pu être interdites.

Aux termes de l'article 4, les ouvrages dramatiques de tous les genres, y compris les pièces entrées dans le domaine public, pourront être représentés sur tous les théâtres.

Déjà les théâtres des départements jouissaient de cet avantage, et je ne vous rappelle les dispositions de l'art. 4 que pour vous recommander de veiller à ce que les œuvres des maîtres soient exécutées, autant que possible, avec le respect qui leur est dû, et sans que le texte en soit altéré par aucune mutilation.

L'article 5 n'ayant pas besoin de commentaires, il me reste, Monsieur le Préfet, à appeler votre attention sur l'article 6, par lequel les spectacles de curiosités, de marionnettes, les cafés dits cafés-chantants, cafés-concerts et autres établissements du même genre, restent soumis aux règlements présentement en vigueur, mais sont toutefois désormais affranchis de la redevance établie par l'art. 11 de l'ordonnance du 8 Décembre 1824 en faveur des directeurs des départements.

La liberté accordée à l'industrie spéciale des théâtres ne s'étend pas et ne pouvait s'étendre à tous les établissements publics d'un autre ordre, et notamment aux cafés, qui, comme débits de boisson, sont, vous le savez, soumis à des règlements spéciaux. Vous pourrez, quand vous le jugerez convenable, autoriser les propriétaires des cafés à faire exécuter dans leurs établissements toute espèce de musique instrumentale, et chanter toute sorte de morceaux de musique, même de l'ordre le plus élevé, sans toutefois porter atteinte au droit des auteurs sur les ouvrages du répertoire moderne. Ces exécutions instrumentales et vocales cales devront toujours, comme par le passé, avoir lieu sans aucun costume ni travestissement, sans décors et sans mélange de prose, de danses et de pantomimes. Autrement, ce seraient de véritables théâtres, et la distinction établie par les articles 1 et 6 du décret ne serait pas respectée.

Les entrepreneurs de cafés-concerts et de cafés-chantants seraient d'autant moins fondés à se plaindre du maintien de cet état des choses qu'ils ont désormais la liberté de construire et d'exploiter des théâtres, si bon leur semble.

Par spectacles de curiosités et autres établissements du même genre que concerne aussi l'article 6, vous devez entendre les petits spectacles de physique et de magie, les panoramas, dioramas, tirs, feux d'artifice, expositions d'animaux, et tous les spectacles forains et d'exercices équestres qui n'ont ni un emplacement durable, ni une construction solide.

Affranchis de la redevance qu'ils payaient aux directeurs des théâtres, ces établissements n'auront plus à supporter qu'un prélèvement au profit des pauvres ou des hospices. La législation nouvelle sera donc pour eux un grand bienfait et leur condition se trouvera sensiblement améliorée.

Les articles 7, 8 et 9 délient, à partir du 1er Juillet prochain, les directeurs actuels des théâtres, autres que les théâtres subventionnés, de toutes les clauses et conditions de leurs cahiers de charges, et abrogent les dispositions des décrets, ordonnances et règlements dans ce qu'elles ont de contraire au décret du 6 Janvier.

Jusque-là, Monsieur le Préfet, et pendant cette période de temps qui sépare encore le régime des priviléges du régime de la liberté, vous ne pouvez mieux faire que de seconder les combinaisons qui seraient de nature à favoriser le maintien des théâtres qui existent et la construction de ceux qu'on voudrait établir dans de bonnes conditions, sans tenir compte des anciens arrondissements ni des anciens itinéraires, qui, ne répondant plus en rien aux besoins de l'époque, devaient cesser d'exister.

Les directeurs ne seront plus astreints à une règlementation uniforme pour les abonnements, les débuts, le tarif du prix des places et autres questions de détail. Ils pourront prendre, à cet effet, les mesures qu'ils jugeront convenables, et, de son côté, l'autorité locale devra veiller à ce que l'ordre public n'ait pas à en souffrir. App. No. 4.

Si mon autorisation n'est plus nécessaire pour l'exploitation des théâtres, ni pour leur construction, je n'en conserverai pas moins le droit et le besoin d'être mis au courant de tout ce que produira, dans chaque département et dans chaque ville, la libre industrie des théâtres. Vous voudrez donc bien, Monsieur le Préfet, m'informer de la création de chaque nouvelle salle et des changements qui auront lieu dans les diverses exploitations.

J'ai tâché de prévoir les difficultés que pourrait soulever l'application du décret du 6 Janvier dernier, et je me suis efforcé de vous mettre d'avance à même d'y pourvoir. Au besoin et dans le cas où des instructions nouvelles vous deviendraient nécessaires, je serais toujours prêt à vous les adresser. Je me résume aujourd'hui en vous disant que, pour obéir aux prescriptions du décret et répondre aux généreuses intentions de l'Empereur, vous devez chercher avant tout à concilier loyalement les droits nouveaux de l'industrie théâtrale avec les droits éternels de la société, de la morale et des arts.

Je vous prie, Monsieur le Préfet, de m'accuser réception de la présente circulaire, à laquelle je joins le texte du décret du 6 Janvier, ainsi que le rapport qui le précédait et qui en explique la pensée.

Recevez, Monsieur le Préfet, l'assurance de ma considération très-distinguée.

Le Maréchal de France,
Ministre de la Maison de l'Empereur et
des Beaux-Arts,

——.

PREFECTURE DE POLICE.

ORDONNANCE concernant l'Etablissement des Salles de Spectacle; Emplacements; Abords; Mode de construction; Distribution; Aménagement au point de vue des mesures de Sûreté publique; Circulation; Salubrité; Exploitation; Police intérieure et extérieure.

Paris, le 1er Juillet 1864.

NOUS, Préfet de Police,

Vu la loi des 16-24 Août 1790 (titre XI., art. 3, § 5); celle des 19-22 Juillet 1791 (art. 46, § 1er);

Les arrêtés du gouvernement des 1er germinal an vii. 12 Messidor an viii. et 3 Brumaire an ix.; l'arrêté ministériel du 25 Avril 1807; le décret du 30 Décembre 1852; la loi du 10 Juin 1853 (Art. 1er); le décret du 6 Janvier 1864, et la circulaire de Son Excellence le Ministre de la Maison de l'Empereur et des Beaux-Arts, du 28 Avril 1864;

Considérant que le décret du 6 Janvier 1864 supprime les priviléges auxquels l'industrie théâtrale était jusqu'à présent assujettie et confère à toute personne le droit de faire construire et exploiter un théâtre, à la charge d'une déclaration préalable à l'autorité;

Considérant que le décret réserve, outre la censure théâtrale, l'exécution des lois, décrets, ordonnances et règlements de Police de droit commun, et, pour les théâtres subventionnés, celle des clauses et conditions de leurs cahiers des charges envers l'Administration;

Voulant refondre en une seule et même ordonnance les dispositions de l'ancienne réglementation qui intéressent essentiellement la sûreté publique et le bon-ordre et qui sont contenues notamment dans les ordonnances des 9 Juin 1829 et 16 Mars 1857,

App. No. 4.

Ordonnons ce qui suit :

CONSTRUCTION.

Déclaration préalable.

Article premier. Tout individu voulant faire construire et exploiter un théâtre est tenu d'en faire la déclaration préalable au Ministère de la Maison de l'Empereur et des Beaux-Arts ainsi qu'à la Préfecture de Police.

Il sera joint à l'appui les plans détaillés, avec coupes, et l'indication du nombre des places calculé par personne à raison de 0m 80c de profondeur sur 0m 45c de largeur, pour les places en location, et 0m 70c sur 0m 45c, pour les autres places.

Les travaux ne pourront être commencés que sur notre avis formel, après examen du projet.

Sauf les cas de dérogation que nous nous réservons d'admettre, les salles seront établies, construites et distribuées conformément aux prescriptions suivantes :

Mesures d'isolement.

Art. II. L'édifice peut être isolé ou adossé, au choix du constructeur. En cas d'isolement, il sera laissé sur tous les côtés qui ne seront pas bordés par la voie publique un espace libre ou chemin de ronde, qui pourra n'être que de trois mètres de largeur si les maisons voisines n'ont pas de jour sur ledit chemin. Dans le cas contraire, la largeur serait rationnellement augmentée eu égard, notamment, à l'importance et aux dispositions de l'édifice.

En cas d'adossement, il sera construit un contre-mur en briques de 0m 25c, au moins, d'épaisseur, pour préserver les murs mitoyens.

L'épaisseur de ce contre-mur pourrait être augmentée comme la largeur du chemin de ronde ci-dessus et par les mêmes considérations.

Prescriptions concernant la grosse construction, surtout en vue des dangers d'incendie.

III. Les murs intérieurs, les murs qui séparent les loges d'acteurs et le théâtre, le mur d'avant-scène, le mur qui sépare la salle, le vestibule et les escaliers seront en maçonnerie.

IV. Les portes de communication entre les loges d'acteurs et le théâtre seront en fer et battantes, de manière à être constamment fermées.

Le mur d'avant-scène qui s'élève au-dessus de la toiture ne pourra être percé que de l'ouverture de la scène et de baies de communication fermées par des portes de fer.

L'ouverture de la scène doit être fermée par un rideau en fil de fer maillé, de 0m 05c au plus de maille, qui intercepte entièrement toute communication entre les parties combustibles du théâtre et de la salle. Ce rideau doit être soutenu par des cordages combustibles.

Les décorations fixes, dans les parties supérieures de l'ouverture d'avant-scène, doivent toujours être incombustibles.

V. Tous les escaliers, les planchers de la salle et les cloisons des corridors doivent être également en matériaux incombustibles.

VI. La callotte de la salle doit être en fer et plâtre, sans boiseries.

Pompes à incendie et leur alimentation.

VII. Dans l'une des parties les plus élevées du mur d'avant-scène et sous les combles, il sera placé un appareil de secours contre l'incendie, avec colonne en charge, au poids de laquelle il sera, au besoin, ajouté une pression hydraulique assez puissante pour fournir un jet d'eau dans les parties les plus élevées du bâtiment. La capacité de l'appareil se déterminera selon l'importance du théâtre.

VIII. Les pompes doivent être installées au rez-de-chaussée, dans un local séparé du théâtre par des murs en maçonnerie.

IX. Elles seront toujours alimentées par les eaux de la Ville recueillies dans des réservoirs et par un puits, de manière que chacune des deux conduites puisse suffire au jeu des pompes établie.

X. En dehors des salles de spectacle, il doit être établi des bornes-fontaines alimentées par les eaux de la Ville et pouvant servir chacune au débit d'une pompe à incendie ; le nombre en est déterminé par l'autorité.

Chauffage et Ventilation.

XI. La salle ne peut être chauffée que par des bouches de chaleur dont le foyer est dans les caves.

Les bouches s'ouvriront à 0m 30c au-dessus du plancher.

XII. Les salles de spactacle doivent être ventilées convenablement ; l'air y sera renouvelé au moyen de dispositions que l'autorité apprêciera.

Des thermomètres seront placés en vue dans les corridors.

Dispositions relatives à l'établissement d'Ateliers au-dessus du théâtre.

XIII. Aucun atelier ne peut être établi au-dessus du théâtre.

XIV. Des ateliers ne peuvent être établis au-dessus de la salle que pour les peintres et les tailleurs, et sous la condition que les planchers soient carrelés et lambrissés : dans le cas où l'on établirait des ateliers pour les peintres, la sorbonn, à moins que les combles ne soient en fer et plâtre, doit être enfermée dans des cloisons hourdées et enduites en plâtre plafonnée, carrelée et fermée par une porte en tôle.

XV. Aucune division ne peut être faite dans les combles que pour les ateliers désignés ci-dessus.

Corridors et Escaliers de dégagement.

XVI. Le largeur des corridors de dégagement, le nombre et le largeur des escaliers ainsi que des portes de sortie seront proportionnées à l'importance du théâtre.

Toutefois, il doit y avoir au moins deux escaliers spécialement destinés au service de la salle et donnant issue à l'exterieur.

Appendix, No. 5.

PAPERS handed in by Captain Shaw.

Captain E. M. Shaw's Remarks on the SCHEDULE of the BILL to amend the LAW relating to THEATRES, &c., June 1866.

The Right Honourable G. J. Goschen, M. P., Chairman of the Select Committee on Theatrical Licenses and Regulations, 1866. App. No. 5.

Metropolitan Board of Works Fire Brigade,
Sir, Chief Station, Watling-street, E.C., London, 4 June 1866.

IN compliance with the wish of the Select Committee, I have the honour to offer the following remarks on the Schedule of the Bill to amend the Law relating to Theatres and other Places of Public Amusement.

No. 1. "Every hall and corridor shall have a clear width proportionate to the "number of persons to be accommodated in that part of the building to which such "hall or corridor leads, not being less in any case than five feet, and for each hundred "persons over five hundred, one foot more in width. But this rule does not apply to "private box lobbies or corridors, to which the public have not free access."

This regulation is good so far as it goes, but it does not go far enough. I should recommend that most stringent regulations be laid down concerning the material, construction, and size of these important portions of a theatre. If they be separated from the risk of the other parts by double wrought iron doors, stone would be a proper material to use. If they be not so separated, brick would be the best material, or, if for any reason bricks could not be used, then hard timber, such as oak or ash, would be admissible, but on no account stone.

With regard to the construction, if stone be used, it should be laid on some strong substance capable of supporting it throughout, as stone supported at only one end is liable to be broken by either shock or change of temperature, and is therefore unsafe when exposed either to great heat or to the sudden rush which must take place whenever an alarm of any kind occurs in a theatre.

With regard to the size, it might be advantageously laid down as a rule, that on each landing there should be standing room for at least one-fourth of the persons accommodated in the corresponding floor of the theatre.

No. 2. "There shall be in each part of the building, doorway access of six feet at "least for each five hundred persons to be accommodated in such part, and one foot in "addition for each additional hundred persons to be accommodated in such part; and "no box or other internal doorway shall be less than three feet wide."

These doorways should be built, wherever practicable, the full width of the passage; and wherever this could not be done, the passage should be sloped inwards to the door, so as to avoid the risks inseparable from projecting walls during a rush of excited persons.

No. 3. "All doors shall be so hung as to open outwards, that is, towards the way "of egress."

On every floor at least one or two doors should be constructed to open both ways, as there may be, and generally are, heavy risks in other parts of a theatre besides that apportioned to the audience, and the egress from the refreshment-rooms, for instance, may be an ingress to the auditorium, or even in some cases to the stage.

No. 4. "During all times when the building is open to the public, all halls and "corridors shall be maintained free and clear in the direction of egress, and in that "direction unobstructed with barriers or other impediments."

Here again the allusion to egress alone appears to me to be undesirable. I should recommend that all the words following "free and clear" be struck out, and that the words "in all directions," be substituted for them.

No. 5. "All alleyways and gangways in those parts of the building where the public "are placed shall, during the times when the building is open to the public, be main-"tained free and clear of seats or other obstructions to the free ingress and egress of "the public, and shall be used as passages only."

App. No. 5.

This is an excellent regulation, and if strictly carried out, cannot fail to reduce materially one of the greatest risks at present existing in all public places of entertainment.

No. 6. "All gaslights in any part of the building which are or may be at any time "within two feet of any inflammable substance, shall be efficiently guarded with wire-"work, or other proper means of security against the communication of fire."

In this paragraph I should recommend an alteration and an addition. The limit of two feet is not sufficient; experience proves that the heat from a common gas jet has considerable effect on wood and other inflammable substances to a distance much greater than two feet, and in all, except the oldest theatres, it will be found possible to place the jets at least three feet from the ceilings. It would be advisable that all jets should be on fixed, not swinging, brackets, and that they should be protected on the top by hanging shades or guards not nearer than six inches to the ceilings. I should recommend that the gas meter of every theatre should be in a house or yard wholly separate from the main building, with abundant ventilation above and below, so as to allow a free and immediate exit to any gas that might escape, and thus prevent it accumulating to such an extent as to cause danger.

I enclose a copy of a Report made by me to the Insurance Companies last year, containing three paragraphs bearing on this subject. The first, which will be found in page 6, is on "Fire-proof Buildings," and, if the definition of such structures there given be correct, I think it must be conceded that no theatre can ever be considered fire-proof, and that, therefore, every possible precaution should be taken which may tend to the safety of the vast numbers of lives contained in such places. The other paragraphs referred to will be found in pages 10 and 11, under the head of "Lofty Buildings," and "Theatres, &c." respectively.

I enclose a list of the theatre fires alluded to in my reply to Question No. 6156, and I had intended to append a table with particulars of losses which have occurred in other places of public entertainment, not theatres; but I find so many buildings now made available for public entertainments which were originally constructed, and are still ordinarily used for totally different purposes, that I am obliged to come to the conclusion, that until some clear and precise definition is given as to what constitutes a place of public amusement, it will be impossible either to prepare a reliable history of the accidents which have occurred to such places in times passed, or to lay down rules which may be likely to obviate a recurrence of dangers for the future.

In conclusion, I have only to add that I take very considerable interest in this branch of the question now before the Select Committee; and that I shall be happy to afford any further information, or to assist their deliberations in any other way that may be in my power.

I have, &c.
(signed) Eyre M. Shaw,
Chief Officer, Metropolitan Fire Brigade.

Remarks by Captain Shaw.

Fireproof Buildings.

App. No. 5.

Much has been said of late concerning so-called "fireproof" buildings, but so little attention appears to have been paid to the real meaning of the term fireproof, that I think a few words on the subject may not be out of place in this Report.

In treating of fireproof structures, especial reference must be made not only to the style, materials, and capacity of the building itself, but also to the nature, quantity, and classification of its contents. These points are so inextricably mixed up together that they are quite inseparable, and, as far as my judgment goes, much evil is done by the ordinary use of the expression fireproof, and by those unmeaning and mischievous statements in which warehouses to be let or sold are designated fireproof, thus utterly ignoring the obvious fact that with regard to risk of fire the contents of a building are of much greater importance than the building itself.

Thus a building, which would be perfectly fireproof as an office or a private dwelling-house, might be most dangerous and inflammable, if converted into a factory or a warehouse.

A building, to be truly fireproof, should be divided into compartments, and so constructed that the contents of any one compartment might be consumed by fire without calcining, melting, or otherwise destroying the surrounding horizontal and upright partitions, and therefore without communicating fire to the other rooms or floors.

In such a building, even without the attendance of firemen and engines, no fire could destroy a greater quantity of property than the contents of one compartment; but the probability is, that in every case the firemen would be able to realise a large salvage, and thus repay for any additional outlay which might attend the improved construction.

Lofty Buildings.

Space being so valuable in London and ground rent so heavy, buildings have been erected within the last few years to such a height as to render it more than doubtful whether effective aid from without, in case of fire, can be calculated on with any of the appliances at present in use, either here or elsewhere. It is true that improved machinery has supplied the power of forcing water in pipes to a much greater height than the top of any of these buildings, but ordinary leather hose can hardly be relied on to stand so much pressure, except under the most favourable conditions; and, if stronger hose were substituted, its increased weight would render it a difficult matter for the firemen to lay it out and move it about with that quickness on which their success in extinguishing fires entirely depends. The difficulty at present so frequently encountered of obtaining access to the upper parts of lofty buildings beyond the reach of ordinary ladders, when the lower floors are alight and communication with the staircases cut off, makes it very desirable that, in all buildings exceeding 60 feet in height, there should be a ladder, stairs, or other means of obtaining access to each floor from without, and that there should be an abundant supply of water at an elevation of at least 20 feet above the highest part of the roof, with proper mains, service pipes, and hydrants to distribute the water all over the building, so that, in the event of a fire happening in the upper stories or roof, there would be a sufficient head or pressure of water from this source to check it at an early stage, or, failing this, to keep it under some control until the arrival of powerful aid. Many large buildings in London are supplied with water in cisterns on or under the roofs, but this is by no means sufficient, inasmuch as without engines the water cannot be made available for the roof itself, or even for the top floors, as the pressure of a column of 10 or 15 feet of water is not enough to open the ordinary hose. Even in many of the old buildings much improvement might be made at a trifling cost by introducing cisterns into the domes or other ornamental elevations on the roofs, without in any way altering their appearance, or interfering with the light.

Theatres, &c.

In theatres and other places of public amusement there appears to be much room for improvement.

A simple arrangement might be made to divide such places into at least two distinct risks, the stage being in one and the audience in the other. This could be accomplished by building a complete party or fire-wall across the whole building, except where the curtain hangs, and close by the curtain might be suspended a revolving iron shutter with a considerable overlap, which could be lowered at a moment's notice to cut off the risk from from one portion of the building, thus ensuring to the firemen and others an immediate entry to at least a portion of the premises, and so enabling them to give early and effective aid. The roofs, which are now the most dangerous parts of such places, might with advantage be constructed of iron or other light metal, and divided as before mentioned; and it should be absolutely prohibited to use any portion of the roof, as at present, for either workshops or store-rooms. The curtains, wings, flies, slides, the whole of the stage, and many other parts, might be occasionally washed or soaked in a mixture of alum and water, or some similar substance, which would have the effect of rendering them less inflammable, and, even in the event of their catching fire, would entirely prevent that sudden blazing up which at present constitutes the great risk in all such places. The transverse fire-wall should be perforated at every floor, even to the basement under the stage, and the openings fitted with double wrought-iron doors. Every door for exit should be made to open outwards, and such a space allowed for this purpose that the building could be cleared of the whole audience within five minutes of the time of giving the alarm. If, in addition to this, a separate place of exit were provided for each floor or landing, the probability of a serious panic, with the delay consequent thereon, would be much reduced, the firemen would be enabled to get to their work sooner, and would, I have no doubt, be more successful in stopping a serious fire, than they can hope to be under the existing arrangements.
